Magna Carta (June 15, 1215), known as the "cornerstone of English liberty," was a constitutional charter signed by King John I of England (December 24, 1167-October 18, 1216) in the meadow of Runnymede, under pressure from the English barons. This was the first time the absolute power of a king was limited by law, guaranteeing certain rights to his subjects. Included in the provisions were:

John, by the grace of God, king of England, Lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy and Aquitaine, count of Anjou, to the archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, barons, justiciars, foresters, sheriffs, reeves, servants, and all bailiffs and his faithful people greeting.

Know that by the inspiration of God and for the good of our soul and those of all our predecessors and of our heirs, the honor of God and the exaltation of holy church, and the improvements of our kingdom, by the advice of our venerable fathers.

Clause 39. No freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or outlawed, or exiled, or in any way harmed, nor will we go upon him nor will we send upon him, except by legal judgement of his peers or by the law of the land.

Clause 40. To none will we sell, to none deny or delay, right or justice.

The king himself ought not to be under a man but under God and under the law, because the law makes the king... for there is no king where will governs and not law...

Know ye that we, in the presence of God, and for the salvation of our souls, and the souls of all our ancestors and heirs, and unto the honor of God and the advancement of Holy Church... have in the first place granted to God, and by this our present charter confirmed for us and our heirs forever.

Aquinas, Thomas (c. 1224-March 7, 1274), was a Catholic philosopher and theologian, who wrote Summa Theologica, using Aristotelian logic to reconcile faith with reason, proving the existence of God as the logical uncaused cause. His works rank with Saint Augustine in importance.

In Pange, Lingua, a hymn for Vespers on the Feast of Corpus Christi, Thomas Aquinas wrote:

Sing, my tongue, the Savior's glory,
Of His Flesh the mystery sing;
Of the Blood, all price exceeding,
Shed by our immortal King.

In Verbum Supernum Prodiens, a hymn for Lauds on Corpus Christi, Thomas Aquinas wrote:

O saving Victim, opening wide,
The gate of heaven to man below,
Our foes press on from every side,
Thine aid supply, Thy strength bestow.

In his Summa Theologica, 1273, Thomas Aquinas wrote:

Concerning perfect blessedness which consists in a vision of God.

In revealing the fallacy of logic in the view that Jesus was simply a good teacher, Thomas Aquinas stated:

Christ was either liar, lunatic, or Lord!

Eriksson, Magnus, II (1316-1374), was a king of Sweden, Norway and Skaane. He commissioned an Icelandic judge, Paul Knudsen, to lead an expedition to Greenland in 1354:

Magnus, by the grace of God, King of Norway, Sweden and Skaane, sends to all men who see or hear this letter good health and happiness.

We desire to make known to you that you [Paul Knudsen] is to take the men who shall do in the knarr [royal vessel]; whether they be named or not named, .. from my bodyguard, and also from among the retainers of other men, whom you may wish to take on the voyage who are best qualified to accompany him, whether as officers or men.

We ask that you accept this our command with a right good will for the cause, inasmuch as we do it for the honor of God, and for the sake of our soul, and for the sake of our predecessors who in Greenland established Christianity and have maintained it until this time, and we will not let it perish in our days.

Know this for truth, that whoever defies this our command shall meet with our serious displeasure and receive full punishment.

Executed in Bergen, Monday after Simon and Judah's Day in the six and thirtieth year of our rule [1354].

By Orm Ostenson, our regent, sealed.

Wycliffe, John (c. 1330-December 31, 1384), was a professor at Oxford University, England. He became one of the greatest English religious reformers, writing under the protection of John of Gaunt (1340-1399). His most outstanding achievement was being the first to translate, along with his followers, the Holy Scriptures from the Latin Vulgate into the English language. Known as the "Morning Star of the Reformation," John Wycliffe wrote in the General Prologue of his 1384 translation of the Bible:

The Bible is for the Government of the People, by the People, and for the People.

Chaucer, Geoffrey (c. 1342-October 25, 1400), was known as the "Father of English Poetry." He was honored as an English poet-laureate. The son of a vintner, he was born in London; rose to being a page to the Countess of Ulster, 1357; captured while fighting in France; and ransomed by Edward III, 1360. In 1385, Chaucer became a knight of the shire for Kent and a Justice of the Peace. He was supported by his steady patron, John of Gaunt (1340-1399), to whom he was related through marriage. At his death, he was buried in Westminster Abbey. His works include: The Book of the Duchess; The House of Fame; The Parliament of Fowls; Troilus and Criseyde, and a translation of Boethius' De Consolatione Philosophiae.

In his classic work, The Canterbury Tales, 1387, Geoffrey Chaucer stated:

Who fol with Cristes Gospel and His lord
But we, that humble ben, and chast, and pore, Workers of Goddes Word, not auditors.
- The Sompnoures Tale

O cause first of our confusioun,
Till Crist had bought us with His blood agayn!
Loketh, how dere, schortly for to sayn,
Abought was first this cursed felonye;
Corrupt was al this world for glutonye.
Adam our fader, and his wyf also,
Fro Paradys to labour and to wo
Were dryven for that vice, it is no drede.
For whils that Adam fasted, as I rede,
He was in Paradys, and when that he Eet of the fruyt defendit of a tre,
He was cast out to wo and into peyne.
Now for the love of Crist that for us dyde,
Levi th youre othis, borthe gret and smale.
- The Pardoner's Tale

But Cristes loore and his apostles twelve
He taughte, but first he folwed it hymselfe.

For in the sterres, clearer than is glass,
Is written, God woot, whoso koude it reade,
The deeth of every man.

Sathan, that evere us waiteth to bigile.

Geoffrey Chaucer, at the end of his Tales of Canterbury, inserted a retraction:

Now I beg all those that listen to this little treatise, or read it, that if there be anything in it that pleases them, they thank Our Lord Jesu Christ for it, from whom proceeds all understanding and goodness.

And if there be anything that displeases them, I beg them also to impute it to the fault of my want of ability, and not to my will, who would very gladly have said better if I had the power. For our Book says "all that is written is written for our doctrine"; and that is my intention. Wherefore I beseech you meekly for the mercy of God to pray for me, that Christ have mercy on me and forgive me my sins; and especially for my translations and editings of worldly vanities, which I revoke in my retractions; as are the book of Troilus; also the book of Fame; the book of Nineteen Ladies; the book of The Duchess; the book of St. Valentine's Day of the Parliament of Fowls; The Tales of Canterbury, those that tend towards sin; the book of The Lion; and many another book, if they were in my memory; and many a song and many a lecherous lay; that Christ in His great mercy forgive me the sin.

But the translation of Boethius De Consolatione, and other books of Saints' legends, of homilies, and morality and devotion, for them I thank our Lord Jesu Christ and His blissful Mother, and all the Saints of Heaven; beseeching them that they henceforth, to my life's end, send me grace to bewail my sins and to study the salvation of my soul; and grant me the grace of true penitence, confession and satisfaction, that I may perform them in this present life, through the benign grace of Him that is King of kings and Priest over all priests, who brought us with the precious blood of His heart; so that I may be one of those that the Day of Judgement shall be saved, Qui cum Patre, etc.

Here ends the book of the Tales of Canterbury compiled by Geoffrey Chaucer, on whose soul Jesu Christ have mercy. Amen.

Hus, John (c. 1372-July 6, 1415), was a professor of philosophy and the rector of the University of Prague, Bohemia. Influenced by John Wycliffe, he insisted on teaching and expounding the Holy Scriptures in the language of the people and inspired a great following, similar to John Wycliffe in England. Amidst great controversy, he was betrayed and martyred. His last words were:

O holy simplicity!

Kempis, Thomas a` (c. 1379-August 8, 1471), was an Augustinian friar at Zwolle in the Netherlands, who wrote the devotional, On the Imitation of Christ, 1420. This work has greatly influenced western writers, including: Martin Luther, Samuel Johnson, George Eliot and Lamartine. In Imitation of Christ, Thomas a` Kempis wrote:

Be not angry that you cannot make others as you wish them to be, since you cannot make yourself as you wish to be.

Man proposes, but God disposes.

Love is swift, sincere, pious, pleasant, gentle, strong, patient, faithful, prudent, longsuffering, manly and never seeking her own; for wheresoever a man seeketh his own, there he falleth from love.

Nothing is sweeter than love, nothing stronger, nothing higher, nothing wider, nothing more pleasant, nothing fuller or better in heaven or in earth; for love is born of God, and cannot rest but in God, above all created things.

Gutenberg, Johannes (c.1400-February 3, 1468), was the German inventor of the moveable-type printing press, which helped revolutionize the western world. This invention prepared Europe for the rapid spread of ideas, making the Reformation possible. The first book of significance ever printed was the 42-line Gutenberg Bible, known as the Mazarin Bible, 1455.

Johannes Gutenberg wrote:

God suffers in the multitude of souls whom His word can not reach. Religious truth is imprisoned in a small number of manuscript books which confine instead of spread the public treasure.

Let us break the seal which seals up holy things and give wings to Truth in order that she may win every soul that comes into the world by her word no longer written at great expense by hands easily palsied, but multiplied like the wind by an untiring machine.

Yes, it is a press, certainly, but a press from which shall flow inexhaustible streams the most abundant and most marvelous liquor that has ever flowed to relieve the thirst of men.

Through it, God will spread His word; a spring of pure truth shall flow from it; like a new star it shall scatter the darkness of ignorance, and cause a light hitherto unknown to shine among men.

Hornbook (1442-1800), was the schoolbook used to teach children to read in early English, and later American, schools. Invented in response to the expense and scarcity of paper, the hornbook consisted of one sheet of vellum or paper pasted to a flat board with a handle, shaped like a table-tennis paddle, and covered over with a thin piece of transparent cow's horn, giving the appearance of lamination. On the paper was printed the Criss-Cross Row (Christ's-Cross followed by the alphabet), the Benediction, the Lord's Prayer, and the Roman numerals. The hornbook ceased being used in the early 1800's, when paper became less expensive and more easily available. The Benediction written on the Hornbook was:

In the Name of the Father and of the Sonne and of the Holy Ghost, Amen.

Columbus, Christopher (1451-May 20, 1506), was the Genoese explorer credited with the discovery America. After seven years of trying to convince the monarchs of Europe to finance his expedition, he finally won the support of Queen Isabella of Castille and King Ferdinand of Aragon. Columbus set sail on August 3, 1492, and after the longest voyage ever made out of sight of land, discovered the New World on October 12, 1492.

In his Libro de las profecias (Book of Prophecies), Christopher Columbus wrote:

Most Christian and very high Princes: My argument for the restitution of the Holy Temple to the Holy militant Church is the following:

Very high Princes: at a very early age I went to sea and have continued navigating until today. The art of sailing is favorable for anyone who wants to pursue knowledge of this world's secrets. I have already been at this business for forty years. I have sailed all the waters which, up to now, have been navigated. I have had dealings and conversations with learned people - clergymen and laymen, Latins and Greeks, Jews and Moors, and with many others of other sects. I found Our Lord very well-disposed toward this desire, and he gave me the spirit of intelligence for it. He prospered me in seamanship and supplied me with the necessary tools for astrology, as well as geometry and arithmetic and ingenuity of intellect and of manual skill to draw spherical maps which show cities, rivers and mountains, islands and ports - everything in its proper place.

At this time I have seen and put in study to look into all the Scriptures, cosmography, histories, chronicles and philosophy and other arts, which our Lord opened to my understanding (I could sense His hand upon me), so that it became clear to me that it was feasible to navigate from here to the Indies; and He unlocked within me the determination to execute the idea. And I came to your Highnesses with this ardor.

All those who heard about my enterprise rejected it with laughter, scoffing at me. Neither the sciences which I mentioned above, nor the authoritative citations from them, were of any avail. In only your Highnesses remained faith and constancy. Who doubts that this illumination was from the Holy Spirit? I attest that He (the Spirit), with marvelous rays of light, consoled me through the holy and sacred Scriptures, a strong and clear testimony, with forty-four books of the Old Testament, and four Gospels with twenty-three Epistles of those blessed Apostles, encouraging me to proceed, and, continually, without ceasing for a moment, they inflame me with a sense of great urgency.

Our Lord wished to perform the clearest miracle in this of the voyage to the Indies, to console me and others in this other of the Holy Temple: I spent seven years in your royal Court arguing the case with so many persons of such authority and learned in all the arts, and in the end they concluded that all was idle nonsense, and with this they gave up; yet the outcome will be the fulfillment of what our Redeemer Jesus Christ said, and had said beforehand by the mouth of his Holy Prophets. And so there is every reason to believe that this other will become manifest; and being sure of what we hope for, if what said done not suffice, I offer as support the holy Gospel, in which Jesus stated that everything would pass away, but not his wonderful Word; and with this he said that it was utterly necessary for all that was written by him and by the prophets to be fulfilled.

I said that I would state the argument I have for the restitution of the Holy Temple to the Holy Church. I tell you that I am disregarding all my navigational skills since an early age, as well as the conversations I have had with many people in many lands and of many sects; and disregarding the many arts and writings that I referred to above, I only hold fast to the Holy and Sacred Scriptures and to some prophetic authoritative citations from certain holy persons, who have said something about this under divine inspiration.

It is possible that your Highnesses and all others who know me and might be shown this writing, who will reprimand me secretly and publicly with varied reproofs, such as uneducated, ignorant, an ordinary man, etc.

I respond to that what St. Matthew said: "O Lord, it was your good pleasure to keep so many things from the wise, and reveal them to the innocent!" And the same St. Matthew: "When our Lord entered Jerusalem, the children sang, 'Hosanna to the Son of David!' The scribes, in order to tempt him, asked him if he heard what they were saying, and Jesus replied, 'Yes,' saying 'Did you not know that the truth would be spoken by the mouths of children?'" Or later on the Apostles who said such profound things, particularly St. John: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, etc.," words so lofty from persons who were never formally educated.

I say that the Holy Spirit works...not just the learned, but also in the ignorant. In my time I have seen a countryman discern the sky and the courses of the stars better than others who pay tuition to be instructed in it. And I say that not only does the Holy Spirit reveal the future to rational creatures, but he shows us what is yet to come by summoning signs in the heavens, in the atmosphere, and in of wild beasts, just like the prodigies that portended the day of Julius Caesar's, and in many other ways which would be tedious to recount since they are familiar to everybody.

The Holy Scriptures testify in the Old Testament, by the mouth of the prophets, and in the New, by our Savior Jesus Christ, that this world will come to an end: Matthew, Mark, and Luke have recorded the signs of the end of the age; the prophets had also abundantly foretold it.

St. Augustine says that the end of this world will occur in the seventh millennium following the Creation; the sacred theologians accepts his interpretation, in particular the cardinal Pierre d'Ailly in Verbo XI and in other places, as I will tell below.

From the creation of the world, or from Adam, until the Advent of our Lord Jesus Christ figure 5,343 years and 318 days, by the calculation of King Alfonso which is held as the most accurate; P. de A. (Pierre d'Ailly) on Verbo X (Elucidarium astronomice concordie cum theologica et historica veritate). Adding these figures to the approximate 1,501 years, the total is an approximate 6,845 years. According to this calculation, there are but 155 years left for the fulfillment of the seven thousand, at which time I said above, by the authorities cited, that the world will come to an end.

Our Savior said that before the consummation of this world, all that was written by the Prophets must be fulfilled.

The Prophets, in their writings, spoke, more or less clearly and in various manners, of things belonging to the future as if past and of things past as future, and in the same way of things present. Many prophecies have double meaning and refer to different events of similar character, some prophecies are figuratively and others literally. Prophecy may be fulfilled partially in the near future or more completely at a much later date. Isaiah is the prophet whom St. Jerome and St. Augustine praise the most, and the other doctors approve of him and hold him in great reverence. They say that Isaiah not only a prophet, but also an evangelist, who, with all diligence, wrote of the future and called all people to our holy Catholic faith.

Many saintly doctors and sacred theologians commented on all the prophecies and on the other books of Sacred Scripture. They greatly enlightened us concerning that which was unknown to us, though they are not entirely in harmony, due to the limitations of understanding.

Again I enter my protest, so as not to be spoken of as presumptuous and unlearned. I am continually drawn to what St. Matthew said: "O Lord, it was your good pleasure to keep secret so many things from the wise, and reveal them to the innocent!" My retort is this, along with my experience which has witnessed to it.

Most of the prophecies and Sacred Scripture have already been fulfilled. God's Word testifies to it, and the Holy Church testifies to it ceaselessly in a strong voice, and no other testimony is necessary. I will speak of one because it is relevant to me, and every time I meditate on it, I feel rest and contentment.

I am the worst of sinners. The pity and mercy of our Lord have completely covered me whenever I have called for them. I have found the sweetest consolation in casting away all my anxiety, so as to contemplate His marvelous presence.

I have already said that for the execution of the enterprise of the Indies, neither reason, nor mathematics, nor world maps were profitable to me; rather the prophecy of Isaiah was completely fulfilled. And this is what I wish to report here for the consideration of your Highnesses, and because you will be gladdened by what I will tell you concerning Jerusalem by the same authoritative references. If there is faith, you are bound to have the victory from this enterprise.

Your Highnesses, remember the Gospel texts and the many promises which our Savior made to us, and how all this has been put to a test: St. Peter, when he leapt into the sea, walked upon as long as his faith remained firm. The mountains will obey anyone who has faith the size of a kernel of Indian corn. All that is requested by anyone who has faith will be granted. Knock and it will be opened to you.

No one should be afraid to take on any enterprise in the name of our Savior, if it is right and if the purpose is purely for His holy service. He came to rescue of St. Catherine after he saw the test of her. Remember, your Highnesses, that you undertook, at little cost, the enterprise of the kingdom of Granada. The working out of all things was entrusted by our Lord to each person, in conformity with His sovereign will, even though he gives advice to many. He lacks nothing that it may be in the power of men to give him.

O, how good is the Lord who wishes people to perform that for which he holds himself responsible! Day and night, and at every moment, everyone should give Him their most devoted thanks. I stated above that some of the prophecies remained yet to be fulfilled, and I say they are great things in the world. And I say that the sign which convinces me that our Lord is hastening the end of the world is the preaching of the Gospel recently in so many lands.

Queen Isabella's commission to Columbus recited:

It is hoped that by God's assistance some of the continents and islands in the ocean will be discovered . . . for the glory of God.

On August 3, 1492, according to Bartolome' de Las Casas, every crew member gave his last confession and received Holy Communion, after which:

[Columbus] received the very holy sacrament of the Eucharist on the very day that he entered upon the sea; and in the name of Jesus ordered the sails to be set and left the harbor of Palos for the river of Saltes and the Ocean Sea with three equipped caravels, giving the commencement to the First Voyage and Discovery of the Indies.

In the typical custom of the age, each day a young sailor would announce the day by singing out:

Blessed be the light of day
And the Holy Cross, we say;
and the Lord of Veritie
And the Holy Trinity.
Blessed be th' immortal soul
And the Lord who keeps it whole,
Blessed be the light of day
And He who sends the night away.

Then the sailors would recite the "Pater Noster" (Our Father) and the "Ave Maria," followed by:

God give us good days, good voyage, good passage to the ship, sir captain and master and good company, so let there be a good voyage; many good days may God grant your graces, gentlemen of the afterguard and gentlemen forward.

The hourglass, which was turned on the half-hour, marked the time, accompanied by the young sailor proclaiming:

Blessed be the hour our Lord was born,
St. Mary who bore Him, and St. John who baptized Him.

In 1492, Columbus opened the journal of his first voyage across the Atlantic by addressing King Ferdinand and Queen

Isabella:

In the Name of Our Lord Jesus Christ,
Because, most Christian and very Exalted,
Excellent and mighty Princes, King and Queen of the Spains and of the Islands of the Sea, our Lord and Lady, in this present year 1492, after Your Highnesses had made an end to the war with the Moors who ruled in Europe, and had concluded the war in the very great City of Granada, where in the present year, on the second day of the month of January, I saw the Royal Standards of Your Highnesses placed by force of arms on the towers of the Alhambra (which is the citadel of the said city),

And I saw the Moorish King come forth to the gates of the city and kiss the Royal Hands of Your Highnesses and the Prince of my Lord, and soon after in that same month, through information that I had given to Your Highnesses concerning the lands of India, and of a Prince who is called Gran Can [Khan], which is to say in our vernacular "King of Kings," how many times he and his predecessors had sent to Rome to seek doctors in our Holy Faith to instruct him therein, and that never had the Holy Father provided them, and thus so many people were lost through lapsing into idolatries and receiving doctrines of perdition;

And Your Highnesses, as Catholic Christians and Princes devoted to the Holy Christian Faith and the propagators thereof, and enemies of the sect of Mahomet and of all idolatries and heresies, resolved to send me, Christopher Columbus, to the said regions of India, to see the said princes and peoples and lands and the dispositions of them and of all, and the manner in which may be undertaken their conversion to our Holy Faith, and ordained that I should not go by land (the usual way) to the Orient, but by the route of the Occident, by which no one to this day knows for sure that anyone has gone...

Bartolome' de Las Casas, (1474-1566), called "the Apostle of the Indies," was one of the first Christian missionaries to America. As the first priest ordained in the New World, he became known for his devotion to the oppressed and enslaved natives. In addition to knowing Columbus personally, his father and uncle were shipmates and colonists under Columbus. Bartolome' de Las Casas copied Columbus's original Journal of the First Voyage (El Libro de la Primera Navegación) into an abstract, in which is recounted:

October 8, 1492. "Thanks be to God," says the Admiral; "the air is soft as in April in Seville, and it is a pleasure to be in it, so fragrant it is."

October 10, 1492. Here the people could stand it no longer and complained of the long voyage; but the Admiral cheered them as best he could, holding out good hope of the advantages they would have. He added that it was useless to complain. He had come to the Indies, and so had to continue it until he found them, with the help of Our Lord.

October 12, 1492. At two hours after midnight appeared the land, at a distance of 2 leagues. They handed all sails and set the tree, which is the mainsail without bonnets, and lay-to, waiting for daylight Friday, when they arrived at an island of the Bahamas that was called in the Indians' tongue Guanahani' [San Salvador]....

So that they might be well-disposed towards us, for I knew that they were a people to be delivered and converted to our Holy Faith rather by love than by force, I gave to some red caps and to others glass beads, which they hung around their necks, and many other things of slight value. At this they were greatly pleased and became so entirely our friends that it was a wonder to see.... I believe that they would easily be made Christians, for it seemed to me that they had no religion of their own. Our Lord willing, when I depart, I shall bring back six of them to your Highnesses, that they may learn to talk our language.

October 16, 1492. I don't recognize in them any religion, and I believe that they very promptly would turn Christians, for they are of very good understanding.

October 28, 1492. The Admiral says that he never beheld so fair a thing: trees all along the river, beautiful and green, and different from ours, with flowers and fruits each according to their kind, many birds and little birds which sing very sweetly.

November 6, 1492. I maintain, Most Serene Princes, that if they had access to devout religious persons knowing the language, they would all turn Christian, and so I hope in Our Lord that Your Highnesses will do something about it with much care, in order to turn to the Church so numerous a folk, and to convert them as you have destroyed those who would not seek to confess the Father, Son and Holy Ghost. And after your days (for we are all mortal) you will leave your realms in a very tranquil state, and free from heresy and wickedness, and will be well received before the eternal Creator, to whom I pray to grant you long life and great increase of many realms and lordships, and both will and disposition to increase the holy Christian religion, as hitherto you have done.

November 27, 1492. But now, please our Lord, I shall see the most that I may, and little by little I shall come, to understand and know, and I will have this language taught to people of my household, because I see that all so far have one language. And afterwards the benefits will be known, and it will be endeavored to have these folk Christians, for that will easily be done, since they have no religion; nor are they idolaters.... And I say that Your Highness ought not to consent that any foreigner does business or sets foot here, except Christian Catholics, since this was the end and the beginning of the enterprise, that it should be for the enhancement and glory of the Christian religion, nor should anyone who is not a good Christian come to these parts.

December 12, 1492. [Columbus erected a cross at the mouth of Moustique Bay on the northwest coast of the island of Hispaniola] as a sign that Your Highnesses hold the country for yours, and principally for a sign of Jesus Christ Our Lord, and honor of Christianity.

December 16, 1492. Because they [tribe of the Arawak], are the best people in the world and above all the gentlest, I have much hope in Our Lord that Your Highnesses will make them all Christians, and they will be all yours, as for yours I hold them.

December 22, 1492. The Admiral ordered the Lord to be given some things, and he and all his folk rested in great contentment, believing truly that they had come from the sky, and to see the Christians they held themselves very fortunate.

December 24, 1492. Your Highnesses may believe that in all the world there can be no better or gentler people. Your Highnesses should feel great joy, because presently they will be Christians, and instructed in the good manners of your realms; for a better people there cannot be on earth, and both people and land are in such quantity that I don't know how to write it.

Columbus christened the first island he landed on "San Salvador," meaning "Holy Saviour," and kneeling, prayed:

O Lord, Almighty and everlasting God, by Thy holy Word Thou hast created the heaven, and the earth, and the sea; blessed and glorified be Thy Name, and praised be Thy Majesty, which hath deigned to use us, Thy humble servants, that Thy holy Name may be proclaimed in this second part of the earth.

On every island that they stopped, Columbus had his men erect a large wooden cross:

As a token of Jesus Christ our Lord, and in honor of the Christian faith.

According to Columbus' personal log, his purpose in seeking "undiscovered worlds" was to:

...bring the Gospel of Jesus Christ to the heathens.

On Christmas eve, December 24, 1492, the Santa Maria ran aground and had to be abandoned. Columbus left 40 men on the Island of Haiti, in a settlement he named "La Navidad," meaning "The Nativity." He promised to return the next year.

On January 13, 1493, Columbus described in his journal their first encounter with the cannibalistic tribe of the Canibs, or Caribs, from which "Caribbean" originates. (The English word "cannibal" is derived from the Spanish word "caribe," which means cannibal or piranha.)

Seeing them [Caribs] running towards them, the Christians...gave an Indian a great slash on the buttocks, and wounded another in the breast with an arrow. Seeing that they could gain little, although the Christians were not more than seven, they [Caribs] 50 and more, began to flee, until not one remained, one leaving his arrows here, and another his bow there. The Christians would have killed many of them, it is said, if the pilot who went with them as their captain had not prevented it. The Christians returned to the caravel with their boat, and when the Admiral knew of it he said that on the one hand he was sorry and on the other not, since they would have fear of the Christians, because without doubt, says he, the folk there are bad actors (as one says), and he believed that they were Caribs, and ate men.

On February 15, 1493, near the end of his return voyage from having discovered America, Christopher Columbus sent correspondence to their Highnesses, the King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella of Spain, from on board the ship Caravel anchored off the Canary Islands. Included in this correspondence was a letter, also intended for the eyes of their Majesties, written to Luis de Sant Angel, Treasurer of Aragon and Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had helped substantially in fitting out Columbus' expedition:

As I know you will be rejoiced at the glorious success that our Lord has given me in my voyage, I write this to tell you how in the thirty-three days I sailed to the Indies with the fleet that the illustrious King and Queen, our Sovereigns, gave me, where I discovered a great many islands, inhabited by numberless people; and of all I have taken possession for their Highnesses by proclamation and display of the Royal Standard without opposition.

To the first island which I found I gave the name San Salvador [Holy Savior], in recognition of His Heavenly Majesty, who marvelously hath given all this; the Indians call it Guanahani....

From that point I saw another isle to the eastward, at eighteen leagues' distance, to which I gave the name Hispaniola. I went thither and followed its northern coast to the east, as I had done in Juana, one hundred and seventy-eight leagues eastward, as in Juana. This island, like all the others, is most extensive. It has many ports along the sea-coast excelling any in Christendom....

At everypoint where I landed, and succeeded in talking to them, I gave them some of everything I had....I forbade that they should be given things so worthless as pieces of broken crockery and broken glass, and lace points, although when they were able to get them, they thought they had the best jewel in the world; thus it was learned that a sailor for a lace point received gold to the weight of two and a half castellanos, and others much more for other things which were worth much less; yea, for new blancas, for them they would give all that they had, although it might be two or three castellanos' weight of gold or an arroba or two of spun cotton; they even took pieces of the broken hoops of the wine casks and, like animals, gave what they had, so that it seemed to me wrong and I forbade it, and I gave them a thousand good, pleasing things which I had brought, in order that they might be fond of us, and furthermore might become Christians and be inclined to the love and service of Their Highnesses and of the whole Castilian nation, and try to help us and to give us of the things which they have in abundance and which are necessary to us.

And they know neither religion nor idolatry, with the exception that all believe that the source of all power and goodness is in heaven, and they believe very firmly that I, with these ships and people, came from heaven, and in this belief they everywhere received me, after they had overcome their fear.

And this does not result from their being ignorant (for they are of a very keen intelligence and men who navigate all those seas, so that it is wondrous the good account they give of everything), but because they have never seen people clothed or ships like ours....

As for monsters, I have found not a trace of them except at the point in the second isle as one enters the Indies, which is inhabited by a people considered in all the isles as most ferocious, who eat human flesh. They possess many canoes, with which they overrun all the isles of India, stealing and seizing all they can....

Praise be to our eternal God, our Lord, who gives to all those who walk in His ways victory over all things which seem impossible; of which this is signally one, for, although others have spoken or written concerning these countries, it was all conjecture, as no one could say that he had seen them - it amounting only to this, that those who heard listened the more, and regarded the matter rather as a fable than anything else.

But our Redeemer has granted this victory to our illustrious King and Queen and their kingdoms, which have acquired great fame by an event of such high importance, in which all Christendom ought to rejoice, and which it ought to celebrate with great festivals and the offering of solemn thanks to the Holy Trinity with many sincere prayers, both for the great exaltation which may accrue to them in turning so many nations to our holy faith, and also for the temporal benefits which will bring great refreshment and gain, not only to Spain, but to all Christians.

Done on board the Caravel, off the Canary Islands, on the fifteenth day of February, Fourteen hundred and ninety-three. At your orders,

The Admiral.

On March 15, 1493, Columbus wrote in his journal:

Of this voyage, I observe... that it has miraculously been shown, as may be understood by this writing, by the many signal miracles that He has shown on the voyage, and for me, who for so great a time was in the court of Your Highnesses with the opposition and against the opinion of so many high personages of your household, who were all against me, alleging this undertaking to be folly, which I hope in Our Lord will be to the greater glory of Christianity, which to some slight extent already has happened.

In 1493, Columbus wrote a letter to Gabriel Sanchez, Spain's General Treasurer:

That which the unaided intellect of man could not compass, the spirit of God has granted to human exertions, for God is wont to hear the prayers of His servants who love His precepts even to the performance of apparent impossibilities. Therefore, let the king and queen, our princes and their most happy kingdoms, and all the other provinces of Christendom, render thanks to our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

Columbus viewed himself as:

Servant... of the Most High Saviour, Christ, the Son of Mary.

Queen Isabella informed the Pope of Columbus' attempt:

To bear the light of Christ west to the heathen undiscovered lands.

On April 9, 1493, Columbus wrote to the King and Queen about plans for a second voyage. He recommended that approximately 2,000 colonists accompany him to settle three or four villages, according the custom of Spain each with its own notary and magistrate, and that:

There be a church and abbots or friars to administer the sacraments, perform divine worship, and convert the natives.

On May 29, 1493, King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella granted Columbus' request for a second voyage, pronouncing:

It hath pleased God, Our Lord, in His abundant mercy to reveal the said Islands and Mainland to the King and Queen, our Lords, by the diligence of the Don Christopher Columbus, their Admiral, Viceroy and Governor thereof, who hath reported it to Their Highnesses that he knew the people he found residing therein to be very ripe to be converted to our Holy Catholic Faith, since they have neither dogma nor doctrine; wherefore it hath pleased and greatly pleaseth Their Highnesses (since in all matters it is meet that their principal concern be for the service of God, Our Lord, and the enhancement of Our Holy Catholic Faith); wherefore, desiring the augmentation and increase of our Holy Catholic Faith, Their Highnesses charge and direct the said Admiral, Viceroy and Governor that by all ways and means he strive and endeavor to win over the inhabitants of the said Islands and Mainland to be converted to our Holy Catholic Faith....

[Clergy are to be sent] to see that they be carefully taught the principles of Our Holy Faith....

[The Admiral is to] force and compel all those who sail therein as well as all others who are to go out from here later on, that they treat the said Indians very well and lovingly and abstain from doing them any injury, arranging that both people hold much conversation and intimacy, each serving the others to the best of their ability.

Moreover, the said Admiral shall graciously present them with things from the merchandise of Their Highnesses which he is carrying for barter, and honor them much; and if some person or persons should maltreat the said Indians in any manner whatsoever, the said Admiral, as Viceroy and Governor of Their Highnesses, shall punish them severely by the virtue of the authority vested in him by Their Majesties for this purpose.

On September 25, 1493, Columbus set sail from Cadiz, Spain, with 1,200 colonists and 17 ships. They landed in the Indies on November 3, 1493, where Columbus continued his discovery of the islands of Dominica, Mariagalante, Todos los Santos and St. Maria de Guadalupe.

In returning to the settlement of the La Navidad on the island of Haiti, where he had left the 40 men from the wrecked Santa Maria, Columbus' worst fears were realized. The Caribs had attacked the fort and had killed all his men. Thereafter, Columbus had to resist a growing apprehension amongst the colonists, who previously had anticipated only the marvelous conditions reported from the first voyage.

In 1495, Michele de Cuneo, a young Italian nobleman who had accompanied Columbus on this second voyage, recounted in a letter further evidence of the cannibalistic Caribs who inhabited the islands:

In that island [Saint Maria de Guadalupe] we took twelve very beautiful and very fat women from 15 to 16 years old, together with two boys of the same age. These had the genital organ cut to the belly; and this we thought had been done in order to prevent them from meddling with their wives or maybe to fatten them up and later eat them. These boys and girls had been taken by the above mentioned Caribs; and we sent them to Spain to the King, as a sample....

The Caribs whenever they catch these Indians eat them as we would eat kids [goats] and they say that a boy's flesh tastes better than that of a woman. Of this human flesh they are very greedy, so that to eat of that flesh they stay out of their country for six, eight, or even ten years before they repatriate; and they stay so long, whenever they go, that they depopulate the islands....

We went to the temple of those Caribs, in which we found two wooden statues, arranged so that they look like a Pieta. We were told that whenever someone's father is sick, the son goes to the temple and tells the idol that his father is ill and the idol says whether he should live or not; and he stays there until the idol answers yes or No. If he says no, the son goes home, cuts his father's head off and then cooks it; I don't believe they eat it but truly when it is white they place it in the above-mentioned temple; and this they do only to the lords. That idol is called Seyti....

According to what we have seen in all the islands where we have been, both the Indians and the Caribs are largely sodomites, not knowing (I believe) whether they are acting right or wrong. We have judged that this accursed vice may have come to the Indians from those Caribs; because these, as I said before, are wilder men and when conquering and eating those Indians, for spite they may also have committed that extreme offence, which proceeding thence may have been transmitted from one to the other.

Dr. Diego Alvarez Chanca, the chief physician on Columbus' second voyage, described with disgust their encounter with the Caribs:

We inquired of the women who were prisoners of the inhabitants what sort of people these islanders were and they replied, "Caribs." As soon as they learned that we abhor such kind of people because of their evil practice of eating human flesh, they felt delighted...

They told us that the Carib men use them with such cruelty as would scarcely be believed; and that they eat the children which they bear them, only bringing up those whom they have by their native wives. Such of their male enemies, as they can take away alive, they bring here to their homes to make a feast of them and those who are killed in battle they eat up after the fighting is over.

They declare that the flesh of man is good to eat that nothing can compare with it in the world; and this is quite evident, for the human bones we found in the houses, everything that could be gnawed had already been gnawed so that nothing remained but what was too hard to eat; in one of the houses we found a man's neck cooking in a pot...

In their wars of the inhabitants of the neighboring islands these people capture as many of the women as they can, especially those who are young and handsome and keep them as body servants and concubines; and so great a number do they carry off that in fifty houses we entered no man was found but all were women. Of that large number of captive females more than twenty handsome woman came away voluntarily with us.

When the Caribs take away boys as prisoners of war they remove their organs, fatten them until they grow up and then, when they wish to make a great feast, they kill and eat them, for they say the flesh of women and youngsters is not good to eat. Three boys thus mutilated came fleeing to us when we visited the houses.

Columbus, after establishing the settlements of Isabella and Santo Domingo on the island of Hispaniola, proceeded to explore for five months, leaving the colony under poor supervision. Supplies in the colonies began to diminish, tropical diseases were spreading, and the colonists grew discontent. By the time the next fleet left for Spain, 200 colonists, most in bad health, left with it. Their complaints resulted in a royal investigation in October of 1495, much to the outrage of Columbus. In March 1496, Columbus left for Spain to defend himself.

On Thursday, February 22, 1498, in his Testament of Founding Hereditary Family Estate, Christopher Columbus stated:

Also I order to said Don Diego, my son, or to him who will inherit said mayorazgo, that he shall help to maintain and sustain on the Island of Espanola four good teachers of the holy theology with the intention to convert to our holy religion all those people in the Indias, and when it pleases God that the income of the mayorazgo will increase, that then also be increased the number of such devoted persons who will help all these people to become Christians. And may he not worry about the money that it will be necessary to spend for the purpose.

voyage with six ships. He decided that the first new land he discovered would be named in honor of the Trinity. Sighting an island off the coast of Venezuela, which coincidentally had three peaks, he gave it the name Trinidad; a name which it has retained to this day.

On October 18, 1498, Christopher Columbus wrote to his Sovereigns, Queen Isabella and King Ferdinand:

Your Highnesses have an Other World here, by which our holy faith can be to greatly advanced and from which such great wealth can be drawn.

Columbus directed his son, Don Diego, to give Queen Isabella of Spain the first pieces of gold found in the New World:

Return it to her so that she may see the miracle of the Lord and remember to whom she ought to thank for it.

When Columbus finally arrived at the island of Hispaniola, he was greeted by a revolt, due to the disease and privation on the island. His brother Bartholomew and Don Diego, who were left in authority, were helpless to put it down. Himself being in bad health, Columbus conceded to the demands of the distraught colonists and gave them two ships to return home. In the midst of despair, Columbus wrote:

The day after Christmas Day, 1499, all having left me, I was attacked by the Indians...and was placed in such extremity that fleeing death, I took to sea in a small caravel. Then Our Lord aided me, saying, "Man of little faith, do not fear, I am with thee." And he dispersed my enemies, and showed me how I might fulfill my vows. Unhappy sinner that I am, to have placed all my hopes in the things of this world!

Due to the turbulent reports they had received, King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella appointed Francisco de Bobadilla as governor of the Indies in the place of Columbus. He arrived in Hispaniola on August 23, 1500 and arrested Columbus and his brothers, put them in chains and sent them back to Cadiz, Spain.

In October 1500, during the most humiliating moment of his life, Columbus wrote to a friend and confidante of the Queen, Dona Juana de Torres:

Hope in Him who created all men sustaineth me: His succor hath always been very near. At another time, not long ago, when I was in great distress, He helped me up with his right hand, saying, "O man of little faith, arise, for it is I; fear not."

I came with such cordial affection to serve these princes, and I have served them with unheard of and unseen devotion. Of the New Heaven and Earth which Our Lord made, as St. John writes in the Apocalypse, after he had spoken it by the mouth of Isaiah, He made me the messenger thereof and showed me where to go.

...I undertook a new voyage to the New Heaven and World which hitherto had been hidden. And if, like the rest of the Indies, this is not held in high esteem over there; this is no wonder, since it came to light through my exertions.

The Holy Spirit inspired St. Peter and, with him, the others of the Twelve, and they all struggled in this world, and many were their labors and their hardships; in the end they triumphed over all....

They judge me there as a governor who had gone to Sicily or to a city or town under a regular government, where laws can be observed in toto without fear of losing all; and I am suffering grave injury. I should be judged as a captain who went from Spain to the Indies...where by divine will I have placed under the sovereignty of the King and Queen our Lords, an Other World, whereby Spain, which was reckoned poor, is become the richest of countries.

I ought to be judged as a captain, who for so long a time, up to the present day, hath borne arms without laying them down for an hour, and by knights of the sword and not by [men of] letters, unless they were Greeks or Romans or others of modern times, of whom there are so many and so noble in Spain; for otherwise I am greatly aggrieved, since in the Indies there is neither a town nor settlement.

When the King and Queen saw Columbus, they immediately ordered his chains removed, restored the property Bobadilla had confiscated, restored the one-tenth of the revenues which he had been promised, and restored to him the title, "Admiral of the Ocean Sea," although they realized he could not continue to govern the Indies. Bobadilla, who had previously chained Columbus, was removed as governor, although his actions were not condemned. In an ironic turn of events, during his fourth voyage, Columbus warned the governor of Hispaniola of an impending hurricane. His counsel was spurned and 24 ships were sunk, killing 500 people, among whom was Bobadilla.

Columbus applied the Sacred Scriptures to his own life and adventures. That religious elements played a great part in Columbus' thoughts and actions is evident from all his writings. His concept of sailing west to reach the Indies was less the result of geographical theories than of his faith in certain biblical texts - specifically the Book of Isaiah. In his book, Libro de las profecias (Book of Prophecies), written around 1501, between his third and fourth voyages, Columbus cited the following Scripture passages:

The LORD reigneth, let the earth rejoice; let the multitude of isles be glad thereof (Psalm 97:1).

Sing unto the LORD a new song, and His praise from the ends of the earth, ye that go down to the sea, and all that is therein; the isles, and the inhabitants thereof (Isai ah 42:10).

Listen, O isles, unto Me; and hearken, ye people from far; The Lord hath called me from the womb; from the bowels of my mother hath he made mention of my name (Isai ah 49:1).

I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation unto the end of the earth (Isai ah 49:6).

My righteousness is near; My salvation is gone forth...The isles shall wait upon Me, and on Mine arm shall they trust (Isai ah 51:5).

Surely the isles wait for me, and the ships of Tarshish first, to bring thy sons from far, their silver and their gold with them, unto the name of the Lord thy God, and to the Holy One of Israel, because he hath glorified thee (Isai ah 60: 9).

I am sought of them that asked not for Me; I am found of them that sought Me not; I said, Behold Me, behold Me, unto a nation that was not called by My name (Isai ah 65: 1).

Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost: Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: And, lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world (Matthew 28: 19, 20).

But ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you; and you shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth (Acts 1: 8).

In May of 1502, Christopher Columbus, along with his brother Bartholomew, and son Don Ferdinand (who was thirteen years old), set sail on his fourth voyage. With the express purpose of finding Asia, they explored the coasts of Cuba, Honduras, Nicaragua and Costa Rica. Sailing along the coast of Panama, Columbus did not realized how close he was to discovering the Pacific Ocean. His health failing, Columbus had a makeshift cabin built on deck so he could direct the crew and observe the ocean. With worm-eaten planks in his ship, they became stranded on the coast of Jamaica for over a year (June 25, 1503, to June 29, 1504).

On July 7, 1503, while shipwrecked and in pain, Christopher Columbus related his many afflictions in his Lettera Rarissima to the Sovereigns from Jamaica, not knowing whether anyone would read his letter:

In January the mouth of the river became obstructed. In April, the vessels were all worm-eaten, and I could not keep them above water. At this time the river cut a channel, by which I brought out three empty ships with considerable difficulty. The boats went back into the river for salt and water. The sea rose high and furious and would not let them out again.

The Indians were many and united and attacked them and in the end killed them. My brother and all the rest of the people were living on board a vessel which lay inside. I was outside very much alone, on this rude coast, with a high fever and very fatigued. There was no hope of escape. In this state, I climbed painfully to the highest part of the ship and cried out for help with a fearful voice, weeping, to Your Highnesses' war captains, in every direction; but none replied. At length, groaning with exhaustion, I fell asleep, and heard a compassionate voice saying,

"O fool, and slow to believe and serve thy God, the God of every man! What more did He do for Moses or for David his servant than for thee? From thy birth He hath ever held thee in special charge. When He saw thee at man's estate, marvelously did He cause thy name to resound over the earth.

"The Indies, so rich a portion of the world, He gave thee for thine own, and thou has divided them as it has pleased thee. Of those barriers of the Ocean Sea, which were closed with such mighty chains, He hath given thee the keys. Thou was obeyed in so many lands, and thou hast won noble fame from Christendom. What more did He do for the people of Israel, when he carried them out of Egypt; or for David, whom from a shepherd He raised to be king over Judea?

"Turn thou to Him and acknowledge thy faults; His mercy is infinite; thine old age shall not hinder thee from performing mighty deeds, for many and vast heritages He holdeth. Abraham was past 100 when he begat Isaac, and Sarah was no young girl. Thou criest out for succor with a doubting heart.

"Reflect, who has afflicted thee so grievously and so often, God or the world? The privileges and promises which God bestows, he doth not revoke; nor doth He say, after having received service, that this was not His intention, and that it is to be understood differently. Nor doth He mete out suffering to make a show of His might.

"Whatever He promises He fulfills with interest; that is His way. Thus I have told thee what thy Creator hath done for thee and what He doth for all men. He hath now revealed a portion of the rewards for so many toils and dangers thou hast borne in the service of others."

In his Lettera Rarissima to the Sovereigns, written from Jamaica, July 7, 1503, Christopher Columbus recounted:

The tempest was terrible and separated me from my vessels that night, putting everyone of them in desperate straits, with nothing to look forward to but death. Each was certain the others had been destroyed. What man ever born, not excepting Job, who would not have died of despair, when in such weather seeking safety for my son, my brother, shipmates, and myself, we were forbidden the land and the harbors which I, by God's will and sweating blood, had won for Spain?...

I was taken prisoner and thrown with two brothers into a ship, weighed down with irons, stripped of my clothing, cruelly treated, and without being called before a court of justice for a hearing!...

I began my service at twenty-eight, and I now have not a single hair on my head that is not white. My body is infirm, and all that was left to me and to my brothers, even to our coats, was taken and sold, to my great dishonor and injury....

Because of the very sincere intentions I have always had in serving your Majesties and the most unmerited affronts I have suffered, I cannot remain silent much as I might wish to do. As I have said, I am now worn out.

Heretofore I have wept for others; may Heaven now have pity upon me and may the earth weep for me! In things temporal I have not even a farthing for the offering; and as to spiritual things, I have stayed here in the Indies in the manner I have described; isolated in this sorrow, ill, daily awaiting death, and surrounded by a horde of savages and enemies of ours, and so far removed from the holy sacraments of the holy church that my soul would be forgotten by it if it were to depart from my body.

Let those who have charity, justice and truth weep for me! I did not come on this voyage for gain, honor or wealth, that is certain; for then the hope of all such things was dead. I came to Your Highnesses with honest purpose and sincere zeal; and I do not lie.

I humbly beseech your Highnesses that if it please God to take me from this place, you will have the goodness to arrange for me to go to Rome and on other holy pilgrimages. May the Holy Trinity guard your life and exalt your high station! Christ-bearer.

In his work, Libro de las profecias (Book of Prophecies), Christopher Columbus wrote:

My hope in the One who created us all sustains me: He is an ever present help in trouble...When I was extremely depressed, He raised me with His right hand, saying, "O man of little faith, get up, it is I; do not be afraid."

Christopher Columbus' real name was Cristobal Colon. He encased his signature in an enigmatic triangular pattern, which has been interpreted many ways, the most likely of which is: S.S.A.S. being an abbreviation for Servus Sum Altissimi Salvatoris (Servant I am of the Most High Savior); X being abbreviation of the Greek name for Christ; M being an abbreviation for Mary; Y being an abbreviation for either Yosephi (Joseph), Yesu (Jesus) or Ysabel (Isabella):

.	S	.	(Servus)
.	S	.	(Sum Altissimi Salvatoris)
X	M	Y	(X-Greek Christ, Mary, Yosephi -Joseph)
: X. p. o.	FERENS. /		(Greco-Latin for "Christ-bearer").

Ferdinand Columbus, the son of Christopher, wrote in the biography of his father, The Life of the Admiral Christopher Columbus, an explanation of the meaning of his name:

So the surname of Colon which he revived was a fitting one, because in Greek it means "member," and by his proper name Christopher, men might know that he was a member of Christ, by Whom he was sent for the salvation of those people.

And if we give his name its Latin form, which is Christophorus Colonus, we may say that just as St. Christopher is reported to have gotten that name because he carried Christ over deep waters with great danger to himself, and just as he conveyed over people whom no other could have carried, so the Admiral Christophorus Colonus, asking Christ's aid and protection in that perilous pass, crossed over with his company that the Indian nations might become dwellers in the triumphant Church of Heaven.

There is reason to believe that many souls that Satan expected to catch because they had not passed through the waters of baptism were by the Admiral made dwellers in the eternal glory of Paradise....

The Admiral was a well built man of more than average stature, the face long, the cheeks somewhat high, his body neither fat nor lean. He had an aquiline nose and light-colored eyes; his complexion too was light and tending to bright red. In his youth his hair was blonde, but when he reached the age of thirty, it all turned white.

In eating and drinking, and in adornment of his person, he was very moderate and modest. He was affable in conversation with strangers and very pleasant to the members of his household, though with a certain gravity. He was so strict in matters of religion that for fasting and saying prayers he might have been taken for a member of a religious order.

He was so great an enemy of swearing and blasphemy that I give my word I never heard him utter any other oath than "by St. Ferdinand!" and when he grew very angry with someone, his rebuke was to say "God take you!" for doing or saying that.

If he had to write anything, he always began by writing these words: IESUS cum MARIA sit nobis in via. And so fine was his hand that he might have earned his bread by that skill alone.

In his Historie de las Indias, Bartolome' de Las Casas described Christopher Columbus:

In matters of the Christian religion, without doubt he was a Catholic and of great devotion, for in everything he did and said or sought to begin, he always interposed "In the name of the Holy Trinity I will do this," or "I launch this" or "this will come to pass."

In whatever letter or other thing he wrote, he put at the head "Jesus and Mary be with us on the way," and of these writings of his in his own hand I have plenty now in my possession. His oath was sometimes "I swear by San Fernando;" when he sought to affirm something of great importance in his letters on oath, especially in writing to the Sovereigns, he said, "I swear that this is true."

He observed the fasts of the Church most faithfully, confessed and made communion often, read the canonical offices like a churchman or member of a religious order, hated blasphemy and profane swearing... seemed very grateful to God for benefits received from the divine hand, wherefore, as in the proverb, he hourly admitted that God had conferred upon him great mercies, as upon David...

He was extraordinarily zealous for the divine service; he desired and was eager for the conversion of these people, and that in every region the faith of Jesus Christ be planted and enhanced. And he was especially affected and devoted to the idea that God should deem him worthy of aiding somewhat in recovering the Holy Sepulchre...

He was a gentleman of great force of spirit, of lofty thoughts, naturally inclined (from what we may gather of his life, deeds, writings and conversation) to undertake worthy deeds and signal enterprises; patient and long-suffering (as later shall appear), and a forgiver of injuries, and wished nothing more than that those who offended against him should recognize their errors, and that the delinquents be reconciled with him; most constant and endowed with forbearance in the hardships and adversities which were always occurring and which were incredible and infinite; ever holding great confidence in divine providence.

And verily, from what I have heard from him and from my own father, who was with him when he returned to colonize Hispaniola in 1493, and from others who accompanied and served him, he held and always kept on terms of intimate fidelity and devotion to the Sovereigns.

On November 7, 1504, Columbus returned from his fourth and last voyage. Weakened in his flesh, he suffered from gout, arthritis and feverish deliriums. Just 19 days later, his heart was further saddened by the news of Queen Isabella's death. Over the next few years, Columbus occupied himself securing his house, as well as obtaining positions for his descendants.

On May 20, 1506, he took a sudden turn for the worse. He called to his bedside his brother Diego, his sons Ferdinand and Diego, and his loyal captains. Christopher Columbus, as recorded by his son Ferdinand, uttered as his last words the last words of Christ:

In manus tuas, Domine, commendo spiritum meum.
(Into your hands, Father, I commend my soul.)

Isabella I (April 22, 1451-November 26, 1504), was the Queen of Castile, who in 1481 married Ferdinand II, King of Aragon, thereby unifying Christian Spain. They successfully drove the Moors from Granada and financed Christopher Columbus' expedition to the Indies, which resulted in the discovery of America.

In her commission to Columbus, Queen Isabella recited that the purpose of the voyage was:

For the Glory of God...it is hoped that by God's assistance some of the continents and islands in the oceans will be discovered.

Queen Isabella informed the Pope of Columbus' attempt:

To bear the light of Christ west to the heathen undiscovered lands.

On February 15, 1493, near the end of his return voyage from having discovered America, Christopher Columbus sent correspondence to their Highnesses, King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella of Spain, from on board the ship Caravel anchored off the Canary Islands. He included in this correspondence a letter addressed to Luis de Sant Angel, Treasurer of Aragon and Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had helped substantially in fitting out Columbus' expedition:

Praise be to our eternal God, our Lord, who gives to all those who walk in His ways victory over all things which seem impossible; of which this is signally one, for, although others have spoken or written concerning these countries, it was all conjecture, as no one could say that he had seen them - it amounting only to this, that those who heard listened the more, and regarded the matter rather as a fable than anything else.

But our Redeemer has granted this victory to our illustrious King and Queen and their kingdoms, which have acquired great fame by an event of such high importance, in which all Christendom ought to rejoice, and which it ought to celebrate with great festivals and the offering of solemn thanks to the Holy Trinity with many sincere prayers, both for the great exaltation which may accrue to them in turning so many nations to our holy faith, and also for the temporal benefits which will bring great refreshment and gain, not only to Spain, but to all Christians.

Done on board the Caravel, off the Canary Islands, on the fifteenth day of February, Fourteen hundred and ninety-three. At your orders,

The Admiral.

Las Casas, Bartolome' de (August 1474-July 17, 1566), was called "the Apostle of the Indies," as he was one of the first Christian missionaries to minister to the Indians of Latin America. The first priest ordained in the New World, Las Casas became known for his devotion to the oppressed and enslaved natives. He wrote Apologetic History of the Indies (Apologetica Historia de las Indias), 1530, which exposed the oppression of the Indians in the forced labor "Encomienda" system and influenced Madrid to enact the New Laws, 1542, in the interest of Indian welfare. He also provided a great literary service by copying Columbus' original Journal of the First Voyage (El Libro de la Primera Navegacion) into an abstract.

In his Apologetic History of the Indies, 1530, Bartolome' de Las Casas stated:

It clearly appears that there are no races in the world, however rude, uncultivated, barbarous, gross, or almost brutal they may be, who cannot be persuaded and brought to a good order and way of life, and made domestic, mild and tractable, provided... the method that is proper and natural to men is used; that is, love and gentleness and kindness.

In the prologue of his book, Historia de las Indias, written 1550-63, translated by Rachel Phillips, Bartolome' de Las Casas stated:

The main goal of divine Providence in the discovery of these tribes and lands... is... the conversion and well-being of souls, and to this goal everything temporal must necessarily be subordinated and directed.

Criss-Cross (1475), originated from the Middle English Christ's-Cross, and earlier, 1390, from Cros-Kryst, was the mark + or X written before the alphabet. (The Greek symbol X, abbreviation of Christos, is of the same origin as X-mas for "Christmas.") Learning the "Criss-Cross Row," therefore, was the expression used for learning the alphabet. The mark stood for the phrase Christ-cross me speed ("May Christ's Cross give me success"), an invocation said before reciting the alphabet. The Criss-Cross or Christ's-Cross (X) was also a form of written oath before God used when signing one's name on a document; and in the event a person could not write, was used in place of their signature.

Michelangelo de Lodovico Buonarroti Simoni (March 6, 1475-February 18, 1564), was one of the greatest artists in history.

American Quotations.txt

The son of Lodovico de Leonardo de Buonarroti Simoni, he lived during the Italian Renaissance and was known for his portrayal of living strength and energy in his paintings, sculptures and architectural designs. In 1508, he began painting the Sistine Chapel and finished with the completion of the Last Judgment, October 31, 1541. His sculptures include: David (1501-04), Moses (1513-16), Bound Captives (1513-16) and The Pieta' (1498-99), a touching depiction of Christ in His mother's arms after He was taken down from the cross.

In his Sonnet, Michelangelo wrote:

If it be true that any beautiful thing raises the pure and just desire of man from earth to God, the eternal fount of all, such I believe my love.

I live and love in God's peculiar light.

Lord, grant that I may always desire to do more than I can accomplish.

Luther, Martin (November 10, 1483-February 18, 1546), was the leader of the Protestant Reformation in Germany, and was renowned for his enduring literary contribution of translating the Bible into the German language. He became an Augustinian friar and in 1507 was ordained. In 1510 he visited Rome, where he was shocked by the worldliness. He received his doctorate of divinity and in 1512 was appointed professor of philosophy at the University of Wittenberg, where he was promoted to the position of district vicar.

Martin Luther preached daily, and grew immensely popular through his exposition of the Holy Scriptures in the common language. After objecting to the methods Johann Tetzel employed to sell indulgences, Luther posted for debate his 95 Theses, October 31, 1517. He was fiercely attacked, especially by Johann Eck. On April 18, 1521, when the 21 year old Emperor Charles V summoned him to Diet of Worms to renounce his views, Martin Luther stated:

Here I stand; I can do no other. God help me.

Amen.

Declared an outlaw, Martin Luther was protected by Frederick III of Saxony in the Wartburg castle. There he translated the New Testament into the German language in just six months. He attempted to be a moderate, opposing the Peasant's War and resisting the more progressive elements of reformation. In 1525 he married a former nun and together they had six children.

Among his many works, Martin Luther wrote:

I am much afraid that schools will prove to be the great gates of hell unless they diligently labor in explaining the Holy Scriptures, engraving them in the hearts of youth.

I advise no one to place his child where the scriptures do not reign paramount. Every institution in which men are not increasingly occupied with the Word of God must become corrupt.

The Bible was written for men with a head upon their shoulders

If I profess with the loudest voice and clearest exposition every portion of the truth of God except precisely that little point which the world and the devil are at that moment attacking, I am not confessing Christ, however boldly I may be professing Christ.

Where the battle rages, there the loyalty of the soldier is proved and to be steady on all the battlefield besides is mere flight and disgrace if he flinches at that one point.

Where there are no Christians, or perverse and false Christians, it would be well for the authorities to allow them, like heathens, to put away their wives, and to take others, in order that they may not, with their discordant lives, have two hells, both here and there. But let them know that by their divorce they cease to be Christians, and become heathens, and are in the state of damnation.

In his life, Christ is an example, showing us how to live; in his death, he is a sacrifice, satisfying our sins; in his resurrection, a conqueror; in his ascension, a king; in his intercession, a high priest.

In 1529, Martin Luther wrote his hymn, A Mighty Fortress (Ein 'Feste Burg):

A mighty fortress is our God,
A bulwark never failing.
Our helper He amid the flood
Of mortal ills prevailing.

Martin Luther wrote in his Table Talk, 1569:

Reason is the greatest enemy that faith has: it never comes to the aid of spiritual things, but - more frequently than not - struggles against the divine Word, treating with contempt all that emanates from God.

Martin Luther remarked:

Our Lord has written the promise of the resurrection not in books alone, but in every leaf in the springtime.

Latimer, Hugh (c. 1485-October 16, 1555), was bishop of Worcester, England, during the reign of King Henry VIII. He refused to condemn Martin Luther's writings and strongly supported the Protestant Reformation. He was imprisoned for a total of seven years, after which Queen Mary I condemned him to be burned at the stake. On October 16, 1555, while Hugh Latimer and Nicholas Ridley were being brought to their place of execution at Oxford, Latimer exhorted his companion:

Play the man, Master Ridley. We shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as I trust shall never be put out.

Cortez, Hernando (1485-December 2, 1547), was the Spanish explorer who conquered Mexico. In 1504, at the age of nineteen, Cortez came to the island of Hispaniola and was given a land grant by Governor Diego Columbus, Christopher Columbus' son. After establishing himself as a wealthy hidalgo, Cortez joined Diego Velasquez in the conquest of Cuba in 1511. There he became a gentleman farmer and alcalde (town mayor). In 1518, Governor Velasquez commissioned Cortez to lead an expedition to the Yucatan in Mexico, along with Captain Pedro de Alvarado.

On February 10, 1519, before embarking for Mexico, Cortez addressed his force of approximately 500 men, supplied with sixteen horses and ten cannons:

Soldiers of Spain, we are standing upon the verge of the greatest adventure ever undertaken by so small a body of men. We now leave the known world behind us: from this time forth we plunge into a region never before trodden by men of our race or religion. The hazards of this adventure I shall not dwell upon; they are well estimated by the bravest among you.

But I speak now of the immortal glory you will bring to Spanish arms, and to yourselves, the successful accomplishment of the mission before us. The shores we shall storm are lined with teeming millions of savages, unfriendly if not openly hostile.

We have only our swords and our good right arms to protect us against their overwhelming numbers. Therefore let not childish strife or inner dissension weaken the front we must present to the enemy. If we go as united as we go courageously, we have nothing to fear, nothing to lose....

We are on a crusade. We are marching as Christians into a land of infidels. We seek not only to subdue boundless territory in the name of our Emperor Don Carlos, but to win millions of unsalvaged souls to the True Faith....

Let us therefore enter upon our labors, so auspiciously begun, and in the name of our God and our Emperor carry them joyously, confidently to a triumphant conclusion.

Shortly after landing, on July 10, 1519, Hernando Cortez sent his First Dispatch to Queen Juana and her son, Charles V, from the city he founded, named Vera Cruz (City of the True Cross). In the dispatch, he stated:

It seems most credible that our Lord God has purposefully allowed these lands to be discovered... so that Your Majesties may be fruitful and deserving in His sight by causing these barbaric tribes to be enlightened and brought to the faith by Your hand.

Cortez then ordered his ships sunk in the harbor, causing his men to realize they either had to be victorious or die. In an era of Crusades to free the Holy Land from the Turks, and his own country having just driven the last of the Moors from Granada less than thirty years prior, Cortez led his troops inland as Crusaders in a Holy cause.

At the same time the Reformation began in Europe through Martin Luther, Cortez embarked to free a nation from barbaric pagan cannibalism. His troops soon met with one horrendous sight after another: human hearts that had been cut out of living prisoners found nailed to temple walls; pyramid style temples covered with human blood; bodies of men and boys without arms or legs; human skulls stacked on poles; hundreds of thousands of human skulls regularly arranged in piles; gnawed human bones piled in houses and streets; wooden houses, built with gratings, jammed full of captives being fattened up for sacrifice; pagan priests matted with dried human blood, cover with the stench of carrion, practicing sodomy; humans sacrificed on pagan altars and then rolled down temple steps where frenzied hoards ate their bodies; devotees eating the fresh carcasses of those who were sacrificed; roasted human arms, legs and heads; warriors eating the corpses of those they slew in battle, etc.... This was a result of their religion, which believed that all the universe was one and that people were just a part of the universe. They believed that the Sun god needed human blood to live and that the Aztecs were responsible to feed him the blood he needed daily.

As the Spanish troops went from town to town, the Indian tribes were elated that they would be set free from the Aztec rule. Cortez immediately freed the captives awaiting sacrifice, broke the idols, rolling them down the temple steps, erected a cross and preached Christ unto them. Francisco Lopez de Gomara, Cortez' personal secretary and chaplain, reported one such instance in Cozumel:

So Jeronimo de Aguilar preached to them about salvation, and, either because of what he told them, or because of the beginning they had already made, they were pleased to have their idols cast down, and they even assisted at it, breaking into small pieces what they had formerly held sacred. And soon our Spaniards had left not a whole idol standing, and in each chapel they set up a Cross or the image of Our Lady, whom all the islanders worshipped with prayer and great devotion....

They begged Cortez to leave someone behind to teach them to believe in the God of the Christians; but he did not dare consent, for fear they might kill the preacher, and also because he had few priests and friars with him. And in this he did wrong, in view of their earnest request and supplications.

After defeating the Tabascan tribe, Cortez preached to them through the interpretation of Jeronimo de Aguilar, a Catholic priest who had been shipwrecked on Yucatan eight years earlier and had learned the language. As reported by Gomara:

Cortez told them of their blindness and great vanity in worshipping many gods and making sacrifices of human blood to them, and in thinking that those images, being mute and soulless, made by the Indians with their own hands, were capable of doing good or harm. He then told them of a single God, Creator of Heaven and earth and men, whom the Christians worshiped and served, and whom all men should worship and serve.

In short, after he had explained the Mysteries to them, and how the Son of God had suffered on the Cross, they accepted it and broke up their idols. Thus it was that with great reverence, before a large concourse of Indians, and with many tears on the part of the Spaniards, a Cross was erected in the temple of Potonchan, and our men first, kneeling, kissed and worshiped it, and after them the Indians.

Meeting resistance with the Cempoallan tribe, before they finally relented, one of Cortez' men suggested accommodating them for the time being. Cortez adamantly replied:

How can we ever accomplish anything worth doing for the honour of God if we do not first abolish these sacrifices made to idols?

Cortez and his men fought numerous battles against insurmountable odds. His small band repeatedly engaged victoriously against the deadly spears, arrows and ambushments of the murderous tribes. Cortez would not have been so successful if it had not been for the Indian tribes who fought along side him as he championed their cause of being free from the bloody Aztecs, who continually required quotas of prisoners to be sacrificed. In giving battle instructions to his troops, Cortez exhorted:

Sirs, let us follow our banner which bears the sign of the Holy Cross, and through it we shall conquer!

When ambassadors from Montezuma arrived bearing gifts for them, Cortez took the opportunity to preach to them through an interpreter. Bernal Diaz del Castillo, a soldier who served with Cortez, recorded the scene:

When Tendile and Pitlapi toque [ambassadors of Montezuma] saw us thus kneeling, as they were very intelligent, they asked what was the reason that we humbled ourselves before a tree cut in that particular way. As Cortez heard this remark he said to the Padre de la Merced who was present: "It is a good opportunity, father, as we have good material at hand, to explain through our interpreters matters touching our holy faith."

And then he delivered a discourse to the Caciques so fitting to the occasion that no good theologian could have bettered it.

After telling them that we were Christians and relating all matters pertaining to our holy religion, he told them that their idols were not good but evil things which would take flight at the presence of the sign of the cross, for on a similar cross the Lord of Heaven and earth and all created things suffered passion and death; that it is He whom we adore and in whom we believe, our true God, Jesus Christ, who had been willing to suffer and die in order to save the whole human race; that the third day He rose again and is now in heaven; and that by Him we shall all be judged.

Cortez said many other things very well expressed, which they would report them to their prince Montezuma. Cortez also told them that one of the objects for which our great Emperor had sent us to their country was to abolish human sacrifices and the other evil rites which they practiced.

Upon reaching Mexico city, Montezuma asked Cortez if he was the god Quetzalcoatl, who was predicted to return from the east, as a white man with a beard and blue eyes, to stamp out human sacrifice and deliver the oppressed. Cortez replied:

It was true that we came from where the sun rose, and were the vassals and servants of a great Prince called the Emperor Don Carlos, who held beneath his sway many and great princes, and that the Emperor having heard of him and what a great prince he was, had sent us to these parts to see him, and to beg them to become Christians, the same as our Emperor and all of us, so that his soul and those of all his vassals might be saved.

Montezuma was in awe of Cortez and his men, primarily because of the signs and portents that had ominously foretold Quetzalcoatl's return and the end of the Aztec empire, such as: the water of the lake around Mexico City boiling over due to volcanic eruption, the sky being lit with northern lights, comets, earthquakes, the temple of the sun god catching fire, the king's sister revived from her grave saying strange beings would enter the country and ruin it, an eerie wailing noise at night, etc... According to soldier Bernal Diaz del Castillo's account, Cortez discoursed with Montezuma further:

We told them we were Christians and worshipped one true and only God, named Jesus Christ, who suffered death and passion to save us, and we told them that a cross (when they asked why we worshipped it) was a sign of the other Cross on which our Lord God was crucified for our salvation; and that the death and passion which he suffered was for the salvation of the whole human race, which was lost, and that this our God rose on the third day and is now in heaven, and it is He who made the heavens and the earth, the sea and the sands, and created all the things that are in the world, and He sends the rain and the dew, and nothing happens in the world without His holy will.

That we believe in Him and worship Him; but that those whom they look upon as gods are not so, but are devils, which are worse, and they could see that they were evil and of little worth, for where we had set up crosses such as those his ambassadors had seen, they dared not appear before them, through fear of them, and that as time went on they would notice this...

He explained to him very clearly about creation of the world, and how we are all brothers, sons of one father and one mother who were called Adam and Eve, and how such a brother as our great Emperor, grieving for the perdition of so many souls, such as those which their idols were leading to Hell, where they burn in living flames, had sent us, so that after what he [Montezuma] had now heard he would put a stop to it and they would no longer adore these Idols or sacrifice Indian men and women to them, for we were all brethren, nor should they commit sodomy or thefts.

He also told them that, in the course of time, our Lord and King would send some men among us who lead very holy lives, much better than we do, who will explain to them all about it, for at present we merely came to give them due warning. And so he prayed him to do what he was asked and carry it into effect.

After that, Montezuma showed Cortez and his men their temples. There was a theatre made of human skulls and mortar, wherein Gonzalo de Umbria counted 136,000 skulls, which included those in the steps and on poles. A tower was made of skulls too numerous to count. There were obsidian knives, stone altars, black-robed priests with hair matted down with human blood, idols with basins for human blood, walls and steps covered with human blood and gore, an idol made out of seeds kneaded and ground with the blood of virgins and babies, pits where the human bodies were thrown after people had eaten off the arms and legs, etc....

Bernal Díaz del Castillo recorded Cortez' comments to Montezuma after viewing all the horrible sights:

Our Captain said to Montezuma through our interpreter, half laughing: "Señor Montezuma, I do not understand how such a great Prince and wise man as you are has not come to the conclusion, in your mind, that these idols of yours are not gods, but evil things that are called devils, and so that you may know it and all your priests may see it clearly, do me the favour to approve of my placing a cross here on the top of this tower."

Soon after, Cortez placed Montezuma under house arrest in his own palace, destroyed the pagan idols and caused a great uproar in the city. Montezuma, who had developed a friendship with Cortez, tried to quell the rage, only to be pelted with rocks by his own people. Deeply depressed and feeling a seemingly providential loss of control over his empire and his life, Montezuma died soon after. Bernal Diaz del Castillo recalled the Spaniards response:

Cortez wept for him, and all of us Captains and soldiers, and there was no man among us who knew him and was intimate with him, who did not bemoan him as though he were our father, and it is not to be wondered at, considering how good he was.

Cortez then fought his way out of the city with a miraculous fight, although with great loss to his ranks. He then battled overwhelming thousands of Aztecs in fighting his way back to the coast. After several months of recovery, Cortez decided to mount a last final attack on Mexico City.

On December 26, 1520, Cortez addressed his force of 540 soldiers and 40 cavalry, who were armed with eighty crossbows and nine muskets, saying:

My brothers, I give many thanks to Jesus Christ to see you now cured of your wounds and free from sickness. I am glad to find you armed and eager to return to Mexico to avenge the deaths of your comrades and recover that great city. This, I trust in God, we shall soon do, because we have with us Tlaxcala and many other provinces, and because you are who you are, and the enemies the same as they have been, and we shall do so for the Christian Faith that we proclaim...

The principal reason for our coming to these parts is to glorify and preach the Faith of Jesus Christ....

We cast down their idols, put a stop to their sacrificing and eating of men, and began to convert the Indians during the few days we were in Mexico.

It is not fitting that we abandon all that good that we began, rather, we should go wherever our Faith and the sins of our enemies call us.

They, indeed, deserve a great whipping and punishment, because, if you remember, the people of the city, not satisfied with killing an infinite number of men, women, and children in sacrifices to their gods (devils, rather), eat them afterward, a cruel thing, abhorrent to God and punished by Him, and one which all good men, especially Christians, abominate, forbid, and chastise.

Moreover, without penalty or shame, they commit that accursed sin because of which five cities, along with Sodom, were burned and destroyed.

Well, then, what greater or better reward could one desire here on earth than to uproot these evils and plant the Faith among such cruel men, by proclaiming the Holy Gospel?

Let us go, then, and serve God, honor our nation, magnify our King, and enrich ourselves, for the conquest of Mexico is all these things. Tomorrow, with the help of God, we shall begin.

In 1521, Hernando Cortez and his men conquered Mexico City and ended the Aztec empire. Inscribed on his coat of arms was the Latin phrase:

Judicium Domini apprehendit eos, et fortitudo ejus corroboravit brachium meum. (The judgement of the Lord overtook them; His might strengthened my arm.)

Pare', Ambroise (1510-December 20, 1590), was a pioneer French surgeon, who greatly raised the standard of surgery. Rising to fame as a field surgeon in the French army, he discarded the common practice of cauterization, (using hot irons and boiling oils in the sealing of wounds), in favor of cleansing wounds with ointments and performing ligatures, surgically tying off major arteries. Ambroise Pare' was so successful that he was appointed to the court and served four different kings.

The favorite saying of Ambroise Pare' was:

I treated him, God cured him.

Knox, John (c. 1514-November 24, 1572), was the leader of the Protestant Reformation in Scotland. He was active in the English Reformation until he fled from Queen Mary I in 1554. He went to Geneva, became a follower of John Calvin, and in 1559 he returned to Scotland. In 1560, when Protestantism became the state religion, John Knox grew in political influence and opposed Mary Queen of Scots. His written works include: First Blast of the Trumpets Against the Monstrous Regiment of Women (1556-58) and the Book of Common Order, which regulated Scottish worship.

John Knox stated:

A man with God is always in the majority.

William I (April 24, 1533-July 10, 1584), known as William the Silent, was the founder of Dutch independence. He became Prince of Orange (1544) and ruler of Holland, Zeeland and Utrecht (1599). He had served Charles V, King of Spain, as Commander of the troops in France. When Charles died, Philip II became king. Philip not only hated William, but proceeded to stamp out the Protestants in Holland. William I could not permit this persecution and turned on the king, eventually gaining freedom from Spain and forming the Dutch Republic, becoming the first stadtholder of the independent Northern Province in 1579. In 1581, Philip offered a bounty for William's death and three years later he was assassinated. William I's last words were:

My God, have mercy on my soul and on my poor people.

Elizabeth I (September 7, 1533-March 24, 1603), the Queen of England and Ireland, 1558-1603, was the last Tudor monarch. She was the daughter of Henry VIII and Anne Boleyn. After her navy, under Sir Francis Drake, destroyed the Spanish Armada in 1588, England was established as a major European power.

In 1558, in answer to the question at her Coronation as to the presence of Christ in the Sacrament, Queen Elizabeth I stated:

Christ was the Word that spake it,
He took the bread and brake it,
And what that Word did make it,
I do believe and take it.

Queen Elizabeth I asserted:

I am your Queen. I will never be by violence constrained to do anything. I thank God I am endued with such qualities that if I were turned out of the Realm in my petticoat I were able to live in any place in Christendom.

In 1601, in The Golden Speech, Queen Elizabeth stated:

Though God hath raised me high, yet this I count the glory of my crown: that I have reigned with your loves.

Regarding her epitaph, Queen Elizabeth I stated to her ladies:

I am no lover of pompous title, but only desire that my name may be recorded in a line or two, which shall briefly express my name, my virginity, the years of my reign, the reformation of religion under it, and my preservation of peace.

Raleigh, Sir Walter (c. 1552-October 29, 1618), was an English navigator, writer, courtier and colonizer. He explored the eastern seaboard of America and named it "Virginia" after the "Virgin Queen" Elizabeth I. Sir Walter Raleigh received the first colonial grant to colonize America in 1584, resulting the ill-fated Lost Colony. The charter he was granted authorized him to enact statutes for the government of the proposed colony, provided that:

They be not against the true Christian Faith....

Sir Walter Raleigh's valor in the attacks on Cadiz (1596) and the Azores (1597) gained him renown. He was later imprisoned by King James I in the Tower of London (1603-16), where he devoted himself to writing poetry and his History of the World. Though freed for two years, the king had him executed for treason in 1618.

In his Bible, found in the Gatehouse at Westminster after his death, Sir Walter Raleigh left this version of one of his earlier poems:

Even such is time, that takes in trust
Our youth, our joys, our all we have,
And pays us but with age and dust;
Who in the dark and silent grave,
When we have wandered all our ways,
Shuts up the story of our days.
And from which earth, and grave, and dust,
The Lord shall raise me up, I trust.

Bacon, Sir Francis (January 22, 1561-April 9, 1626), the Baron Verulam, Viscount St. Albans, was an English philosopher, essayist, courtier, jurist and statesman. He was Lord Keeper of the Great Seal under King James I. As Lord Chancellor of England (1618-21), he was significantly responsible for the formulation and acceptance of the scientific method, which stressed gathering data from experimentation and induction rather than through the practice of philosophical deduction promulgated by Aristotle. Sir Francis Bacon was responsible for helping to found the Royal Society of London. He wrote:

There are two books laid before us to study, to prevent our falling into error; first, the volume of Scriptures, which reveal the will of God; then the volume of the Creatures, which express His power.

There never was found, in any age of the world, either philosophy, or sect, or religion, or law, or discipline, which did so highly exalt the good of the community, and increase private and particular good as the holy Christian faith. Hence, it clearly appears that it was one and the same God that gave the Christian law to men, who gave the laws of nature to the creatures.

Regarding science, Sir Francis Bacon described it as:

A rich storehouse for the glory of the Creator and the relief of man's estate.

In his work, The Advancement of Learning, book II, Sir Francis Bacon expressed:

But men must know that in this theater of man's life it is reserved only for God and the angels to be lookers on.

All good moral philosophy is but the handmaid to religion.

In his treatise entitled, Of Atheism, Sir Francis Bacon declared:

A little philosophy inclineth man's mind to atheism, but depth in philosophy bringeth men's minds about to religion.

Sir Francis Bacon, as recorded in the Literary and Religious Works of Francis Bacon, Volume II, stated:

I believe that the Word of God, whereby His will is revealed, continued in revelation and tradition with Moses; and that the Scriptures were from Moses' time to the time of the Apostles and Evangelists; in whose ages, after the coming of the Holy Ghost, the teacher of all truth, the book of Scripture was shut and closed, so as to receive no new addition, and the Church hath no power after the Scriptures to teach or command anything contrary to the written word.

I believe that Jesus, the Lord, became in the flesh a sacrificer and a sacrifice for sin; a satisfaction and price paid to the justice of God; a meriter of Glory and the Kingdom; a pattern of all righteousness; a preacher of the Word, which Himself was; a finisher of the ceremonies; a cornerstone to remove the separation between Jew and Gentile; an intercessor for the Church; a Lord of nature in his miracles; a conqueror of death and the power of darkness in His resurrection; and that He fulfilled the whole counsel of God; performing all His sacred offices, and anointing on earth, accomplishing the whole work of the redemption and restitution of man to a state superior to the angels, whereas the state of man by creation was inferior; and reconciled and established all things according to the eternal will of the Father.

Lord Bacon stated:

The reason why religion is universally and justly represented as essential to the prosperity of states, is not less obvious than the act. The object of government is to enforce among individuals the observance of the moral law, and states are prosperous in proportion as this object is attained. But the only effectual sanction to this law is the Christian religion. Hence a government which neglects the care of religion is guilty of the folly of promulgating laws unaccompanied with any adequate sanction of requiring the community to obey without presenting to their minds the motives that generally induce to a prompt and cheerful obedience. Under these circumstances, the only resource left to the public authorities is mere physical force; and experience has abundantly shown that this is wholly ineffectual, excepting as an aid and supplement, in particular cases, to the moral influences, which alone can be depended on for the preservation of the tranquillity and good order of society. There are persons, and even parties, who, at the very moment when the use of physical force as an engine of government is discredited and abandoned, seem to be laboring with a sort of frantic energy to destroy the influence of all the moral motives that can be substituted for it, - more especially religion. I have said, and I repeat, that if while we abandon the use of physical force as an engine of maintaining order we should also discard the only valuable and effectual moral influence, and leave the individual to the undirected guidance of his own selfish passions, our institutions will be found to be impracticable, and society will fall into a state of dissolution.

In 1626, Sir Francis Bacon wrote in his Last Will and Testament:

I bequeath my soul to God... My body to be buried obscurely. For my name and memory, I leave it to men's charitable speeches, and to foreign nations, and the next age.

Galilei, Galileo (February 15, 1564-January 8, 1642), was an Italian mathematical physicist and astronomer who conceived of the idea for the isochronous pendulum, the sector-compass and developed the concept of mathematical laws governing the universe. He made the first practical use of the telescope, through which he observed sunspots; the phases of Venus; and discovered the four bright satellites of Jupiter. The first mathematician at the University of Pisa, Galileo discovered the Law of Falling Bodies and provided an alternative to Aristotelian dynamics. His work gave credence to Nicolaus Copernicus' heliocentric theory, where the sun is the center of the solar system, in place of Ptolemy's geocentric theory, which had placed the earth at the center.

Galileo Galilei stated:

I am inclined to think that the authority of Holy Scripture is intended to convince men of those truths which are necessary for their salvation, which, being far above man's understanding, can not be made credible by any learning, or any other means than revelation by the Holy Spirit.

In reference to the Bible, Galileo pronounced:

As to the (physical) propositions which are stated but not rigorously demonstrated, anything contrary to the Bible involved in them must be considered undoubtedly false and should be proved so by every possible means.

In a letter, Galileo wrote:

I send you a rose, which ought to please you extremely, seeing what a rarity it is at this season. And with the rose you must accept its thorns, which represent the bitter suffering of our Lord, while the green leaves represent the hope we may entertain, that through the same sacred passion we, having passed through the darkness of this short winter of our mortal life, may attain to the brightness and felicity of an eternal spring in Heaven.

Shakespeare, William (christened April 26, 1564-April 23, 1616), was an English playwright, poet and actor manager, whose works have had an enduring worldwide impact. He was born and educated at Stratford-upon-Avon in Warwickshire, the son of a prosperous glover. He married Ann Hathaway in 1582, and together they had three children. Moving to London c. 1589, he established himself as an actor and playwright. In 1594 he began working with Lord Chamberlain's Men, and in 1598 became a shareholding director in the Globe Theatre. During the plague of 1592-94, which caused a temporary closure of the theatre, he wrote the sonnets, Venus and Adonis and The Rape of Lucrece. In 1603, with the accession of King James I, the company became the King's Men, and bought the Blackfriars Theatre. Due to wise investments, Shakespeare was able to retire in 1610 and continued writing until 1613. Among the 37 plays that bear his name, the most popular include: Hamlet; Julius Caesar; Richard III; Macbeth; Othello; Henry IV; and A Midsummer Night's Dream.

In 1591, Shakespeare introduced his play, King Henry the Sixth, in which he wrote in Part II, act II, scene i, line 34:

Blessed are the peacemakers on earth.

In line 66, he wrote:

Now, God be praised, that to the believing souls
Gives light in darkness, comfort in despair!

In scene iii, line 55, he exclaimed:

God defend the right!

In Part III, act V, scene v, line 7, he penned:

So part we sadly in this troublous world
To meet with joy in sweet Jerusalem.

William Shakespeare wrote in King Richard the Third, 1592-93, act I, scene iv:

O, I have passed a miserable night,
So full of ugly sights, of ghastly dreams,
That, as I am a Christian faithful man,
I would not spend another such a night,
Though 'twere to but a world of happy days.

Before I be convict by course of law,
To threaten me with death is most unlawful.
I charge you, as you hope for any goodness,
By Christ's dear blood shed for our grievous sins
That you depart and lay no hands on me.

In King Richard the Second, 1595-96, act IV, scene i, line 97, Shakespeare wrote:

Many a time hath banished Norfolk fought
For Jesus Christ in glorious Christian field, Streaming the ensign of the Christian Cross,
And there at Venice, gave
His body to that pleasant country's earth,
And his pure soul unto his captain Christ,
Under whose colors he had fought so long.

In line 170, Shakespeare wrote:

So Judas did to Christ: but he, in twelve,
Found truth in all but one; I, in twelve thousand, none.
God save the king! Will no man say, amen?

In line 239, he wrote:

Some of you with Pilate wash your hands,
Showing an outward piety.

In the play, The Merchant of Venice, act I, scene ii, line 59, Shakespeare penned:

man.
God made him, and therefore let him pass for a

In scene iii, line 99, he wrote:

Mark you this, Bassanio:
The devil can cite Scripture for his own purpose.
An evil soul, producing holy witness,
Is like a villain with a smiling cheek,
A goodly apple rotten at the heart.

In act IV, scene i, line 184, he wrote:

The quality of mercy is not strained,
It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven
Upon the place beneath: it is twice blessed;
It blessed him that gives and him that takes:
Tis mightiest in the mightiest; it becomes
The throned monarch better than his crown;
His scepter shows the force of temporal power,
The attribute to awe and majesty,
Wherein doth sit the dread and fear of kings,
But mercy is above this sceptered sway,
It is enthroned in the hearts of kings,
It is an attribute to God himself,
And earthly power doth then show likest God's When mercy seasons justice. Therefore...
Though justice be thy plea, consider this,
That in the course of justice, none of us
Should see salvation: we do pray for mercy,
And that same prayer doth teach us all to render
The deeds of mercy.

In his play, King Henry the Fourth, Part I, act i, scene 1, line 18, published in 1598, Shakespeare wrote:

Therefore friends,
As far as to the sepulchre of Christ,
Whose soldier now, under whose blessed cross
We are impressed and engaged to fight...
To chase these pagans in those holy fields,
Over whose acres walk'd those blessed feet,
Which fourteen hundred years ago were nail'd
For our advantage on the bitter cross.

In King Henry the Fifth, 1598-1600, act III, scene vi, line
181, William Shakespeare wrote:

We are in God's hand.

In act IV, scene i, line 309, he wrote:

O God of battles! steel my soldiers' hearts;
Possess them not with fear; take from them now
The sense of reckoning, if the opposed numbers
Pluck their hearts from them.

In Hamlet, 1600-01, act I, scene I, Shakespeare wrote:

Some say - that ever 'gainst that season comes Wherein our Saviour's birth is celebrated
The bird of dawning singeth all night long.

In act III, scene i, line 150, he wrote:

I have heard of your paintings too, well enough;
God has given you one face, and you make yourselves another.

In scene iv, line 149, he wrote:

Confess yourself to heaven;
Repent what's past; avoid what is to come.

In act V, scene i, line 84, he wrote:

A politician...one that would circumvent God.

William Shakespeare wrote in Othello, 1604-05, act I, scene i, line 108:

You are one of those that will not serve God if the devil bid you.

In act II, scene iii, line 106, he wrote:

Well, God's above all; and there be souls must be saved, and there be souls must not be saved.

In line 293, he wrote:

O God! that men should put an enemy in their mouths to steal away their brains; that we should, with joy, pleasance, revel, and applause, transform ourselves into beasts.

William Shakespeare wrote in King Henry the Eighth, 1613, act III, scene ii, line 456:

Had I but served my God with half the zeal
I served my king, he would not in mine age
Have left me naked to mine enemies.

In act V, scene v, line 51, he wrote:

Whenever the bright sun of heaven shall shine,
His honor and the greatness of his name
Shall be, and make new nations.

William Shakespeare remarked:

God's goodness hath been great to thee;
Let never day nor night unhallowed pass,
But still remember what the Lord hath done.

In his last Will, dated the year of his death, 1616, the first clause reads:

In the name of God, Amen! I, William Shakespeare, of Stratford-upon-Avon, in the county of Warr., gent., in perfect health and memory, God be praised, do make and ordain this my last will and testament in manner and form following, that is to say, first, I commend my soul into the hands of God, my Creator, hoping and assuredly believing, through the only merits of Jesus Christ, my Saviour, to be made partaker of life everlasting, and my body to the earth whereof it is made.

Carved on William Shakespeare's Tombstone are the lines:

Good Friend For Jesus Sake Forbear,
To Digg The Dust Enclosed Heare.
Blese Be Ye Man Spares Thes Stones,
And Curst Be He Moves My Bones.

St. Johns River Settlement, Florida (June 30, 1564), was established by Rene de Laudonniere, who led a group of French Huguenots (Protestants from France) to colonize and build Fort Caroline near present-day Jacksonville, Florida. Rene de Laudonniere recorded:

We sang a psalm of Thanksgiving unto God, beseeching Him that it would please Him to continue His accustomed goodness towards us.

Quiros, Pedro Fernandez de (1565-1615) was a Spanish explorer. In 1606, he sailed the Pacific Ocean, from Callao, Peru as far as the New Hebrides. In search of a reported southland, he landed on an island, planted a large cross and read the proclamation from which Australia got its name:

I, Captain Pedro Fernandez de Quiros...hoist this emblem of the Holy Cross on which His person was crucified and whereon He gave His life for the ransom and remedy of all the human race...On this Day of Pentecost, 14 May 1606...I take possession of all this part of the South as far as the pole in the name of Jesus...From now on, shall be called the Southern Land of the Holy Ghost [La Terra Australia del Espiritu Santo]...to the end that to all the natives, in all the said lands, the holy and sacred evangel may be preached zealously and openly.

Brewster, William (1567-April 1644), was a founder of the Plymouth Colony in New England. He helped lead the Separatist movement in England, 1606, allowing the nonconformists to meet for worship at his home in Scrooby, England. He escaped religious persecution by fleeing with the Separatists to Holland, 1608. There he taught at the University of Leyden, Holland, and published religious books which were banned in England. Sailing with the Pilgrims on the Mayflower, he signed of the Mayflower Compact, 1620. Elected a ruling elder of the Plymouth Colony, he performed a major role in the civil and religious affairs of the colony.

Governor William Bradford gave account of William Brewster's influence on the Separatist movement from its early beginnings:

Mr. Brewster went and lived in the country...till the Lord revealed Himself further to him. In the end, the tyranny of the bishops against godly preachers and people, in silencing the former and persecuting the latter, caused him and many more to look further into things, and to realize the unlawfulness of their episcopal callings, and to feel the burden of their many antichristian corruptions, which both he and they endeavoured to throw off...

After they had joined themselves together in communion, as was mentioned earlier, he was a special help and support to them. On the Lord's day they generally met at his house, which was a manor of the bishop's, and he entertained them with great kindness when they came, providing for them at heavy expense to himself. He was the leader of those who were captured at Boston in Lincolnshire, suffering the greatest loss, and was one of the seven who were kept longest in prison and afterwards bound over to the assizes.

After he came to Holland he suffered much hardship, having spent most of his means... Towards the latter part of those twelve years spent in Holland, his circumstances improved... for through his knowledge of Latin he was able to teach many foreign students English. By his method they acquired it quickly and with great fluency, for he drew up rules to learn it by, after the manner of teaching Latin; and many gentlemen, both Danes and Germans, came to him, some of the beings sons of distinguished men...

He labored in the fields as long as he was able; yet when the church had no other minister he taught twice every Sabbath, and that both powerfully and profitably, to the great edification and comfort of his hearers, many being brought to God by his ministry.

In 1608, after the agreement to separate from the church of England, the Separatists of the Scrooby congregation covenanted together to form a church:

They shook off the yoke of antichristian bondage, and as ye Lord's free people, joynd themselves (by a covenant of the Lord) into a church estate, in ye fellowship of ye Gospel, to walke in all his wayes, made known or to be made known unto them, according to their best endeavours, whatsoever it should cost them, the Lord assisting them.

On December 15, 1617, William Brewster and the congregation's pastor, John Robinson, wrote a letter from Leyden, Holland, to Sir Edwin Sandys, a London financier, in which they explained the Separatists' situation and plans:

Knit together as a body in most strict and sacred bond and covenant of the Lord, of the violation whereof we make great conscience, and by virtue whereof we so hold ourselves straitly tied to all care of each other's good, and of the whole by everyone and so mutually.

In 1629, when a church was founded at Salem in the Massachusetts Bay Colony, William Brewster made this comment:

The church that had been brought over the ocean now saw another church, the first-born in America, holding the same faith in the same simplicity of self-government under Christ alone.

In 1644, Governor William Bradford wrote of the death of Mr. William Brewster:

American Quotations.txt

About the 18th of April died their reverend elder, my dear and loving friend, Mr. William Brewster, a man who had done and suffered much for the Lord Jesus and the gospel's sake, and had borne his part in the weal or woe with this poor persecuted church for over thirty-five years in England, Holland, and this wilderness, and had done the Lord and them faithful service in his calling. Notwithstanding the many troubles and sorrows he passed through, the Lord upheld him to a great age.

Kepler, Johannes (December 27, 1571-November 15, 1630), was the German founder of physical astronomy. He discovered the laws governing planetary motion and pioneered the discipline of celestial mechanics, known as Kepler's Laws, which aided Newton in his formulation of the theory of gravitation. He advanced Copernicus' heliocentric theory of the solar system, with the planets revolving around the sun instead of the earth. His publishing of the ephemeris tables, necessary for plotting star movement, contributed to the theory of calculus.

In regard to his invaluable scientific discoveries, Johannes Kepler declared:

O, Almighty God, I am thinking Thy thoughts after Thee! Nothing holds me! I will indulge in my sacred fury, I will triumph over mankind by the proud confession that I have stolen the golden vases to build up a tabernacle for my God, far away from the confines of Egypt. If you forgive me, I rejoice; if you be angry, I can bear it. The die is cast; the book is written, to be read either now or by posterity, I care not which. It may be well to wait a century for a reader, as God has waited six thousand years for an observer.

In the conclusion of his treatise, Harmony of Worlds, Johannes Kepler wrote:

I thank Thee, my Creator and Lord, that Thou hast given me this joy in Thy creation, this delight in the works of Thy hands; I have shown the excellency of Thy works unto man, so far as my finite mind was able to comprehend Thine infinity; if I have said aught of Thy glory, graciously forgive it.

In Homage to the Book, Johannes Kepler stated:

We astronomers say, with the common people, the planets stand still or go down; the sun rises or sets. How much less should we require than the Scriptures of Divine inspiration, setting aside the common mode of speech, should shape their words according to the model of the natural scientist, and, by employing a dark and inappropriate phraseology about things which surpass the comprehension of those whom it designs to instruct, perplex the people of God, and thus obstruct its own way towards the attainment of the far more exalted object at which it aims.

Donne, John (1572-March 31, 1631), was one of England's greatest poets. He was the chaplain to King James I, 1615, and dean of St.

Paul's, London. Educated at Oxford and Cambridge, his works have inspired many writers. With imagery being drawn from Scholastic philosophy and 17th-century scientific thought, his most famous works include: Songs and Sonnets; Holy Sonnets; and Sermons and Devotions. Ernest Hemingway's novel, For Whom the Bell Tolls, 1940, was inspired by John Donne's line in Devotions upon Emergent Occasions, 1624, "...send not to know for whom the bell tolls: it tolls for thee."

John Donne wrote:

No man is an island, entire of itself; every man is a piece of the continent, a part of the main; if a clod be washed away by the sea, Europe is the less, as well as if a promontory were, as well as if a manor of thy friends or of thine own were; any man's death diminishes me, because I am involved in mankind; and therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee.

John Donne wrote in his Holy Sonnets, No. 14:

Batter my heart, three-personed God; for you
As yet but knock, breathe, shine, and seek to mend.

In his sermon before the Earl of Carlisle, delivered in the autumn of 1622, John Donne admonished:

What gnashing is not a comfort, what gnawing of the worm is not a tickling, what torment is not a marriage bed to this damnation, to be secluded eternally, eternally, eternally from the sight of God?

On Christmas day, 1625, John Donne declared:

Now God comes to thee, not as in the dawning of the day, not as in the bud of the spring, but as the sun at noon to illustrate all shadows, as the sheaves in harvest, to fill all penuries, all occasions invite his mercies, and all times are his seasons.

On December 12, 1626, at the funeral of Sir William Cokayne, John Donne proclaimed:

I throw myself down in my chamber, and I call in and invite God and his angels thither, and when they are there, I neglect God and his angels, for the noise of a fly, for the rattling of a coach, for the whining of a door.

Pory, John (1572-September 1635), was an author, geographer and the Secretary of State for the Virginia Colony, being appointed by the London Council. He arrived in Virginia on April 19, 1619, and served as member of the Governor's council. On July 30, 1619, when the first legislative assembly in the new world met at Jamestown, John Pory was elected as its Speaker. In the summer of 1622, he left aboard the Discovery and visited Plymouth. The ship was driven off course and wrecked on the Azores Islands. He was captured by the Spaniards and almost hanged, but was able to be released and returned to England.

On July 30, 1619, after opening the first legislative assembly with prayer, the House of Burgesses chose John Pory as their speaker. He recorded:

But, forasmuch as men's affairs do little prosper when God's service is neglected, all the Burgesses took their places in the Quire till prayer was said by Mr. Bucke, the Minister, that it would please God to guide and sanctify all our proceedings to His own glory, and the good of this plantation. Prayer being ended, to the intent that as we had begun at God Almighty so we might proceed awful and due respect toward his Lieutenant...

Be it enacted by this present Assembly that for laying a surer foundation for the conversion of the Indians to Christian religion, each town, city, borough, and particular plantation do obtain unto themselves, by just means, a certain number of the natives' children to be educated by them in true religion and a civil course of life; of which children the mostly toward boys in wit and graces of nature to be brought up by them in the first elements of literature, so as to be fitted for the college intended for them; that from thence they may be sent to that work of conversion...

All ministers shall duly read divine service and exercise their ministerial function according to the ecclesiastical laws and orders of the Church of England, and every Sunday in the afternoon shall catechize such as are not yet ripe to come to the communion.

And whosoever of them shall be found negligent or faulty in this kind shall be subjected to the censure of the governor and Council of Estate.

Robinson, John (c. 1575-March 1, 1625), was the pastor of the Pilgrim fathers in England and Holland, before their departure to America. He wrote several tracts on the Separatist movement, for which he was persecuted. He had fled with the Separatists, or Nonconformists, to Amsterdam in 1608, then to Leiden, Holland in 1609. His congregation grew to 300 members, and he wrote many works, including: A Justification of Separation from the Church of England, 1610; Of Religious Communion, Public and Private, 1614; and On the Lawfulness of Hearing Ministers in the Church of England, 1634. He actively encouraged the Pilgrims to voyage to America.

On July 22, 1620, while on board the Speedwell, Pastor John Robinson gave this final word to the Pilgrims just prior to their departure from Delft Haven, Holland, for England, and then for the New World:

Lastly, whereas you are become a body politic, using amongst yourselves civil government, let your wisdom and godliness appear not only in choosing such persons as do entirely love and will promote the common good, but also in yielding unto them all due honor and obedience in their lawful administrations; not beholding in them the ordinarieness of their persons, but God's ordinance for your good...

Someone or few must needs be appointed over the assembly... discussing and determining of all matters, so in this royal assembly, the church of Christ, though all be Kings, yet some most faithful and most able, are to be set over the rest...wherein...they are...charged to minister according to the Testament of Christ.

For I am very confident the Lord hath more truth and light yet to break forth out of His Holy Word.

In his Leyden letter, John Robinson stated:

Thus this holy army of saints is marshalled here on earth by these officers, under the conduct of their glorious Emperor, Christ. Thus it marches in this most heavenly order and gracious array, against all enemies, both bodily and ghostly: peaceable in itself, as Jerusalem, terrible to the enemy as an army with banners, triumphing over their tyranny with patience, their cruelty with meekness, and over death itself with dying. Thus, through the Blood of that spotless Lamb, and that Word of their testimony, they are more than conquerors, bruising the head of the Serpent; yea, through the power of His Word, they have power to cast down Satan like lightning; to tread upon serpents and scorpions; to cast down strongholds, and everything that exalteth itself against God.

The gates of hell, and all the principalities and powers on earth shall not prevail against it. Romans 12; I Corinthians 12; Revelation 14: 1, 2; Song 6: 3; Revelation 12: 11; Luke 10: 18, 19; 2 Corinthians 10: 15; Matthew 16: 18, Romans 8: 38, 39.

Bulkeley, Peter (January 31, 1583-March 9, 1659), was the Puritan leader who established the city of Concord, Massachusetts, 1636. In his only publication, The Gospel Covenant; or the Covenant of Grace Opened, published in London, 1646; 1651, Peter Bulkeley stated:

We are as a city set upon a hill, in the open view of all the earth...We profess ourselves to be a people in covenant with God, and therefore...the Lord our God...will cry shame upon us if we walk contrary to the covenant which we have promised to walk in. If we open the mouths of men against our profession, by reason of the scandalousness of our lives, we (of all men) shall have the greater sin.

Let us study so to walk that this may be our excellency and dignity among the nations of the world among which we live; that they may be constrained to say of us, only this people is wise, and a holy and blessed people; that all that see us may see and know that the name of the Lord is called upon us; and that we are the seed which the Lord hath blessed. (Deut. 28: 10; Isa. 61: 9)

Grotius, Hugo (April 10, 1583-August 28, 1645), was a Dutch jurist, theologian and statesman, who was considered the founder of the science of International Law. In 1607, being 24 years old, he was appointed Advocate General for the provinces of Holland and Zealand. In 1613, at the age of 30, he became the Chief Magistrate of Rotterdam. In 1619, Prince Maurice of Nassau sentenced him to life imprisonment for his support of the Arminian faith. Three years later, with his wife's help, he escaped to France hidden in a linen chest. Hugo Grotius (or Huig de Groot in the Dutch language), published De Jure Belli et Pacis (On the Law of War and Peace), in 1625, which was a study of the laws of mankind in reference to individuals, nations and states. From 1635 till his death he served as the Swedish ambassador to France. President James Madison described him as:

The father of the modern code of nations.

In his work, On the Law of War and Peace, Hugo Grotius stated:

Among all good men one principle at any rate is established beyond controversy, that if the authorities issue any order that is contrary to the law of nature or to the commandments of God, the order should not be carried out. For when the Apostles said that obedience should be rendered to God rather than men, they appealed to an infallible rule of action, which is written in the hearts of all men.

If it were not permitted to punish certain Criminals with Death, nor to defend the Subject by Arms against Highwaymen and Pyrates, there would of Necessity follow a terrible Inundation of Crimes, and a Deluge of Evils, since even now that Tribunals are erected, it is very difficult to restrain the Boldness of profligate Persons.

Wherefore if it had been the Design of CHRIST to have introduced a new Kind of Regulation, as was never heard of before, he would certainly have declared in most distinct and plain Words, that none should pronounce Sentence of Death against a Malefactor, or carry Arms in Defence of one's Country.

Especially, however, Christian kings and states are bound to pursue this method of avoiding wars... Both for this and for other reasons it would be advantageous to hold certain conferences of Christian powers, where those who have no interest at stake may settle the disputes of others, and where, in fact, steps may be taken to compel parties to accept peace on fair terms.

Hugo Grotius stated:

He knows not how to rule a kingdome, that cannot manage a Province; nor can he wield a Province, that cannot order a City; nor he order a City, that knows not how to regulate a Village; nor he a Village, that cannot guide a Family; nor can that man Govern well a Family that knows not how to Govern himsel fe; nei ther can any Govern himsel fe unless reason be Lord, Will and Appetite her Vassals: nor can Reason rule unlesse hersel fe be ruled by God, and (wholy) be obedient to Him.

In the closing remarks of The Rights of War and Peace, Grotius wrote:

May God, who alone hath the power, inscribe these teachings on the hearts of those who hold sway over the Christian world. may He grant to them a mind possessing knowledge of divine and human law, and having ever before it the reflection that it hath been chosen as a servant for the rule of man, the living thing most dear to God.

In his Commentary on the Law of Prize and Booty, Hugo Grotius stated:

Whatever God has shown to be his will that is Law.

In his second work, The Truth of the Christian Religion, Hugo Grotius wrote:

There is no reason for Christians to doubt the credibility of these Books (of the Bible), because there are testimonies in our books out of almost every one of them, the same as they are found in the Hebrew.

Nor did Christ, when He reproved many things in the teachings of the Law, and in the Pharisees of His time, ever accuse them of falsifying the Books of Moses and the Prophets, or of using supposititious or altered books.

And it can never be proved, or made credible, that after Christ's time the Scripture should be corrupted in anything of moment, if we consider how far and wide the Jewish nation, who everywhere kept these Books, was dispersed over the whole world.

The design of the second book (after having put up our petitions to Christ the King of Heaven, that he would afford us such assistances of His Holy Spirit, as may render us sufficient for so great a business) is... to show that the Christian religion is most true and certain.

Cotton, John (December 1585-December 23, 1652), was a powerful Puritan minister and scholar in Boston, Massachusetts. Born in England, he fled to the colonies in 1632 to avoid religious persecution. There he rose to become perhaps the most influential leader in shaping the destiny of Puritan New England, serving at the First Church of Boston, 1633-52. Known for his didactic writings, the principles stated in his sermons were frequently put into immediate practice by civil authorities.

In 1636, Rev. John Cotton gave the outline for a code of laws, which included the phrase:

The Law of Nature, delivered by God.

He ended his work with the Scripture reference, Isaiah 33: 22:

The Lord is our Judge.
The Lord is our Law-giver.
The Lord is our King, He will save us.

In reflection on the human tendency to be corrupted by power, Rev. John Cotton stated:

Let all the world learn to give mortall men no greater power than they are content they shall use, for use it they will: and unless they be better taught of God, they will use it ever and anon....

For whatever transcendent power is given, will certainly over-run those that give it, and those that receive it: there is a straine in a mans heart that will sometime or other runne out to excesse, unlesse the Lord restraine it, but it is not good to venture it: It is necessary therefore, that all power that is on earth be limited, Church-power or other...

It is counted a matter of danger to the State to limit Prerogatives; but it is a further danger, not to have them limited: They will be like a Tempest, if they be not limited: A Prince himselve cannot tell where hee will confine himselve, nor can the people tell....

It is therefore fit for every man to be studious of the bounds which the Lord hath set: and for the People, in whom fundamentally all power lyes, to give as much power as God in his word gives to men:

And it is meet that Magistrates in the commonwealth, and so Officers in Churches should desire to know the utmost bounds of their own power, and it is safe for both:

All intrenchment upon the bounds which God hath not given, they are not enlargements, but burdens and snares: They will certainly lead the spirit of a man out of his way sooner or later.

It is wholesome and safe to be dealt withall as God deales with the vast Sea; Hitherto shalt thou come, but there shalt thou stay thy proud waves: and therefore if they be but banks of simple sand, they will be good enough to check the vast roaring Sea.

John Cotton declared:

What He hath planted, He will maintain. Every plantation His right hand hath not planted shall be rooted up, but His own plantation shall prosper and flourish.

When He promiseth peace and safety, what enemies shall be able to make the promise of God of none effect? Neglect not wall and bulwarks and fortifications for your own defense, but ever let the name of the Lord be your strong tower, and the word of His promise, the rock of your refuge.

His word that made heaven and earth will not fail, till heaven and earth be no more....

If God make a covenant to be a God to thee and thine, then it is thy part to see to it that thy children and servants be God's people.

As the Massachusetts Bay Colony grew, churches were built and towns sprang up around them. Inevitably, though, some would leave off going to church altogether, as John Cotton remarked:

But when men thus depart, God usually... them with such restless agitations that they are driven to repent of their former rashness, and many times return to the church from which they had broken away.

Hooker, Thomas (July 7, 1586-July 7, 1647), was the founder of Hartford, Connecticut in 1636. A Cambridge University graduate, Thomas Hooker was persecuted in England after having gotten involved with the Christian movement known as the Puritans.

Exiled from England for his religious beliefs, he fled first to Holland, then to Massachusetts (1633), where he became the minister at the Cambridge (formerly New-Town) settlement. Disputes with the Massachusetts leadership drove him and his congregation to Connecticut (1635-36). In 1638, he stated to the Connecticut General Assembly that he believed people had a God-given right to choose their magistrates. He was a principal organizer of the New England colonies into the defensive confederation, known as the United Colonies of New England, 1643. In 1648, he wrote A Survey of the Summe of Church Discipline.

An influential leader, Thomas Hooker's sermon before the General Court of Connecticut put forth such unprecedented democratic principles, that it inspired the writing of the Fundamental Constitutions of Connecticut, 1639. This constitution inspired ideas of individual rights, such as: "due process of law," "trial by a jury of peers," "no taxation without representation" and prohibitions against "cruel and unusual punishment." It later became a model for all other constitutions in the colonies, including the United States Constitution.

Thomas Hooker explained:

Mutual covenanting and confederating of the saints in the fellowship of the faith according to the order of the Gospel, is that which gives constitution and being to a visible church... Mutual subjection is the sinews of society, by which it is sustained and supported.

In 1638, Rev. Thomas Hooker accentuated:

The choice of public magistrates belongs unto the people, by God's allowance... (T)he privilege of election, which belongs to the people, therefore must not be exercised according to their humours, but according to the blessed will and law of God.

Winthrop, John (January 22, 1588-April 5, 1649), was the founder of the Massachusetts Bay Colony (1630), being elected 12 times consecutively as its governor. In England, he was a member of the gentry, having been raised on the 500 acre estate his father had bought from Henry VIII. He had become a successful lawyer and strong Puritan leader. Oliver Cromwell pleaded with him to join the revolution against King Charles I, but he declined. He decided to flee for religious freedom, leading the English "Great Migration" to Salem in 1630. His journal, The History of New England, is a significant historical document. His son (1606-1676) and grandson (1638-1707), both named John Winthrop, were also governors of Connecticut.

On May 15, 1629, in a letter to his wife, John Winthrop wrote:

Be of good comfort; the hardest that can come shall be a means to mortify this body of corruption, which is a thousand times more dangerous to us than any outward tribulation, and to bring us into nearer communion with our Lord Jesus Christ, and more assurance of His kingdom.

In June of 1630, ten years after the Pilgrims founded the Plymouth Colony, Governor John Winthrop founded the Holy Commonwealth of Massachusetts with 700 people sailing in eleven ships. This began the Great Migration, which saw more than twenty thousand Puritans embark for New England in the pursuing sixteen years.

On June 11, 1630, aboard the Arbella, John Winthrop authored his work, A Model of Christian Charity, which became a guideline for future constitutional covenants of the Colonies:

It is of the nature and essence of every society to be knit together by some covenant, either expressed or implied....

This love among Christians is a real thing, not imaginary...as absolutely necessary to the being of the Body of Christ, as the sinews and other ligaments of a natural body are to the being of that body....

For the persons, we are a Company, professing ourselves fellow members of Christ, we ought to account ourselves knit together by this bond of love....For the work we have in hand, it is by a mutual consent through a special overruling Providence, and a more than an ordinary approbation of the Churches of Christ to seek out a place of Cohabitation and Consortship under a due form of Government both civil and ecclesiastical.

Therefore we must not content ourselves with usual ordinary means. Whatsoever we did or ought to have done when we lived in England, the same we must do, and more also where we go....Neither must we think that the Lord will bear such failings at our hands as He doth from those among whom we have lived....

Thus stands the cause between God and us: we are entered into covenant with Him for this work. We have taken out a Commission; the Lord hath given us leave to draw our own articles....

If the Lord shall please to hear us, and bring us in peace to the place we desire, then hath He ratified this Covenant and sealed our Commission, will expect a strict performance of the Articles...the Lord will surely break out in wrath against us.

Now the only way to avoid this shipwreck and to provide for our posterity, is to follow the counsel of Micah, to do justly, to love mercy, to walk humbly with our God. For this end, we must be knit together in this work as one man. We must hold a familiar commerce together in each other in all meekness, gentleness, patience, and liberality.

We must delight in each other, make one another's condition our own, rejoice together, mourn together, labor and suffer together, always having before our eyes our Commission and Community in this work, as members of the same body. So shall we keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace....

We shall find that the God of Israel is among us, when ten of us shall be able to resist a thousand of our enemies, when He shall make us a praise and glory, that men of succeeding plantations shall say, "The Lord make it like that of New England."

For we must Consider that we shall be as a City upon a Hill, the eyes of all people are upon us; so that if we shall deal falsely with our God in this work we have undertaken and so cause him to withdraw his present help from us, we shall be made a story and a by-word through the world, we shall open the mouths of enemies to speak evil of the ways of God and all professors for God's sake; we shall shame the faces of many of God's worthy servants, and cause their prayers to be turned into curses upon us till we be consumed out of the good land whether we are going.

In his private journal, Governor John Winthrop wrote:

I will ever walk humbly before my God, and meekly, mildly, and gently towards all men...to give myself - my life, my wits, my health, my wealth - to the service of my God and Saviour.

Teach me, O Lord, to put my trust in Thee, then shall I be like Mount Zion that cannot be moved...Before the week was gone...I waxed exceeding discontent and impatient...then I acknowledged my unfaithfulness and pride of heart, and turned again to my God, and humbled my soul before Him, and He returned and accepted me, and so I renewed my Covenant of walking with my God.

The covenant between you and us is the oath you have taken of us, which is to this purpose, that we shall govern you and judge your causes by the rules of God's laws...

On May 19, 1643, John Winthrop organized the New England Confederation among the Colonists of New Plymouth, New Haven, Massachusetts and Connecticut. They covenanted together under the Constitution of the New England Confederation:

Whereas we all came to these parts of America with the same end and aim, namely, to advance the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to enjoy the liberties of the Gospel thereof with purities and peace, and for preserving and propagating the truth and liberties of the gospel.

In 1645, John Winthrop defined the duties of elected officials:

The great questions that have troubled the country are about the authority of the magistrates and the liberty of the people.

It is yourselves who have called us to this office, and, being called by you, we have our authority from God, in way of ordinance, such as hath the image of God eminently stamped upon it; the contempt and violation whereof hath been vindicated with examples of divine vengeance.

Bradford, William (March 1590-May 9, 1657), was a Pilgrim leader who helped establish the Plymouth Colony. Sailing in the Mayflower, he was chosen as governor of the colony in 1621, and was reelected 30 times until his death. In 1650, William Bradford wrote a history of Plymouth Plantation, which is comparable to Shakespeare's works in literary and historical significance. In it, he traced the events which led to the Pilgrims' departure from England:

It is well knowne unto ye godly and judicious how since ye first breaking out of ye lighte of ye gospel in our Honourable Nation of England, (which was ye first of nations whom ye Lord adorned ther with, after the grosse darkness... which had covered and overspread ye Christian world), what warrs and opposissions ever since, Satan, hath raised, maintained, and continued against the Saints, from time to time, in one sort or other.

Some times by bloody death and cruell torments; other whiles imprisonments, banishments, and other hard usages; as being loath his kingdom should goe downe, and trueth prevaile, and ye churches of God reverte to their anciente puritie and recover their primative order, libertie, and bewtie.

But when he could not prevaile by these means againste the maine trueths of ye gospell, but that they began to take rooting in many places, being watered by ye blood of ye martires, and blessed from heaven with a gracious encrease; he then begane to take him to his anciente strategeme used of old against the first Christians.

That when by ye bloody and barbarous persecutions of ye heathen Emperours, he could not stop and subvert the course of ye gospell, but that it speedily overspred with a wonderfull celeritie the then best known parts... ye professours themselves, (working upon their pride and ambition, with other corrupte passions incident to all mortall men, yea to ye saints themselves in some measure), by which woefull effects followed; as not only bitter contentions, and hartburnings, schismes, with other horrible confusions, but Satan tooke occasion and advantage therby to foyst in a number of vile...cannons and decrees, which have since been as snares to many poore and peacable souls even to this day.

So as in ye anciente times, the persecutions by ye heathen and their Emperours, was not greater than of the Christians one against another.

In 1607, as a result of religious persecution upon their persons, reputations, families, and livelihood, the "Separatists," or Pilgrims, departed from England for Holland. Governor Bradford recorded:

Being thus constrained to leave their native soyle and countrie, their lands and livings, and all their friends and famillier acquaintance... to goe into a countrie they knew not (but by hearsay) where they must learne a new language, and get their livings they knew not how, it being a dear place, and subject to the miseries of war, it was by many thought an adventure almost desperate, a case intolerable, and a miserie worse than death....

But these things did not dismay them (though they did sometimes trouble them) for their desires were sett on ye ways of God and to enjoye His ordinances; but they rested in His providence, and knew whom they had believed.

Governor William Bradford stated:

They shook off this yoke of anti christian bondage, and as the Lord's free people, joined themselves by a covenant of the Lord into a church estate in the fellowship of the gospel, to walk in all His ways, made known unto them, according to their best endeavours, whatsoever it should cost them, the Lord assisting them.

On December 15, 1617, in their letter to Sir Edwin Sandys in London, John Robinson and William Brewster explained that the Pilgrims were:

Knit together as a body in a most strict and sacred bond and covenant of the Lord, of the violation whereof we make great conscience, and by virtue whereof we do hold ourselves straitly tied to all care of each other's good, and of the whole by every one and so mutually.

In 1618, the Pilgrims' Church of Leyden, Holland, sent seven Articles to the Counsel of England in order to receive approval to settle in Virginia:

Article III. The King's Majesty we acknowledge for Supreme Governor in his Dominion...but in all things obedience is due unto him if the thing commanded be not against God's Word....

Article VII. And lastly, we desire to give unto all Superiors due honor to preserve the unity of the Spirit, with all who fear God, to have peace with all men what in us lieth, and wherein we err to be instructed by any.

In July 1620, after having lived in Holland for 12 years, Governor William Bradford described the Pilgrims' departure from Leyden, Holland, to Delfes-Haven, Holland, and from there to Southampton, England, where they would board the ship bound for America. Little did they realize that out of the 103 Pilgrims who departed, 51 would die in the first winter in the New World:

So being ready to departe, they had a day of solleme humiliation, their pastor taking his texte from Ezra 8:21: "And ther at ye river, by Ahava, I proclaimed a fast, that we might humble ourselves before our God and seeke of Him a right way for us, and for our Children, and for our substance."

...The rest of the time was spent in powering out prairs to ye Lord with greate fervencie, mixed with abundance of tears. And ye time being come that they must departe, they were accompanied with most of their brethren out of ye citie, unto a towne sundrie miles off called Delfes-Haven, wher the ship lay ready to receive them. So they left ye goodly and pleasant citie, which had been ther resting place for near 12 years; but they knew they were pilgrimes (Hebrews 12), but lift their eyes to ye heavens, their dearest cuntrie, and quieted their spirits.

On September 6, 1620, after two attempts which were canceled due to the ship, the Speedwell, developing a leak, the Pilgrims finally set out for America in the Mayflower, just as the stormy season began in the North Atlantic. On November 11, 1620, having been blown off course by violent winds from their intended destination of Virginia, the Pilgrims landed at Cape Cod, Massachusetts. They found the area deserted, as the Patuxet tribe which lived there, one of the fiercest Indian tribes on the New England coast, had been destroyed by a great plague just two years prior. Had the Pilgrims landed there earlier, they would most likely have been massacred as the survivors of a French vessel were in 1617, as recounted by Governor William Bradford:

About three years before, a French ship was wrecked at Cape Cod, but the men got ashore and saved their lives and a large part of their provisions. When the Indians heard of it, they surrounded them and never left watching and dogging them till they got the advantage and killed them, all but three or four, whom they kept, and sent from one Sachem to another, making sport with them and using them worse than slaves.

On November 11, 1620, before setting foot on dry land, Governor William Bradford and the leaders on the Mayflower signed the Mayflower Compact, the first constitutional document of America:

In ye name of God, Amen. We whose names are underwritten, the loyall subjects of our dread soveraigne Lord, King James, by ye grace of God, of Great Britaine, France, & Ireland king, defender of ye faith, etc., having undertaken, for ye glorie of God, and advancemente of ye Christian faith, and honour of our king & countrie, a voyage to plant ye first colonie in ye Northerne parts of Virginia, doe by these presents solemnly & mutually in ye presence of God, and one of another, covenant & combine our selves together into a civill body politick, for our better ordering & preservation & furtherance of ye ends aforesaid; and by vertue hearof to enacte, constitute, and frame such just & equall lawes, ordinances, acts, constitutions & offices, from time to time, as shall be thought most meete & convenient for ye generall good of ye Colonie, unto which we promise all due submission and obedi ence.

In witnes wherof we have hereunder subscribed our names at Cap-Codd ye 11. of November, in ye year of ye raigne of our soveraigne Lord, King James, of England, France, & Ireland ye eighteenth, and by Scotland ye fiftie fourth. Ano: Dom. 1620.

On November 12, 1620, the first full day in the New World, Governor William Bradford described the Pilgrims' thankfulness:

Being thus arrived in a good harbor, and brought safe to land, they fell upon their knees and blessed the God of Heaven who had brought them over the vast and furious ocean, and delivered them from all the perils and miseries thereof, again to set their feet on the firm and stable earth, their proper element.

Governor William Bradford stated:

What could now sustaine them but ye spirite of God and His grace? May not and ought not the children of these fathers rightly say: Our fathers were Englishmen which came over this great ocean, and were ready to perish in this wilderness; (Deuteronomy 26: 5, 7) but they cried unto ye Lord, and He heard their voyce, and looked on their adversitie, etc.

Let them therefore praise ye Lord, because He is good, and His mercies endure for ever. (107 Psalm: v. 1, 2, 4, 5, 8) Yea let them which have been redeemed of ye Lord, show how He hath delivered them from ye hand of ye oppressour.

When they wandered in ye deserte wilderness out of ye way, and found no citie to dwell in, both hungrie, and thirstie, their sowle was overwhelmed in them. Let them confess before ye Lord His loving kindness, and His wonderful works before ye sons of men.

In March of 1621, as recorded in Governor Bradford's Of Plymouth Plantation, Squanto joined the Pilgrims:

About the 16th of March, a certain Indian came boldly amongst them and spoke to them in broken English... His name was Samoset. He told them also of another Indian whose name was Squanto, a native of this place, who had been in England and could speak better English than himself....

Massasoyt, who about four or five days after, came with the chief of his friends and other attendants, and with Squanto. With him, after friendly entertainment and some gifts, they made a peace which has now continued for twenty-four years....

Squanto stayed with them and was their interpreter and was a special instrument sent of God for their good beyond their expectation. He showed them how to plant corn, where to take fish and other commodities, and guided them to unknown places, and never left them till he died.

He was a native of these parts, and had been one of the few survivors of the plague hereabouts. He was carried away with others by one Hunt, a captain of a ship, who intended to sell them for slaves in Spain; but he got away for England, and was received by a merchant in London, and employed in Newfoundland and other parts, and lastly brought into these parts by a Captain Dermer, a gentleman employed by Sir Ferdinand Gorges....

Captain Dermer had been here the same year that the people of the Mayflower arrived, as appears in an account written by him, and given to me by a friend, bearing date, June 30th, 1620... "I will first begin," says he, "with the place from which Squanto (or Tisquantem) was taken away, which in Captain Smith's map is called 'Plymouth'; and I would that Plymouth (England) had the same commodities. I could wish that the first plantation might be situated here, if there came to the number of fifty persons or upward; otherwise at Charlton, because there the savages are less to be feared... The Pokanokets, who live to the west of Plymouth, bear an inveterate hatred to the English... For this reason Squanto cannot deny but they would have killed me when I was at Namasket, had he not interceded hard for me."

Governor William Bradford stated concerning Squanto:

The settlers, as many as were able, then began to plant their corn, in which service Squanto stood them in good stead, showing them how to plant it and cultivate it. He also told them that unless they got fish to manure this exhausted old soil, it would come to nothing, and he showed them that in the middle of April plenty of fish would come up the brook by which they had begun to build, and taught them how to catch it, and where to get other necessary provisions; all of which they found true by experience....

Another Indian, called Hobbamok came to live with them, a fine strong man, of some account amongst the Indians for his valor and qualities. He remained very faithful to the English till he died. He and Squanto having gone upon business among the Indians, a Sachem called Corbitant... began to quarrel with them, and threatened to stab Hobbamok; but he being a strong man, cleared himself of him, and came running away, all sweating, and told the Governor what had befallen him, and that he feared they had killed Squanto.... So it was resolved to send the Captain and fourteen men, well armed.... The Captain, giving orders to let none escape, entered to search for him. But [Corbitant] had gone away that day; so they missed him, but learned that Squanto was alive, and that Corbitant had only threatened to kill him, and made as if to stab him, but did not....

After this, on the 18th of September, they sent out their shallop with ten men and Squanto as guide and interpreter to the Massachusetts, to explore the bay and trade with the natives, which they accomplished, and were kindly received....

Nor was there a man among them who had ever seen a beaver skin till they came out, and were instructed by Squanto.

In 1621, in his Thanksgiving Proclamation, Governor William Bradford stated:

Therefore, I, William Bradford (by the Grace of God today, and the franchise of this good people), governor of Plymouth, say - through virtue of vested power - ye shall gather with one accord, and hold in the month of November, thanksgiving unto the Lord.

In September of 1622, Governor William Bradford wrote the account of Squanto's death:

Captain Standish was appointed to go with them, and Squanto as a guide and interpreter, about the latter end of September; but the winds drove them in; and putting out again, Captain Standish fell ill with fever, so the Governor (Bradford) went himself. But they could not get round the shoals of Cape Cod, for flats and breakers, and Squanto could not direct them better. The Captain of the boat dare not venture any further, so they put into Manamoick Bay, and got what they could there. Here Squanto fell ill of Indian fever, bleeding much at the nose, - which the Indians take for a symptom of death, - and within a few days he died. He begged the Governor to pray for him, that he might go to the Englishmen's God in Heaven, and bequeathed several of his things to some of his English friends, as remembrances. His death was a great loss.

On November 29, 1623, three years after the Pilgrims' arrival and two years after the first Thanksgiving, Governor William Bradford made an official proclamation for a Day of Thanksgiving:

To all ye Pilgrims:

In as much as the great Father has given us this year an abundant harvest of Indian corn, wheat, peas, beans, squashes, and garden vegetable, and has made the forests to abound with game and the sea with fish and clams, and inasmuch as he has protected us from the ravages of the savages, has spared us from pestilence and disease, has granted us freedom to worship God according to the dictates of our own conscience;

now I, your magistrate, do proclaim that all ye Pilgrims, with your wives and ye little ones, do gather at ye meeting house, on ye hill, between the hours of 9 and 12 in the day time, on Thursday, November ye 29th, of the year of our Lord one thousand six hundred and twenty-three, and the third year since ye Pilgrims landed on ye Pilgrim Rock, there to listen to ye pastor and render thanksgiving to ye Almighty God for all His blessings. William Bradford, Ye Governor of Ye Colony.

In 1644, Governor William Bradford wrote of the death of Mr. William Brewster (1567-1644), who was one of the founders of the Separatist movement in England, 1606. Brewster had allowed the nonconformists to meet for worship at his home in Scrooby, England. He had escaped with the Separatists to Holland, 1608, to be free from religious persecution and taught at the University of Leyden, Holland. William Brewster, who had published religious books which were banned in England, signed of the Mayflower Compact, 1620, and was one of the founders of the Plymouth Colony:

About the 18th of April died their reverend elder, my dear and loving friend, Mr. William Brewster, a man who had done and suffered much for the Lord Jesus and the gospel's sake, and had borne his part in the weal or woe with this poor persecuted church for over thirty-five years in England, Holland, and this wilderness, and had done the Lord and them faithful service in his calling. Notwithstanding the many troubles and sorrows he passed through, the Lord upheld him to a great age.

In 1650, Governor William Bradford stated in Of Plymouth Plantation :

Last and not least, they cherished a great hope and inward zeal of laying good foundations, or at least making some ways toward it, for the propagation and advance of the gospel of the kingdom of Christ in the remote parts of the world, even though they should be but stepping stones to others in the performance of so great a work.

Thus out of small beginnings greater things have been produced by His hand that made all things of nothing, and gives being to all things that are; and, as one small candle may light a thousand, so the light here kindled hath shone unto many, yea in some sort to our whole nation; let the glorious name of Jehovah have all the praise.

It was answered that all great and honourable actions are accompanied with great difficulties, and must be enterprised and overcome with answerable courages. It was granted that the dangers were great, but not desperate, and the difficulties were many but not invincible... and all of them, through the help of God, by fortitude and patience, might either be borne or overcome....

Their ends were good and honorable, their calling lawful and urgent, and therefore they might expect the blessing of God in their proceeding; yea, though they should lose their lives in this action, yet they might have comfort in the same, and there endeavors would be honorable.

Though I am growne aged, yet I have had a longing desire, to see with my own eyes, something of the most ancient language, and holy tongue, in which the Law, and oracles of God were writ; and in which God, and angels, spoke to the holy patriarchs, of old time; and what names were given to things, from the creation.

And though I cannot attaine to much herein, yet I am refreshed, to have seen some glimpse hereof; (as Moses say the Land of Canaan afarr off) my aime and desire is, to see how the words, and phrases lye in the holy texte; and to dicerne somewhat of the same for my owne contente.

At Burial Hill, Plymouth, Massachusetts, Governor William Bradford's grave is inscribed:

Under this stone rests the ashes of William Bradford, a zealous Puritan, and sincere Christian Governor of Plymouth Colony from 1621 to 1657, aged 69, except 5 years, which he declined. "Let the right hand of the Lord awake." [Hebrew] "What our fathers with so much difficulty attained do not basely relinquish." [Latin]

Pocahontas (c. 1595-March 1617), was the daughter of the North American Indian Chief Powhatan. In 1607, she befriended the English settlers of the Jamestown Colony. Captain John Smith recorded her intervention which prevented her father from executing him. In 1613, the Indian Princess was baptized into the Christian faith, taking the name Rebekah, by the Reverend Richard Bucke, second chaplain to the Virginia Colony. In 1614, she married John Rolfe, the council member of the Jamestown Settlement noted for having introduced tobacco cultivation in 1612. John Rolfe, a widower ten years her senior, asked the Jamestown officials for permission to marry her:

Pokanhuntas to whom my hartie and best thoughts are, and have for a long time been so intangled, and inthralled in so intricate a laborinth...

John and Pocahontas moved to England, where she was received as royalty. They had a son named Thomas, (whose descendants include statesmen, educators and ministers, the most notable being John Randolph of Roanoke and Edith Bolling Galt, who married President Woodrow Wilson in 1915). In 1617, Pocahontas contracted smallpox in England and died. His last words were:

Tis enough that the child liveth.

The original painting of Pocahontas is in the National Portrait Gallery of the Smithsonian Institution. The inscription painted on the portrait reads:

Matoaks ats Rebecka, daughter to the mighty Prince Powhatan Emperour of Attanoughkonmouck ats Virginia converted and baptized in the Christian faith, and wife to the wor. Mr. Tho: Rolff.

Winslow, Edward (October 18, 1595-May 8, 1655), was a Pilgrim leader and founder of the Plymouth Colony. Selected as an administrator of the colony, 1621, he served as its English agent from 1629 to 1632. Edward Winslow was Governor of the Plymouth Colony for three separate terms, 1633-34, 1636-37, and 1644-45. He succeeded in developing a friendship with the Indian chief, Massasoit. In October 1646, he returned to England as the agent of Massachusetts Bay, and later served Oliver Cromwell in the English Civil War. His work, Glorious Progress of the Gospel Amongst the Indians in New England, 1646, was instrumental in the formation of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in New England.

Edward Winslow who kept detailed records of the Pilgrims' experiences, recounted:

Drought and the like considerations moved not only every good man privately to enter into examination with his own estate between God and his conscience, and so to humiliation before Him, but also to humble ourselves together before the Lord by fasting and prayer.

Johnson, Edward (September 1598-April 23, 1672), the founder of Woburn, Massachusetts, was a contemporary of Massachusetts Governor John Winthrop. He became a trader, author, historian, and in 1654, witnessed the founding of the Puritan Church in the New World. Edward Johnson reported this event in his history entitled Wonder-Working Providences of Si on's Saviour in New England:

Although the number of faithful people of Christ were but few, yet their longing desire to gather into a church was very great. . . .

Having fasted and prayed with humble acknowledgment of their own unworthiness to be called of Christ to so worthy a work, they joined together in a holy Covenant with the Lord and with one another, promising by the Lord's assistance to walk together in exhorting, admonishing and rebuking one another, and to cleave to the Lord with a full purpose of heart.

First, it is their judgment, and that from Scripture taught them, that those who are chosen to a place in government, must be men truly fearing God, wise and learned in the truths of Christ. . . .

Neither will any Christian of a sound judgment vote for any, but those who earnestly contend for the faith.

Cromwell, Oliver (April 25, 1599-September 3, 1658), was the Lord-Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland and Ireland from 1653-58. He was offered the title of King of England by the Parliament, but declined. A strong supporter of religious freedom, he had at one time considered emigrating to the Puritan Colony in America.

A minor landowner, he rose to leadership in Parliament during the early days of the English Civil War. He formed and was commander of the "Ironsides" cavalry regiment, renown as the most powerful and best drilled regiment in England. Largely responsible for the victory at Marston Moor, 1644, he became lieutenant general of the New Model Army. His troops were victorious at Naseby and Langport in 1645. Cromwell chose soldiers for their religious enthusiasm as well as for their military forcefulness, and never lost a battle.

Oliver Cromwell initially desired to negotiate with Charles I, but became infuriated at the king's untrustworthiness, later insisting on the king's trial and execution. As lord lieutenant of Ireland, he led a campaign there in 1649, and as captain general and commander-in-chief he defeated the Scots at Dunbar in 1650. He dissolved the Rump Parliament in 1653, and was offered the crown and title of King of England in 1657, but refused. His son Richard, who became lord protector of England after Oliver's death, was deposed in 1659 by a military coup, and in 1660 the monarchy was restored with Charles II taking the throne.

The persecuted Christian movement known as the Society of Friends, or Quakers, grew rapidly in England during Cromwell's rule; even William Penn, founder of Pennsylvania, became a Quaker. George Fox, founder of the Society of Friends, befriended Cromwell. When the Puritan movement within the Anglican Church split into the Presbyterian and Independent, Cromwell became an Independent.

On August 3, 1650, in his Letter to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, Oliver Cromwell wrote:

I beseech you, in the bowels of Christ, think it possible you may be mistaken.

On September 12, 1654, in a message to Parliament, Cromwell asserted:

Necessity hath no law. Feigned necessities, imaginary necessities...are the greatest cozenage that men can put upon the Providence of God, and make pretenses to break rules by.

Oliver Cromwell prayed:

Lord, though wretched and miserable, I am in covenant with Thee through grace, and I will come unto Thee for my people...

Make the name of Christ glorious in the world. Teach those who look too much on Thy instruments to depend on Thysel f more. Pardon such as desire to trample on the dust of a poor worm, for they are Thine too, and pardon the folly of this short prayer, for Jesus Christ, His Sake.

Rutherford, Samuel (c.1600-March 1661), was Rector of St. Andrew's Church in Scotland and one of the commissioners at Westminster Assembly in London, 1643-47. In 1644, he wrote the controversial book, Lex, Rex or, The Law and the Prince, which challenged the "divine right of kings." Instead of the king being God's appointed regent whose word is law, Rutherford stated that all men, even the king, were under the law and not above it. He reasoned that even though rulers derived their authority from God, Romans 13:1-4, they received their authority through the people.

Samuel Rutherford cited the following biblical passages in support:

II Samuel 16:18, "Hushai said to Absalom, Nay, but whom the Lord and the people, and all the men of Israel choose, his will I be, and with him will I abide"; Judges 8:22, "The men of Israel said to Gideon, Rule thou over us"; Judges 9:6, "The men of Shechem made Abimelech king"; II Kings 14:21, "The people made Azariah king"; I Samuel 12:1, II Chronicles 23:3.

This book brought immediate opposition, being banned in Scotland and publicly burned in England. Rutherford was placed under house arrest and summoned to trial before the Parliament in Edinburgh. He died before the orders could be carried out. In his book, Lex, Rex, Samuel Rutherford introduced the phrase:

All men are created equal.

Samuel Rutherford's last words were:

Glory, Glory dwelleth in Emmanuel's Land.

Williams, Roger (1603-1683), was a British-born clergyman who founded the Providence Plantation in Rhode Island. A graduate from Pembroke, 1624, he was ordained in the Church of England, 1628. An enthusiastic Puritan minister, his sermons in favor of religious liberty caused him to be persecuted. In 1630, he fled to the Massachusetts Bay Colony where he pastored in Plymouth, 1632-33, and in Salem, 1634. There his criticism of the state church led to a sentence of being sent back to England, 1635. He escaped and lived among the Indians, befriending them and learning their language.

In 1636, he founded the town of Providence on the land which the Narragansett Indians gave him. This was the first place ever where the freedom to worship God was separated from the control of the state. In 1639, he organized the first Baptist Church in the new world, with one of the principal foundations being that the state could not interfere with or restrict the free and open worship of God according to the Bible. He sailed to England to obtain a patent for Rhode Island, 1643, and served as the colony's first President, 1654-57.

In one of his messages, Roger Williams wrote:

When they have opened a gap in the hedge or wall of separation between the garden of the church and the wilderness of the world, God hath ever broken down the wall itself, removed the candlestick, and made His garden a wilderness, as at this day. And that therefore if He will ever please to restore His garden and paradise again, it must of necessity be walled in peculiarly unto Himself from the world.

On January 9, 1872, Senator Henry Bowen Anthony delivered a Eulogy of Roger Williams in Congress:

He knew, for God, whose prophet he was, revealed it to him, that the great principles for which he contended, and for which he suffered, founded in the eternal fitness of things, would endure forever.

He did not inquire if his name would survive a generation. In his vision of the future he saw mankind emancipated from... the blindness of bigotry, from the cruelties of intolerance. He saw the nations walking forth into the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free.

Tasman, Abel Janszoon (1603-c.1659) was the greatest of Dutch navigators and explorers. He discovered Tasmania, New Zealand, Tonga, and the Fiji Islands. He set sail from Batavia on August 14, 1642 with the instructions:

Destined for the discovery and exploration of the unknown Southland.... What numberless multitudes of blind heathen have by the same been introduced to the blessed light of the Christian religion.... [and] invaluable treasures and profitable trade connections... the blessing of the Ruler of all things.... endow with manly courage in the execution of the intended discovery, and may grant a safe return.

At the beginning of the voyage, Commander Abel Janszoon Tasman wrote in his journal:

May God Almighty vouchsafe His blessing on this work.

Upon his safe return to Batavia, Commander Tasman entered in his journal:

God be praised and thanked for this happy voyage.

Eliot, John (1604-May 21, 1690), was a Puritan clergyman who was known as "The Apostle to the Indians," as he was the first to teach Christianity to the Indians of New England. Born in England, he graduated from Cambridge and traveled to Boston, 1631, to serve as a teacher and pastor. A young Indian who had converted from paganism to Christianity helped Eliot learn the various Indian dialects. John Eliot was responsible for having written the first Indian translation of the Bible and the first Indian grammar book. In addition, he established 3,600 Indians into over a dozen self-governing communities. The unfortunate incident of King Philip's War destroyed most of these.

In 1633, John Eliot wrote a letter to Sir Simonds D'Ewes in England seeking sponsorship for a college in the New World:

I earnestly desire that God will move your heart for the sake of the commonwealth, and also for the sake of learning (which I know you love and will be ready to further; indeed, we want a store of men to further that, for if we do not nourish learning, both the church and the commonwealth will sink)...

God has bestowed upon you a bountiful blessing, and if you should please to employ one mite of that great wealth which God has given, to erect a school of learning - a college - among us, you would be doing a glorious work, acceptable to God and man....

In 1640, John Eliot, with the assistance of Richard Mather and Thomas Welch, printed the very first book in New England. Using the first printing press in the American colonies, located in Cambridge, Massachusetts, this volume became the approved hymnal of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Known as the Bay Psalm Book, it was entitled:

THE WHOLE BOOKE OF PSALMES faithfully TRANSLATED into ENGLISH Metre, Whereunto is prefixed a discourse declaring not only the lawfulness, but also the necessity of the heavenly Ordinances of singing Scripture Psalmes in the Churches of God.

In his work, The Christian Commonwealth: or, The Civil Policy of the Rising Kingdom of Jesus Christ, 1659, which was a draft of a plan of government for the Natick Indian community, John Eliot stated:

That which the Lord now calleth England to attend is not to search humane Politie and Platformes of Government, contrived by the wisdom of man; but as the Lord hath carried on their works for them, so they ought to go unto the Lord and enquire at the Word of his mouth, what Platforme of Government he hath therein commanded; and humble themselves to embrace that as the best, how mean soever it may seem to Humane Wisdom.

There is undoubtedly a forme of Civil Government instituted by God himself in the Holy Scriptures; whereby any Nation may enjoy all the ends and effects of Government in the best manner, were they but persuaded to make trial of it. We should derogate from the sufficiency and perfection of the Scriptures, if we should deny it.

The Scripture is able thoroughly to furnish the man of God (whether Magistrate in the Commonwealth, or elder in the Church, or any other) unto every good work....

Written Word of God is the perfect System or Frame of Laws, to guide all the Moral actions of man, either towards God or man.

Virginia, First Charter of (April 10, 1606), was granted by King James I to the settlers of the "Jamestown Colony" in Virginia. The Colony was named for the "Virgin Queen" Elizabeth I by Sir Walter Raleigh, who had explored the area and attempted to found a settlement on Roanoke Island, April 9, 1585. On August 13, 1587, the members of the colony converted the Indian Manteo, who was baptized into the Christian faith. That same month the first child was born in America, baptized with the name Virginia Dare. The Roanoke Colony was unsuccessful and became known as the "Lost Colony."

On April 10, 1606, the First Charter of Virginia stated:

We, greatly commending and graciously accepting of their Desires for the Furtherance of so noble a Work, which may, by the Providence of Almighty God, hereafter tend to the Glory of His Divine Majesty, in propagating of Christian Religion to such People, as yet live in Darkness and miserable Ignorance of the true Knowledge and Worship of God, and may in time bring the Infidels and Savages, living in those Parts, to human Civility, and to a settled and quiet Government.

Virginia, Colony of (May 14, 1607), the first permanent settlement in North America, was founded by settlers who embarked from England in December of 1606. Their initial act after landing at Cape Henry, April 26, 1607, was to erect a wooden cross and commence a prayer meeting, led by the Reverend Robert Hunt. Later that year, after Reverend Hunt's death, the settlers stated:

1607. To the glory of God and in memory of the Reverend Robert Hunt, Presbyter, appointed by the Church of England. Minister of the Colony which established the English Church and English Civilization at Jamestown, Virginia, in 1607.

His people, members of the Colony, left this testimony concerning him. He was an honest, religious and courageous Divine.

He preferred the Service of God in so good a voyage to every thought of ease at home. He endured every privation, yet none ever heard him repine. During his life our factions were ofte healed, and our greatest extremities so comforted that they seemed easy in comparison with what we endured after his memorable death.

We all received from him the Holy Communion together, as a pledge of reconciliation, for we all loved him for his exceeding goodness. He planted the first Protestant Church in America and laid down his life in the foundation of America.

Harvard, John (November 1607-September 14, 1638), was the first benefactor of Harvard College. Born in London, he emigrated to Massachusetts, 1637, and served as Charlestown's minister. He bequeathed his library and half of his estate for the founding of the first college in America, which was subsequently named in his honor, 1639, as recorded in the Old South Leaflets:

After God had carried us safe to New-England, and wee had builded our houses, provided necessaries for our livelihood, rear'd convenient places for God's worship, and settled the Civill Government: One of the next things we longed for, and looked after was to advance Learning and to perpetuate it to Posterity; dreading to leave an illiterate Ministry to the Churches, when our present Ministers shall lie in the Dust.

And as wee were thinking and consulting how to effect this great Work, it pleased God to stir up the heart of one Mr. Harvard, a godly gentleman and a lover of learning there living amongst us, to give the one half of his estate... towards the erecting of a college and all his Library...

Milton, John (December 9, 1608-November 8, 1674), was an English poet and political writer. His blank-verse epic, Paradise Lost, 1667, considered a masterpiece of English literature, detailed Lucifer's revolt against God and the fall in the garden of Adam and Eve. Milton aggressively defended the Puritan cause, writing: Pro Populo Anglicano, 1651; The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates, 1649; The Tetrachordon, 1645; and The Reason of Church Government, 1642, which declared that governments should exert no control over the local churches.

In his middle forties, John Milton went blind, followed by his wife dying in childbirth. He continued creating by dictating his works to his daughters, including Paradise Lost, 1667, and Paradise Regained, 1671. He expressed:

There are no songs comparable to the songs of Zion; no orations equal to those of the prophets; and no politics like those which the Scriptures teach.

In 1629, in the composition, On the Morning of Christ's Nativity, John Milton wrote:

This is the month, and this the happy morn,
Wherein the Son of Heav'n's eternal King,
Of wedded maid and virgin mother born,
Our great redemption from above did bring;
For so the holy sages once did sing,
That He our deadly forfeit should release,
And with His Father work us a perpetual peace.

In Il Penseroso, 1631, John Milton wrote:

And storied windows richly dight,
Casting a dim religious light,
There let the pealing organ blow,
To the full-voiced choir below,
In service high, and anthems clear
As may, with sweetness, through mine ear
Dissolve me into ecstasies,
And bring all Heaven before mine eyes.

In 1634, John Milton wrote in Comus:

That Power
Which erring men call chance.

In Lycidas, 1637, Milton composed:

Last came, and last did go,
The Pilot of the Galilean lake;
Two massy keys he bore of metals twain,
(The golden opes, the iron shuts amain).

In his work, Animadversions upon the Reply of Smectymnuus, 1642, John Milton wrote:

Let us all go, every true protested Briton, throughout the three kingdoms, and render thanks, to God, the Father of light, and fountain of heavenly grace, and to His Son, Christ the Lord.

In Tractate of Education, 1644, John Milton wrote:

Inflamed with the study of learning and the admiration of virtue; stirred up with high hopes of living to be brave men and worthy patriots, dear to God, and famous to all ages.

In Areopagica, 1644, considered the best of his prose works, John Milton wrote:

As good almost kill a man as kill a good book: who kills a man kills a reasonable creature, God's image; but he who destroys a good book kills reason itself.

In On the Late Massacre in Piedmont, 1655, John Milton wrote:

Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints, whose bones
Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold;
Ev'n them who kept thy truth so pure of old
When all our fathers worshipped stocks and stones

In True Religion, Heresy, Schism, Toleration, 1673, John Milton declared:

No man or angel can know how God would be worshiped and served unless God reveal it: He hath revealed and taught it us in the Holy Scriptures by inspired ministers, and in the Gospel by His own Son, and His apostles, with strictest command to reject all other traditions or additions whatever.

In Paradise Lost, written in 1667, John Milton coined the lines:

A heaven on earth.
All hell broke loose.

So vivid were his depictions in Paradise Lost, that it has become a classic which has endured the ages:

Of Man's first disobedience, and the fruit
Of that forbidden tree whose mortal taste
Brought death into the world, and all our woe,
With loss of Eden....

What in men is dark
Illumine, what is low raise and support;
That to the height of this great argument
I may assert eternal Providence,
And justify the ways of God to men....

The infernal serpent; he it was, whose guile,
Stirred up with envy and revenge, deceived
The mother of mankind....

Him the Almighty Power
Hurl'd headlong flaming from th' ethereal sky
With hideous ruin and combustion down

Virginia, Second Charter of (May 23, 1609), granted by King James I, stated:

Because the principal Effect which we can expect or desire of this Action is the Conversion and reduction of the people in those parts unto the true worship of God and the Christian Religion.

And forasmuch, as it shall be necessary for all such our Loving Subjects, as shall inhabit within the said Precincts of Virginia, aforesaid, to determine to live together, in the Fear and true Worship of Almighty God, Christian Peace, and civil Quietness, with each other, whereby every one may, with more Safety, Pleasure, and Profit, enjoy that, whereunto they shall attain with great Pain and Peril.

Hale, Sir Matthew (November 1, 1609-December 25, 1676), was Lord Chief-Justice of the King's Bench, a position of high influence in England. He testified:

There is no book like the Bible for excellent wisdom and use.

Every morning read seriously and reverently a portion of the Holy Scriptures, and acquaint yourselves with the history and doctrine thereof; it is a Book full of light and wisdom, and will make you wise unto eternal life.

Who was it that thus suffered? It was Christ
Jesus, the eternal Son of God, clothed in our flesh;
God and Man united in one person; His manhood giving Him capacity for suffering, and His Godhead giving a value to suffering; and each nature united in one person to make a complete Redeemer; the Heir of all things; the Prince of Life; the Light that lighteneth every man that cometh into the world. As touching His Divine nature, God over all, blessed forever; and as touching His human nature, full of grace and truth; and in both, the beloved Son of the eternal God, in whom He proclaimed Himself well pleased.

Mary Washington, George Washington's mother, had in her possession Sir Matthew Hale's Meditations Moral and Divine, published in London, 1679. The chapter which she had especially marked and studied, was entitled, "The Great Audit With the Account of the Good Steward":

The Great Lord of the World hath placed the Children of Men in this Earth as his Stewards; and according to the Parable in Matthew 25, He delivers to every person his Talents, a Stock of Advantages or opportunities: to some he commits more, to some less, to all some....

That in that due and regular employment, each man might be in some measure serviceable and advantageous to another. That although the great Lord of this Family, can receive no Advantage by the Service of His Creature, because he is Perfect and All-sufficient in himself; yet he receives Glory and Praise by it, and a Complacency in the beholding a Conformity in the Creature, to his own most Perfect Will....

Lord, before I enter into Account with thy Majesty, I must confess, that if thou shouldst enter into Judgement with me, and demand that Account which in Justice thou mayst require of me, I should be found thy Debtor: I confess I have not improved my Talents according to that measure of ability that thou has lent me: I therefore most humbly offer unto thee the redundant Merit of thy own Son to supply my defects, and to make good what is wanting in my account: yet according to thy command, I do humbly render my Discharge of the Trust thou has committed to me, as followeth.

Rich, Richard (fl. 1610), was an Englishman who traveled to Virginia with Captain Christopher Newport. He recounted his voyage in a narrative poem, consisting of twenty-two eight-line verses, entitled, Newes from Virginia: The Lost Flock Triumphant, published in London, October 1, 1610, by Edw. Allde. The poem contained the account of their shipwreck on the "Bermoothawes" (Bermudas), which is the probable inspiration for Shakespeare's play, The Tempest. Richard Rich wrote:

God will not let us fall...
For...our work is good,
We hope to plant a nation,
Where none before hath stood.

Crashaw, Richard (c. 1613-August 25, 1649), was an English Metaphysical poet, known for using striking figures of speech. He associated with John Donne, and was a contemporary of both John Bunyan and John Milton. At first an Anglican in the High Church, he converted to Catholicism and died as canon of the Santa Casa Cathedral at Loreto. Many of his great poems are contained in Carmen Deo Nostra, 1652.

In his Hymn of the Nativity, 1652, Richard Crashaw wrote:

Poor world (said I) what wilt thou do
To entertain this starry stranger?
Is this the best thou canst bestow?
A cold, and not too cleanly, manger?
Contend, ye powers of heav'n and earth,
To fit a bed for this huge birth.

Vane, Sir Henry (baptized May 26, 1613-June 14, 1662), was the Governor of Massachusetts in 1636. An English colonial administrator and statesman, he served as joint treasurer of the English Navy, elected to Long and Short Parliaments and in 1640 was knighted by King Charles I. Sir Henry Vane is noted for having helped Roger Williams secure the Charter for Rhode Island in 1644, which bore Vane's signature as one of the commissioners for the plantation.

In April 1663, Roger Williams wrote of Sir Henry Vane:

Under God, the great anchor of our ship is Sir Henry.

Following Oliver Cromwell's "Protectorate" government, 1653-59, Charles II took the throne and executed Cromwell's loyal followers, one of whom was Sir Henry Vane, who wrote:

They that press so earnestly to carry on my trial do little know what the presence of God may be afforded me in it, and issue out of it to the magnifying of Christ in my body, by life or by death. Nor can they, I am sure, imagine how much I desire to be dissolved and be with Christ, which of all things which can befall me I account the best.

As the present storm we now lie under, the dark clouds that yet hang over the Reformed Churches of Christ, which are coming thicker and faster, so the coming of Jesus Christ in these clouds in order to a speedy and sudden revival of His cause, and spread of His kingdom over the face of the whole earth, is most clear to the eye of faith, even the faith in which I die, whereby the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ, Amen! Even so come, Lord Jesus!

Baxter, Richard (November 12, 1615-December 8, 1691), was an English nonconformist chaplain and scholar. In his work, Poetical Fragments - Love Breathing Thanks and Praise, 1681, Richard Baxter wrote:

I preached as never sure to preach again,
And as a dying man to dying men.

Virginia, Colony of (December 4, 1619), had 38 colonists land in a place they called Berkeley Hundred. Their charter stated:

We ordain that the day of our ship's arrival...in the land of Virginia shall be yearly and perpetually kept holy as a day of Thanksgiving to Almighty God.

Plymouth Council, Charter of the (November 3, 1620), granted by King James I (1566-1625), declared the purpose of the colony:

In the hope thereby to advance the enlargement of the Christian religion, to the glory of God Almighty.

Mayflower Compact (November 11, 1620), was America's first great governmental document, signed by the Pilgrims before they disembarked from their ship, the Mayflower. This covenant, revolutionary in its concept of individuals mutually and voluntarily submitting themselves to each other under God, has influenced all other American constitutional instruments since. The Mayflower Compact stated:

In ye name of God, Amen. We whose names are underwritten, the loyall subjects of our dread sovereigne Lord, King James, by ye grace of God, of Great Britaine, France, & Ireland king, defender of ye faith, etc., having undertaken, for ye glorie of God, and advancemente of ye Christian faith, and honour of our king & countrie, a voyage to plant ye first colonie in ye Northerne parts of Virginia, doe by these presents solemnly & mutually in ye presence of God, and one of another, covenant & combine our selves together into a civill body politick, for our better ordering & preservati on & furtherance of ye ends aforesaid; and by vertue hearof to enacte, constitute, and frame such just & equall lawes, ordinances, acts, constitutions & offices, from time to time, as shall be thought most meete & convenient for ye generall good of ye Colonie, unto which we promise all due submission and obedience.

In wittnes wherof we have hereunder subscribed our names at Cap-Codd ye 11. of November, in ye year of ye raigne of our sovereigne Lord, King James, of England, France, & Ireland ye eighteenth, and by Scotland ye fiftie fourth. Ano: Dom. 1620.

Virginia, Colony of (July 24, 1621), stated in its ordinances:

Know Ye, that we, the said Treasurer, Council, and Company, taking into our careful Consideration the present State of the said Colony of Virginia, and intending, by the Divine Assistance, to settle such a Form of Government there, as may be to the greatest Benefit and Comfort of the People.

Virginia, Colony of (March 22, 1622), was able to avert a threatened Indian attack due to the warning of a young Indian named "Chanco." On Jamestown Island, Virginia, the church marker stated:

In memory of Chanco, an Indian youth converted to Christianity, who resided in the household of Richard Pace across the river from Jamestown and who, on the eve of the Indian massacre of March 22, 1622, warned Pace of the murderous plot thus enabling Pace to cross the river in a canoe to alert and save the Jamestown settlement from impending disaster.

Vaughan, Henry (April 17, 1622-April 23, 1695), was an English physician and poet, who was born in Wales. After receiving an education at Jesus College, Oxford, he practiced medicine in Brecon. Many of his best poems, such as "The Retreat," "The Sap" and "I walkt the other day" are included in his collection entitled, Sillex Scientillans, 1655.

In his poem, The Night, Henry Vaughan wrote:

Dear Night! This world's defeat;
The stop to busy fool; care's check and curb;
The day of spirits; my soul's calm retreat
Which none disturb!
Christ's progress, and His prayer-time;
The hours to which high Heaven doth chime.

In Peace, st. I, Henry Vaughan wrote:

My soul, there is a country
Far beyond the stars
Where stands a winged sentry
All skillful in the wars:
There, above noise and danger,
Sweet Peace is crowned with smiles,
And One born in a manger
Commands the beautiful files.

Virginia, Colony of (1623), enacted legislation requiring civil magistrates:

To see that the Sabbath was not profaned by working or any employments, or journeying from place to place.

Pascal, Blaise (June 19, 1623-August 19, 1662), was a French physicist, mathematician and philosopher. Known as the "Father of the Science of Hydrostatics," he helped develop the barometer, pioneered hydrodynamics and fluid mechanics, leading to his discovery of "Pascal's Principle," the basis of hydraulics. He made invaluable contributions in the areas of probability and differential calculus, with the invention of Pascal's triangle for calculating the coefficients of a binomial expansion. His influential religious works, emphasizing "the reasons of the heart" over dry logic and intellect, were entitled Lettres Provinciales, 1656-57, and Pensees Sur La Religion, published posthumously in 1670.

In Pensees, 1670, Blaise Pascal wrote:

Men blaspheme what they don't know.

Blaise Pascal was known for his "Wager of Pascal," which stated:

How can anyone lose who chooses to become a Christian? If, when he dies, there turns out to be no God and his faith was in vain, he has lost nothing - in fact, he has been happier in life than his nonbelieving friends. If, however, there is a God and a heaven and hell, then he has gained heaven and his skeptical friends will have lost everything in hell!

In the work, Thoughts, Letters, and Opuscles, Blaise Pascal stated:

We know God only through Jesus Christ. Without this Mediator, is taken away all communication with God; through Jesus Christ we know God. All those who have pretended to know God, and prove Him without Jesus Christ, have only had impotent proofs.

But, to prove Jesus Christ we have the prophecies which are good and valid proofs. And those prophecies, being fulfilled, and truly proved by the event, indicate the certainty of these truths, and therefore the truth of the divinity of Jesus Christ. In Him, and by Him, then, we know God. Otherwise, and without Scripture, without original sin, without a necessary Mediator, we can not absolutely prove God, nor teach a good doctrine and sound morals.

But by Jesus Christ and in Jesus Christ, we prove God and teach doctrine and morals. Jesus Christ, then, is the true God of men. Not only do we know God only through Jesus Christ, but we know ourselves only through Jesus Christ.

We know life, death, only through Jesus Christ. Except by Jesus Christ we know not what life is, what our death is, what God is, what we ourselves are. Thus, without Scripture, which has only Jesus Christ for its object, we know nothing, and we see not only obscurity and confusion in the nature of God, but in nature herself. Without Jesus Christ, man must be in sin and misery; with Jesus Christ, man is exempt from sin and misery. In Him is all our virtue, and all our felicity. Out of Him, there is nothing but sin, misery, error, darkness, death, and despair.

After his death, this writing was found in Pascal's effects:

"The God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, the God of Jacob," not of philosophers and scholars.

Fox, George (July 1624-January 13, 1691), was the founder of the Society of Friends, or "Quakers," 1652. After his conversion experience, 1646, he traveled extensively, ministering in England, Ireland, Scotland, Holland, the West Indies and North America, often being imprisoned for his beliefs. William Penn, founder of the Pennsylvania Colony, was close friends with Fox, even traveling and preaching with him. Penn himself was imprisoned three times for his faith, once in the Tower of London for eight months.

In 1694, George Fox wrote in his journal:

The Lord showed me, so that I did see clearly, that he did not dwell in these temples which men had commanded and set up, but in people's hearts...his people were his temple, and he dwelt in them....

When the Lord sent me forth into the world, He forbade me to put off my hat to any, high or low....

Justice Bennet of Derby, was the first that called us Quakers, because I bid them tremble at the word of the Lord. This was in the year 1650....

He [Oliver Cromwell] said: "I see there is a people risen, that I cannot win either with gifts, honors, offices or places; but all other sects and people I can.

Boyle, Robert (January 25, 1627-December 30, 1691), was a British natural philosopher, known as the "Father of Modern Chemistry." One of the founders of the Royal Society of London, he was noted for his pneumatic experiments and the espousal of atomism. His contributions in physics and chemistry included the discovery of the basic law of gas dynamics, which related gas pressures to temperature and volume, known as "Boyle's Law." He corresponded with both Isaac Newton and John Locke. His works include: The Sceptical Chemist, 1661; The Defense Against Linus, 1662; Discourse of Things Above Reason, 1681; and Memoirs for the Natural History of the Human Blood, 1684.

Devoting much effort toward the propagation of scriptural beliefs, he wrote the Boyle Lectures, in the field of apologetics, for the defense of the Christian religion. Robert Boyle stated:

Our Saviour would love at no less rate than death; and from the supereminent height of glory, stooped and debased Himself to the sufferance of the extremest of indignities, and sunk himself to the bottom of abjectness, to exalt our condition to the contrary extreme.

In his work entitled Some Considerations Touching the Style of the Holy Scriptures, Robert Boyle wrote:

The Books of Scripture illustrate and expound each other; as in the mariner's compass, the needle's extremity, though it seems to point purposely to the north, doth yet at the same time discover both east and west, as distant as they are from it and each other, so do some texts of Scripture guide us to the intelligence of others, for which they are widely distant in the Bible.

Ray, John (November 29, 1627-January 17, 1705), was a British biologist and natural theologian who founded of the Royal Society. Considered the father of English natural history, he was a respected expert in the field of taxonomy, botany and zoology. He compiled an extensive catalogue of English flora and, between 1686-1704, published A General History of Plants (3 vols.).

John Ray authored A Persuasive to a Holy Life, 1700, and The Wisdom of God Manifested in the Works of Creation, 1691, in which he stated:

The works created by God at first, and by Him conserved to this day in the same state and condition in which they were first made.

Bunyan, John (November 1628-August 31, 1688), was an English author who wrote the classic work, The Pilgrim's Progress, 1678. Born in Bedford, England, he was a poor, unskilled tinker by trade. In 1657, he became a Baptist minister and was imprisoned over 12 years, 1660-72, 1675, for preaching without a license. It was during this time that he did much of his writing, while supporting his family by making shoelaces. The Pilgrim's Progress, 1678, which is an allegory of a Christian's journey to the Celestial City, has been translated into over 100 languages and, after the Bible, has held the position as the world's best-seller for hundreds of years. It, along with the Bible and Fox's Book of Martyrs, was found in nearly every home in colonial New England.

In the "Shepherd Boy's Song," The Pilgrim's Progress, 1678, pt. II, John Bunyan wrote:

My sword I give to him that shall succeed me in my pilgrimage, and my courage and skill to him that can get it. My marks and scars I carry with me, to be a witness for me, that I have fought His battles who now will be my rewarder.

Massachusetts, First Charter of (March 4, 1629), was granted by King Charles I. In June of 1630, ten years after the Pilgrims founded the Plymouth Colony, Governor John Winthrop founded the Holy Commonwealth of Massachusetts with 700 people sailing in eleven ships. This began the Great Migration, which saw more than twenty thousand Puritans embark for New England in the pursuing sixteen years.

The First Charter of Massachusetts, March 4, 1629, stated:

And forasmuch as the good and prosperous success of the plantation of the said parts of New England and for the directing, ruling, and disposing of all other Matters and Things, whereby our said People... may be soe religiously, peaceable, and civilly governed, as their good life and orderlie Conversation, may wynn and incite the Natives of the Country to the Knowledge and Obedience of the onlie true God and Savior of Mankinde, and the Christian Fayth, which, in our Royall Intention, and the Adventurers free profession, is the principall Ende of this Plantation.

New York, Charter of Freedoms and Exemptions to Patroons of (June 7, 1629), established the Dutch patroon system of land holdings in New York and New Netherlands. This plan, intended to promote colonization, granted large tracts of land to those who would help fifty families to emigrate and settle along the Hudson River. It stated:

Article XXVII. The Patroons and colonists shall in particular, and in the speediest manner, endeavor to find out ways and means whereby they may support a Minister and Schoolmaster, that thus the service of God and zeal for religion may not grow cool and be neglected among them, and they shall, for the first, procure a Comforter of the sick there..."

Massachusetts Bay Company, Cambridge Agreement of the (August 26, 1629), was a compact between the members of the Massachusetts Bay Company consenting to change their charter from a business venture to a plantation charter. The document included their justification of the decision, stating:

And having weighed the greatness of the worke in regard to the consequence, God's glory and the churches good.

Pufendorf, Samuel, Baron von (1632-1694), was a German philosopher, historian and jurist. The son of a Lutheran minister, he studied theology at the University of Leipzig and law at the University of Jena. In Copenhagen, during the war between Sweden and Denmark, 1658, he was imprisoned for eight months, and upon release traveled to Leiden where he published a complete system of universal law, 1660. He was Professor of the Law of Nature at the University of Heidelberg in Germany and the University of Lund in Sweden. He served as royal historian for the King of Sweden, 1677, and later for Elector Frederick II of Brandenburg. His Latin work, The Eight Books On The Law of Nature and Nations, 1672, which stressed natural law over man-made law, and On the Duty of Man and Citizen, 1673, were standard in colonial colleges. Samuel Pufendorf's writings exerted a definite influence upon the framers of the Constitution. In 1775, Alexander Hamilton wrote:

Apply yourself, without delay, to the study of the law of nature. I would recommend to your perusal Grotius, Pufendorf, Locke...

Samuel de Pufendorf wrote that God:

Exercises a Sovereignty not only over the whole World, or over mankind in general, but over every Individual Human Person: Whose Knowledge nothing can escape: Who, by Virtue of His Imperial Right, hath enjoin'd Men such certain Duties by Natural Law, the Observance of which will meet with his Approbation, the Breach or the Neglect, with His Displeasure: And that He will for His Purpose require an exact Account from every Man, of his Proceedings, without Corruption and without Partiality.

Pufendorf stated:

Atheists are not, strictly speaking, God's Enemies... but His Rebellious Subjects, and consequently guilty of Treason against the Divine Majesty... It is no such obscure matter, therefore to assign the particular Species of Sin, to which Atheism belongs...

Maryland, Charter of (June 20, 1632), was originally issued by King Charles I, to George Calvert (1580-1632), First Lord Baltimore. He had served as Secretary of State for King James I, but he died before he could embark. The Charter was then reissued to his son, Cecilius Calvert (1605-1675), Second Lord Baltimore, who commissioned his brother, Leonard Calvert (1606-1647), to found the colony and serve as its administrator.

The Charter of the Colony of Maryland, June 20, 1632, named in honor of Charles I's wife, Queen Henrietta Maria, stated:

Charles, by the Grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all to whom these Presents come, Greeting.

II. Whereas our well beloved and right trusty subject Coecilius Calvert, Baron of Baltimore, in our Kingdom of Ireland, Son and Heir of George Calvert, Knight, late Baron of steps of his Father, being animated with a laudable, and pious Zeal for extending the Christian Religion, and also the Territories of our Empire, hath humbly besought Leave of Us that he may transport, by his own Industry, and Expence, a numerous Colony of the English Nation, to a certain Region, herein after described, in a Country hitherto uncultivated, in the Parts of America, and partly occupied by Savages, having no Knowledge of the Divine Being, and that all that Region, with some certain Privileges, and Jurisdiction, appertaining unto the wholesome Government, and State of his Colony and Region aforesaid, may by our Royal Highness be given, granted and confirmed unto him, and his Heirs.

IV... the Patronages and Advowsons of all Churches which (with the increasing Worship and Religion of Christ) within the said Region... hereafter shall happen to be built, together with License, and Faculty of erecting and founding Churches, Chapels, and Places of Worship, in convenient and suitable Places within the Premises, and of causing the same to be dedicated and consecrated according to the Ecclesiastical Laws of our Kingdom of England.

Locke, John (August 29, 1632-October 28, 1704), was an English philosopher, diplomat and educator, whose writings had a profound influence on America's Founding Fathers. He received his master's degree from the Christ Church College of Oxford University, 1658, and lectured there on Greek, philosophy and rhetoric. He served as a diplomat to Madrid, 1665, moved to France, 1675, then Holland, 1683, and returned to England, 1688. His works include: A Letter Concerning Toleration, 1689; Two Treatises of Government, 1690; An Essay Concerning Human Understanding, 1693; Some Thoughts Concerning Education, 1693; and The Reasonableness of Christianity, 1695. Of nearly 15,000 items of the Founding Fathers which were reviewed; including books, newspaper articles, pamphlets, monographs, etc., John Locke was the third most frequently quoted author. In his Two Treatises of Government, 1690, he cited 80 references to the Bible in the first treatise and 22 references to the Bible in the second.

John Locke elaborated on fundamental concepts, such as: parental authority, separation of powers, private property, the right to resist unlawful authority, unalienable rights, and government by consent, whereby governments "derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." Concerning the idea of a "social compact," a constitution between the people and the government, John Locke trace its origins to:

That Paction which God made with Noah after the Deluge.

John Locke classified the basic natural rights of man as the right to "life, liberty and property." This not only influenced Thomas Jefferson, who penned the Declaration of Independence, but also elements in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments.

In his treatise Of Civil Government, 1689, John Locke stated:

Great and Chief End, therefore, of Mens uniting into Commonwealths, and putting themselves under Government, is the preservation of their property....

For Men being all the Workmanship of one Omnipotent, and infinitely wise Maker: all the Servants of one Sovereign Master, sent into the World by his Order, and about his Business, they are his Property, whose Workmanship they are, made to last during his, not one another's Pleasure....

Those Grants God made of the World to Adam, and to Noah, and his Sons...has given the Earth to the Children of Men, given it to Mankind in common....

God, who hath given the World to Men in common, hath also given them reason to make use of it to the best Advantage of Life and Convenience.

On August 23, 1689, in his work, Of Civil Government, John Locke wrote on natural law and natural rights:

The obligations of the Law of Nature cease not in society, but only in many cases are drawn closer, and have, by human laws, known penalties annexed to them to enforce their observation.

Thus the Law of Nature stands as an eternal rule to all men, legislators as well as others. The rules that they make for other men's actions must... be conformable to the Law of Nature; i.e. to the Will of God, of which that is a declaration, and the fundamental Law of Nature being the preservation of mankind, no human sanction can be good or valid against it.

In The Second Treatise on Civil Government, 1690, John Locke stated:

Human Laws are measures in respect of Men whose Actions they must direct, albeit such measures they are as have also their higher Rules to be measured by, which Rules are two, the Law of God, and the Law of Nature; so that Laws Human must be made according to the general Laws of Nature, and without contradiction to any positive Law of Scripture, otherwise they are ill made.

John Locke wrote paraphrases of the books of Romans, First and Second Corinthians, Galatians and Ephesians. In 1695, he published A Vindication of the Reasonableness of Christianity, in which he stated:

He that shall collect all the moral rules of the philosophers and compare them with those contained in the New Testament will find them to come short of the morality delivered by our Saviour and taught by His disciples: a college made up of ignorant but inspired fishermen....

Such a Law of morality Jesus Christ has given in the New Testament, but by the latter of these ways, by revelation, we have from Him a full and sufficient rule for our direction, and conformable to that of reason. But the word and obligation of its precepts have their force, and are past doubt to us, by the evidence of His mission.

He was sent by God: His miracles show it; and the authority of God in His precepts can not be questioned. His morality has a sure standard, that revelation vouches, and reason can not gainsay nor question; but both together witness to come from God, the great Lawgiver.

And such a one as this, out of the New Testament, I think, they would never find, nor can anyone say is anywhere else to be found....

To one who is persuaded that Jesus Christ was sent by God to be a King and a Saviour to those who believe in Him, all His commands become principles; there needs no other proof for the truth of what He says, but that He said it; and then there needs no more but to read the inspired books to be instructed.

Our Saviour's great rule, that we should love our neighbors as ourselves, is such a fundamental truth for the regulating of human society, that, by that alone, one might without difficulty determine all the cases and doubts in social morality.

John Locke stated:

The Bible is one of the greatest blessings bestowed by God on the children of men. - It has God for its author; salvation for its end, and truth without any mixture for its matter. - It is all pure, all sincere; nothing too much; nothing wanting.

Pepys, Samuel (February 23, 1633-May 26, 1703), was an English diarist, who had served as a clerk in the British Navy. He was promoted to Secretary of the Admiralty, instituting many of the administrative methods of the British Navy, and was elected president of the Royal Society. His Diary, kept from the years of 1660-69, has become a vivid and popular picture of life in England during the period of the Restoration, the Plague, and the Fire of London. Written in cipher, it was not decoded and published until 1825. In 1928, it was made into the play, And So To Bed.

On March 22, 1660, Samuel Pepys wrote in his Diary:

I pray God to keep me from being proud.

On February 23, 1667, he wrote:

This day I am, by the blessing of God, 34 years old, in very good health and mind's content, and in condition of estate much beyond whatever my friends could expect of a child of theirs, this day 34 years. The Lord's name be praised! and may I be thankful for it.

In his final diary entry, May 31, 1669, just before the most active period of his life with the British government, Samuel Pepys wrote:

And so I betake myself to that course, which is almost as much as to see myself go into my grave; for which, and all the discomforts that will accompany my being blind, the good God prepares me!

Maryland, Colony of (March 25, 1634), was founded by Leonard Calvert (1606-1647), who arrived in the Chesapeake Bay area with two ships, the Ark and the Dove. Commissioned by his brother Cecilius Calvert (1605-1675), Second Lord Baltimore, to lead the expedition and serve as its governor, Leonard Calvert, along with over 230 emigrants, founded the first capital, St. Mary's City, on Saint Clement's Island. One of those original colonists, Father White, described their arrival:

We celebrated mass.... This had never been done before in this part of the world. After we had completed, we took on our shoulders a great cross, which we had hewn out of a tree, and advancing in order to the appointed place, with the assistance of the Governor and his associates... we erected a trophy to Christ the Saviour.

The Assembly of Maryland, in eulogy of Leonard Calvert, passed in a vote this proclamation three years after his death:

Great and manifold are the benefits wherewith Almighty God hath blessed this colony, first brought and landed within the province of Maryland, at your Lordship's charge, and continued by your care and industry, in the happy restitution of a blessed peace unto us, being lately wasted by a miserable dissension and unhappy war.

But more estimable are the blessings poured on this province, in planting Christianity among a people that knew not God, nor had heard of Christ. All which, we recognize and acknowledge to be done and performed, next under God, by your Lordship's pious intention towards the advancement and propagation of the Christian religion, and the peace and happiness of this colony and province.

Harvard University (1636), founded by the General Court of Massachusetts only sixteen years after the landing of the Pilgrims, is the oldest university in the United States. Originally called the College at Cambridge, being established in Cambridge, Massachusetts, it was renamed after its first major benefactor, Rev. John Harvard (1607-1638), who donated his library and half of his estate. The declared purpose of the college was:

To train a literate clergy.

The Rules and Precepts observed at Harvard, September 26, 1642, stated:

1. When any Scholar... is able to make and speak true Latine in Verse and Prose... And decline perfectly the paradigms of Nounes and Verbes in the Greek tongue... [he is able] of admissi on into the college.

2. Let every Student be plainly instructed, and earnestly pressed to consider well, the maine end of his life and studies is, to know God and Jesus Christ which is eternall life, John 17:3 and therefore to lay Christ in the bottome, as the only foundation of all sound knowledge and Learning. And seeing the Lord only giveth wisdom, Let every one seriously set himself by prayer in secret to seeke it of him Prov. 2, 3.

3. Every one shall so exercise himselfe in reading the Scriptures twice a day, that he shall be ready to give such an account of his proficiency therein, both in Theoreticall observations of Language and Logick, and in practicall and spirituall truths, as his Tutor shall require, according to his ability; seeing the entrance of the word giveth light, it giveth understanding to the simple, Psalm, 119:130.

4. That they eshewing all profanation of Gods name, Attributes, Word, Ordinances, and times of Worship, do studie with good conscience carefully to retaine God, and the love of his truth in their mindes, else let them know, that (notwithstanding their Learning) God may give them up to strong delusions, and in the end to a reprobate minde, 2Thes. 2:11, 12. Rom. 1:28.

5. That they studiously redeeme the time; observe the generall houres... diligently attend the Lectures, without any disturbance by word or gesture...

6. None shall... frequent the company and society of such men as lead an unfit, and dissolute life. Nor shall any without his Tutors leave, or without the call of Parents or Guardians, goe abroad to other Townes.

7. Every Scholar shall be present in his Tutors chamber at the 7th houre in the morning, immediately after the sound of the Bell, at his opening the Scripture and prayer, so also at the 5th houre at night, and then give account of his owne private reading. . . . But if any . . . shall absent himself from prayer or Lectures, he shall bee lyable to Admonition, if he offend above once a weeke.

8. If any Scholar shall be found to transgresse any of the Lawes of God, or the Schoole. . . he may bee admonished at the publick monethly Act.

Ten of the twelve presidents of Harvard, prior to the Revolutionary War, were ministers, and according to reliable calculations, over fifty percent of the seventeenth-century Harvard graduates became ministers. Of note is the fact that 106 of the first 108 schools in America were founded on the Christian faith.

Harvard college was founded in "Christi Gloriam" and later dedicated "Christo et Ecclesiae". The founders of Harvard believed that:

All knowledge without Christ was vain.

The word Veritas, on the college seal, means divine truth. The motto of Harvard was officially:

For Christ and the Church.

The dedication inscribed on the wall by the old iron gate at the main entrance to the Harvard University campus, as well as in the catalog of the Harvard Divinity School, reads:

After God had carried us safe to New England and we had builded our houses, provided necessaries for our livelihood, reared convenient places for God's worship and settled the civil government, one of the next things we longed for and looked after was to advance learning and perpetuate it to posterity, dreading to leave an illiterate ministry to the churches when our present ministers lie in the dust.

On Election Day, May 31, 1775, Harvard President Samuel Langdon addressed the Massachusetts Provincial Congress. The message had a profound impact, resulting in it being published and distributed throughout the colonies:

We have rebelled against God. We have lost the true spirit of Christianity, though we retain the outward profession and form of it. We have neglected and set light by the glorious Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ and His holy commands and institutions.

The worship of many is but mere compliment to the Deity, while their hearts are far from Him. By many, the Gospel is corrupted into a superficial system of moral philosophy, little better than ancient Platonism. . . .

My brethren, let us repent and implore the divine mercy. Let us amend our ways and our doings, reform everything that has been provoking the Most High, and thus endeavor to obtain the gracious interpositions of providence for our deliverance....

May the Lord hear us in this day of trouble.... We will rejoice in His salvation, and in the name of our God, we will set up our banners!...

Wherefore is all this evil upon us? Is it not because we have forsaken the Lord? Can we say we are innocent of crimes against God? No, surely it becomes us to humble ourselves under His mighty hand, that He may exalt us in due time....

My brethren, let us repent and implore the divine mercy. Let us amend our ways and our doings, reform everything that has been provoking the Most High, and thus endeavor to obtain the gracious interpositions of Providence for our deliverance....

If God be for us, who can be against us? The enemy has reproached us for calling on His name and professing our trust in Him. They have made a mock of our solemn fasts and every appearance of serious Christianity in the land....

May our land be purged from all its sins! Then the Lord will be our refuge and our strength, a very present help in trouble, and we will have no reason to be afraid, though thousands of enemies set themselves against us round about.

May the Lord hear us in this day of trouble.... We will rejoice in His salvation, and in the name of our God, we will set up our banners.

In 1790, the requirements for Harvard stated:

All persons of what degree forever residing at the College, and all undergraduates... shall constantly and seasonably attend the worship of God in the chapel, morning and evening... All the scholars shall, at sunset in the evening preceding the Lord's Day, lay aside all their diversions and... it is enjoined upon every scholar carefully to apply himself to the duties of religion on said day.

Massachusetts General Court (1636), resolved to establish a code of laws that would be:

agreeable to the word of God.

Marquette, Jacques (June 1, 1637-May 18, 1675), was a French missionary explorer in America. Landing in Quebec, 1666, he began learning the Algonquin and Huron languages. He founded a mission at Sault Sainte Marie, and from 1669 to 1671 had his station at La Pointe du Saint Esprit, at the head of Ashland Bay. Forced to flee by the Sioux Indians, he moved to Mackinaw, where founded the mission of Saint Ignatius. In 1673, Louis Joliet (1645-1700) visited Marquette with a message from Frontenac (1620-1698), governor of Canada, requesting him to lead an expedition down the Mississippi River. They explored from Green Bay, up the Fox River, across Lake Winnebago and down the Mississippi to just below the Arkansas River. Jacques Marquette gave his account in Voyage et De'couverte de Quelques Pays et Nations de l' Amerique Septemtrionale (translated 1852). He then worked as a missionary among the Illinois Indians. In 1877, his remains were discovered at Point St. Ignace, Michigan. A statue of Jacques Marquette represents the people of the State of Wisconsin in the rotunda of the United States Capitol, Washington, D. C.

Father Jacques Marquette, as recorded in The Jesuit Relations, Volume LIX, stated:

On the 17th day of May, 1673, we started from the mission of St. Ignatius at Michilimackinac, where I then was. The joy that we felt at being selected for this expedition animated our courage and rendered the labor of paddling from morning to night agreeable to us. And because we were going to seek unknown countries, we took every precaution in our power, so that, if our undertaking was hazardous, it should not be foolhardy. To that end we obtained all the information that we could from the savages who had frequented those regions; and we even traced out from their reports a map of the whole of that new country; on it we indicated the rivers which we were to navigate, the names of the people and of the places through which we were to pass, the course of the great river, and the direction we were to follow when we reached it.

With all these precautions, we joyfully plied our paddles on a portion of Lake Huron, on that of the Illinois, and on the Bay des Puants.

The first nation that we came to was that of the Folle Avoine [Menominee]. I entered their river to go and visit these people to whom we preached the Gospel for several years - in consequence of which, there are several good Christians among them.

I told these people of the Folle Avoine of my design to go and discover those remote nations, in order to teach them the mysteries of our holy religion. They were greatly surprised to hear it, and did their best to dissuade me. They represented to me that I would meet nations who never show mercy to strangers, but break their heads without any cause; and that war was kindled between various peoples who dwelt upon our route, which exposed us to the further manifest danger of being killed by the bands of warriors who are ever in the field. They also said that the great river was very dangerous, when one does not know the difficult places; that it was full of horrible monsters, which devoured men and canoes together; that there was even a demon, who was heard from a great distance, who barred the way and swallowed up all who ventured to approach him; finally, that the heat was so excessive in those countries that it would inevitably cause our death.

I thanked them for the good advice that they gave me, but told them that I could not follow it, because the salvation of souls was at stake, for which I would be delighted to give my life; that I scoffed at the alleged demon; that we would easily defend ourselves against those marine monsters; and, moreover, that we would be on our guard to avoid the other dangers with which they threatened us. After making them pray to God, and giving them some instructions, I separated from them....

Here we are at Maskoutens. This word may, in Algonquin, mean "the Fire Nation" - which, indeed, is the name given to this tribe. Here is the limit of the discoveries which the French have made, for they have not yet gone any farther....

No sooner had we arrived than we, Monsieur Joliet, and I, assembled the elders together; and he told them that he was sent by Monsieur our Governor to discover new countries, while I was sent by God to illumine them with the light of the holy Gospel. He told them that, moreover, the Sovereign Master of our lives wished to be known by all the nations; and that in obeying His will I feared not the death to which I exposed myself in voyages so perilous. He informed them that we needed two guides to show us the way; and we gave them a present, by it asking them to grant us the guides. To this they very civilly consented; and they also spoke to us by means of a present, consisting of a mat to serve us as a bed during our whole voyage....

On the 25th day of June we perceived on the water's edge some tracks of men, and a narrow and somewhat beaten path leading to a fine prairie. We stopped to examine it; and, thinking that it was a road which led to some village of savages, we resolved to go and reconnoiter it. We therefore left our two canoes under the guard of our people, strictly charging them not to allow themselves to be surprised, after which Monsieur Joliet and I undertook this investigation - a rather hazardous one for two men who exposed themselves alone to the mercy of a barbarous and unknown people. We silently followed the narrow path, and, after walking about two leagues, we discovered a village on the bank of the river, and two others on a hill distant about half a league from the first.

Then we heartily commended ourselves to God, and, after imploring His aid, we went farther without being perceived, and approached so near that we could even hear the savages talking. We therefore decided that it was time to reveal ourselves. This we did by shouting with all our energy, and stopped without advancing any farther.

On hearing the shout, the savages quickly issued from their cabins, and having probably recognized us as Frenchmen, especially when they saw a black gown - or, at least, having no cause for distrust, as we were only two men, and had given them notice of our arrival - they deputed four old men to come and speak to us. Two of these bore tobacco pipes, finely ornamented and adorned with various feathers. They walked slowly, and raised their pipes toward the sun, seemingly offering them to it to smoke - without, however, saying a word. They spent a rather long time in covering the short distance between their village and us. Finally, when they had drawn near, they stopped to consider us attentively. I was reassured when I observed these ceremonies, which with them are performed only among friends; and much more so when I saw them clad in cloth, for I judged thereby that they were our allies. I therefore spoke to them first, and asked who they were. They replied that they were Illinois; and, as a token of peace, they offered us their pipes to smoke. They afterward invited us to enter their village, where all the people impatiently awaited us.

Connecticut General Court (1639), established under the Constitution of Connecticut, issued the order:

That God's word should be the only rule for ordering the affairs of government in this commonwealth.

Connecticut, Fundamental Orders (Constitution) of (January 14, 1639), was the first constitution written in America, establishing a pattern which all others followed, including the United States Constitution. It was penned by Roger Ludlow, 1638, after hearing a sermon by Thomas Hooker, the Puritan minister who founded Hartford, Connecticut. So important was this work that Connecticut became known as "The Constitution State."

The committee responsible to frame the orders was charged to make the laws:

As near the law of God as they can be.

On January 14, 1639, the Connecticut towns of Hartford, Wethersfield, and Windsor adopted the constitution, which stated in its Preamble:

Forasmuch as it has pleased the Almighty God by the wise disposition of His divine providence so to order and dispose of things that we the inhabitants and residents of Windsor, Hartford and Wethersfield and now cohabiting and dwelling in and upon the River Connecticut and the lands thereunto adjoining; and well knowing when a people are gathered together the Word of God requires, that to meinteine the peace and union of such a people, there should bee an orderly and decent government established according to God, to order and dispose of the affairs of all the people at all seasons as occasion shall require; do therefore associate and conjoin ourselves to be as one public State or Commonwealth, and do, for ourselves and our successors and such as shall be adjoined to us at any time hereafter, enter into Combination and Confederation together, to meinteine and presearve the libberty and purity of the Gospell of our Lord Jesus which we now professe, as also the discipline of the churches,

Which, according to the truth of the said Gospell, is now practised amongst us; as also, in our civill affaires to be guided and governed according to such lawes, rules, orders, and decrees....

I. It is ordered, sentenced and decreed, that there shall be yearly two General Assemblies...wherein shall be yearly chosen from time to time so many Magistrates and other public Officers as shall be found requisite...which being chosen and sworne according to an Oath recorded for that purpose shall have power to administer justice according to the Laws here established, and for want thereof according to the rule of the Word of God....

The Oath of the Governor: "I, N.W., being now chosen to be Governor within this jurisdiction, for the year ensuing, and until a new be chosen, do swear by the great and dreadful name of the everliving God, to promote the public good and peace of the same, according to the best of my skill; as also will maintain all lawful priviledges of this Commonweal th; as also that all wholesome laws that are or shall be made by lawful authority here established, be duly executed; and will further the execution of Justice according to the rule of God's Word; so help me God, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ."

In 1639, at Quinipiack (New Haven), Connecticut, the first example of a written constitution, constituting a government and defining its powers, was composed as a distinct organic act. The articles which made up this constitution included:

Article I. That the Scriptures hold forth a perfect rule for the direction and government of all men in all duties which they are to perform to God and men, as well in families and commonwealths as in matters of the church.

Article II. That as in matters which concern the gathering and ordering of a church, so likewise in all public offices which concern civil order, - as the choice of magistrates and officers, making and repealing laws, dividing allotments of inheritance, and all things of like nature, - they would all be governed by those rules which the Scripture held forth to them.

Article III. That all those who had desired to be received free planters had settled in the plantation with a purpose, resolution, and desire that they might be admitted into church fellowship according to Christ.

Article IV. That all the free planters held themselves bound to establish such civil order as might best conduce to the securing of the purity and peace of the ordinance to themselves, and their posterity according to God.

Following the adoption of the Constitution, Rev. Mr. Davenport solemnly charged the governor of the Colony, quoting from Deuteronomy 1:16-17:

And I charge your judges at that time, saying, Hear the causes between your brethren, and judge righteously between every man and his brother, and the stranger that is with him. Ye shall not be afraid of the face of man; for the judgment is God's: and the cause that is too hard for you, bring it unto me, and I will hear it.

Mather, Increase (June 21, 1639-August 23, 1723), was the President of Harvard College, 1685-1701. He was the son of the influential preacher, Richard Mather (1596-1669), who emigrated to Massachusetts, 1635, and co-authored the Bay Psalm Book. Increase Mather became a primary leader in colonial America, representing the Colonists in England, where he helped negotiate a new charter with King William III, 1702. He was the father of Cotton Mather, the first American member of the Royal Society of London, who helped found Yale University.

When King Charles II demanded the return of the charter of Massachusetts, Increase Mather prepared his response:

To submit and resign their charter would be inconsistent with the main end of their fathers' coming to New England. . . . [Resistance would bring] great sufferings, [but] better to suffer than sin. Let them trust in the God of their fathers, which is better than to put confidence in princes. And if they suffer, because they dare not comply with the wills of men against the will of God, they suffer in a good cause.

Exeter, New Hampshire (August 4, 1639), the colonists defined the purpose for government, stating:

Considering with ourselves the holy will of God and our own necessity, that we should not live without wholesome laws and civil government among us, of which we are altogether destitute, do, in the name of Christ and in the sight of God, combine ourselves together to erect and set up among us such governments as shall be, to our best discerning, agreeable to the will of God.

Massachusetts, Body of Liberties of (December 1641), the first code of laws established in New England, were established by the Massachusetts General Court. They were compiled by Nathaniel Ward (1578-1652), a leading English Puritan minister, who had been trained as a lawyer. He came to the Colony in 1634, and was for a time pastor at Ipswich.

The Massachusetts Body of Liberties stated:

The free fruition of such Liberties, Immunities and Privileges as humanities, Civilitie and Christianitie call for as due every man in his place and proportion without impeachment and Infringement hath ever bene and ever will be the tranquillities and Stabilities of Churches and Commonwealths. And the deniall or deprivall thereof, the disturbance if not the ruine of both....

We doe therefore this day religiously and unanimously decree and confirme these following Rites, Liberties, and privileges concerneing our Churches, and Civill State....

58. Civill Authoritie hath power and libertie to see the peace, ordinances and rules of Christ observed in every church according to his word. So it be done in a civill and not in an Ecclesiastical way.

59. Civill Authoritie hath power and libertie to deale with any Church member in a way of Civill Justice, notwithstanding any Church relation, office or interest.

60. No church censure shall degrad or depose any man from any Civill dignitie, office, or Authoritie he shall have in commonweal th.

1. If any man after Legall convi ction shall have or worship any other god, but the Lord God, he shall be put to death.

2. If any men or women be a witch, (that is hath or consul teth with a familiar spirit), They shall be put to death.

3. If any man shall Blaspheme the Name of God, the Father, Sonne or Holie Ghost, with direct, expresse, presumptous or high handed blasphemie, or shall curse God in the like manner he shall be put to death.

1. All the people of God wi thin this Jurisdiction who are not in the church way, and the orthodox Judgement, and not scandalous in life, shall have full libertie to gather themselves into a Church Estaitte. Provided they doe it in a Christian way, with due observation of the rules of Christ revealed in his word...

10. Wee allow private meetings for edification in religion amongst Christians of all Sortes of people. So be it without just offence for number, time, place, and other circumstances.

Massachusetts Bay, Colony of (1642), along with the Colony of Connecticut in 1647, passed the Old Deluder Satan Law to prevent illiteracy and to prevent the abuse of power over a population ignorant of Scriptures, as had been the case in Europe. The law instituted:

Newton, Sir Isaac (December 25, 1642-March 20, 1727), was a mathematician and natural philosopher who discovered of the laws of universal gravitation, formulated the three laws of motion, which aided in advancing the discipline of dynamics, and helped develop calculus into a comprehensive branch of mathematics. He went to Trinity College, Cambridge, 1661; retired to Woolsthorp, Lincolnshire, during the Plague, 1665-66; and became a fellow, 1667. He was honored to occupy the Lucasian Chair of Mathematics, 1669, and was elected Fellow of the Royal Society, 1672. He was given the position of Master of the Mint, 1699, and in 1701, entered Parliament. In 1703, Sir Issac Newton became the President of the Royal Society. He constructed the first reflecting telescope, laid the foundation for the great law of energy conservation and developed the particle theory of light propagation.

In 1704, in his work entitled, Optics, Sir Isaac Newton stated:

God in the beginning formed matter in solid, massy, hard, impenetrable, movable particles, of such sizes and figures, and with such other properties, and in such proportion to space, as most conduced to the end for which he formed them.

Sir Isaac Newton asserted:

We account the Scriptures of God to be the most sublime philosophy. I find more sure marks of authenticity in the Bible than in any profane history whatsoever... Worshipping God and the Lamb in the temple: God, for his benefaction in creating all things, and the Lamb, for his benefaction in redeeming us with his blood.

There is one God, the Father, ever-living, omnipresent, omniscient, almighty, the Maker of heaven and earth, and one Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus....

To us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by Him. That is, we are to worship the Father alone as God Almighty, and Jesus alone as the Lord, the Messiah, the Great King, the Lamb of God who was slain, and hath redeemed us with His blood, and made us kings and priests.

The Book of Revelation exhibits to us the same peculiarities as that of Nature... The history of the Fall of Man - of the introduction of moral and physical evil, the prediction of the Messiah, the actual advent of our Saviour, His instructions, His miracles, His death, His resurrection, and the subsequent propagation of His religion by the unlettered fishermen of Galilee, are each a stumbling-block to the wisdom of this world....

But through the system of revealed truth which this Book contains is, like that of the universe, concealed from common observation, yet the labors of the centuries have established its Divine origin, and developed in all its order and beauty the great plan of human restoration.

In describing Sir Isaac Newton, the Encyclopedia of Philosophy stated:

Newton himself was a student of Old Testament prophecies and believed in the Scriptures as inerrant guides.

New England Confederation, Constitution of the (May 19, 1643), was the first document in America where colonies united themselves. The colonists of New Plymouth, New Haven, Massachusetts & Connecticut, covenanted together, stated:

The Articles of Confederation between the plantations under the government of Massachusetts, the plantations under the government of New Plymouth, the plantations under the government of Connecticut, and the government of New Haven with the plantations in combination therewith:

Whereas we all came to these parts of America with the same end and aim, namely, to advance the Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to enjoy the liberties of the Gospel thereof with purities and peace, and for preserving and propagating the truth and liberties of the gospel....

And whereas in our setting (by a wise providence of God) we are further dispersed upon the sea coasts and rivers than was at first intended....

The said United Colonies for themselves and their posterities to jointly and severally hereby enter into a firm and perpetual league of friendship and amity for offence and defence, mutual advice and succor upon all just occasions both for preserving and propagating the Gospel and for their own mutual safety and welfare.

New Haven Colony, Charter of (April 3, 1644), adopted the rules for governing the courts of the New Haven Colony, stating:

The judicial laws of God, as they were delivered by Moses... [are to] be a rule to all the courts in this jurisdiction...

Penn, William (October 14, 1644-July 30, 1718), was the founder of Pennsylvania. He was the son of a British Navy Admiral, of the same name, who discovered Bermuda and helped strengthen King Charles II's throne. William Penn attended Oxford University, and later studied law. In 1667, at the age of 22, William Penn was impressed by a sermon delivered by Thomas Loe, entitled, "The Sandy Foundation Shaken." He converted to the Christian beliefs of the Society of Friends, or Quakers, who at that time were scorned and ridiculed.

In his Treatise on the Religion of the Quakers, William Penn proclaimed:

I do declare to the whole world that we believe the Scriptures to contain a declaration of the mind and will of God in and to those ages in which they were written; being given forth by the Holy Ghost moving in the hearts of holy men of God; that they ought also to be read, believed, and fulfilled in our day; being used for reproof and instruction, that the man of God may be perfect. They are a declaration and testimony of heavenly things themselves, and, as such, we carry a high respect for them. We accept them as the words of God Himself.

William Penn became a Quaker preacher and writer. Beginning in 1668, he suffered imprisonment over three times for his faith. Once he was imprisoned in the Tower of London for eight months, during which time he wrote the classic book, No Cross, No Crown:

No pain, no palm; no thorns, no throne; no gall, no glory; no cross, no crown.

Christ's cross is Christ's way to Christ's crown. This is the subject of the following discourse, first written during my confinement in the Tower of London in the year of 1668, now reprinted with great enlargement of matter and testimonies, that thou mayest be won to Christ, or if won already, brought nearer to Him. It is a path which God in his everlasting kindness guided my feet into, in the flower of my youth, when about two and twenty years of age.

He took me by the hand and led me out of the pleasures, vanities and hopes of the world. I have tasted of Christ's judgements, and of his mercies, and of the world's frowns and reproaches. I rejoice in my experience, and dedicate it to thy service in Christ....

The unmortified Christian and the heathen are of the same religion, and the deity they truly worship is the god of this world. What shall we eat? What shall we drink? What shall we wear? And how shall we pass away our time? Which way may we gather and perpetuate our names and families in the earth? It is a mournful reflection, but a truth which will not be denied, that these worldly lusts fill up a great part of the study, care and conversation of Christendom.

The false notion that they may be children of God while in a state of disobedience to his holy commandments, and disciples of Jesus though they revolt from his cross, and members of his true church, which is without spot or wrinkle, notwithstanding their lives are full of spots and wrinkles, is of all other deceptions upon themselves the most pernicious to their eternal condition for they are at peace in sin and under a security in their transgression.

William Penn stated:

Read my "No Cross, No Crown." There is instruction. Make your conversation with the most eminent for wisdom and piety, and shun all wicked men as you hope for the blessing of God and the comfort of your father's living and dying prayers. Be sure you speak evil of none, not of the meanest, much less of your superiors as magistrates, guardians, teachers, and elders in Christ.

William Penn traveled and preached throughout Holland and Germany with George Fox, the founder of Quakerism. He met many persecuted Christians of various denominations, who desired to worship God in their own way without fear. In his account, Travels in Holland and Germany, William Penn recorded:

As I have been traveling, the great work of Christ in the earth has often been presented to my view, and the day of the Lord hath been deeply impressed upon me, and my soul and spirit hath frequently been possessed with an holy and weighty concern for the glory and name of the Lord and the spreading of his everlasting truth.

In 1670, William Penn's father, Sir William Penn, who had been a courageous admiral in the King's navy, died. King Charles II owed him a tremendous amount of money, but being short on funds, decided to repay him with a land grant in America. In 1681, as heir of his father's estate, William Penn received the grant from Charles II. The area consisted of all the land between Maryland and New York. The following year, Penn received from the Duke of York the territory that is now Delaware. William Penn had named the area "Sylvania," meaning "woodland," but King Charles II changed it to "Pennsylvania." The state has since become known as "The Quaker State," due to the members of the Society of Friends who helped found it.

On January 1, 1681, William Penn wrote to a friend concerning the land given to him, declaring he would:

Make and establish such laws as shall best preserve true Christian and civil liberty, in all opposition to all unchristian... practices.

I eyed the Lord in obtaining it and more was I drawn inward to look to Him, and to owe it to His hand and power than to any other way. I have so obtained it, and desire to keep it, that I may not be unworthy of His love. God that has given it to me, through many difficulties, will, I believe, bless and make it the seed of a nation.

William Penn was intent on making friends with the native inhabitants. He insisted on buying parcels of land from the Indians, rather than just taking it. History records that, due to his fair dealings, the colony never suffered an Indian attack. On August 18, 1681, in a letter to the Indians in Pennsylvania, William Penn stated:

My Friends:

There is one great God and Power that hath made the world and all things therein, to whom you and I and all people owe their being and well-being, and to whom you and I must one day give an account, for all that we do in the world; This great God hath written His law in our hearts by which we are taught and commanded to love and help and do good to one another and not to do harm and mischief one unto another....

Now this great God hath pleased to make me concerned in my parts of the world, and the king of the country where I live, hath given unto me a great province therein, but I desire to enjoy it with your love and consent, that we may always live together as neighbors and friends, else what would the great God say to us, who hath made us not to devour and destroy one another, but to live soberly and kindly together in the world....

I have great love and regard towards you, and I desire to gain your love and friendship by a kind, just and peaceable life, and the people I send are of the same mind, and shall in all things behave themselves accordingly....

I shall shortly come to you myself at which time we may more freely and largely confer and discourse of these matters. Receive those presents and tokens which I have sent to you as a testimony to my goodwill to you and my resolution to live justly, peaceably and friendly with you.

I am your loving friend, William Penn.

In 1682, William Penn, who had experienced religious persecution for his faith in England, established the colony as a land of religious freedom, granting toleration to every denomination. He printed advertisements in six different languages and sent them across Europe. Soon Quakers, Mennonites, Lutherans, Dunkards (Church of the Brethren), Moravians, Schwenkfelders, etc., from England, Sweden, Wales, Germany, Scotland and Ireland all began arriving in his "holy experiment." To emphasize his plan for Christians working together, he named their city "Philadelphia," which is Greek for "City of Brotherly Love." His concept was that religion is not to be limited to a Sunday ceremonial ritual, but should be an integral aspect of every day life, demonstrated by working with others.

In 1684, William Penn composed his Prayer for Philadelphia, displayed in the Philadelphia City Hall:

And thou, Philadelphia, the Virgin settlement of this province named before thou wert born, what love, what care, what service and what travail have there been to bring thee forth and preserve thee from such as would abuse and defile thee.

O that thou mayest be kept from the evil that would overwhelm thee. That faithful to the God of thy mercies, in the Life of Righteousness, thou mayest be preserved to the end. My soul prays to God for thee, that thou mayest stand in the day of trial, that thy children may be blest of the Lord and thy people saved by His Power.

William Penn labored to end slavery in the colonies, established a public grammar school in Philadelphia, 1689, and presented the first plan for a union of the colonies to the Board of Trade in London, 1697. On October 28, 1701, William Penn issued the Charter of Privileges to the province of Pennsylvania. In 1701, William Penn left Pennsylvania for London, unaware that he would never again return to his colony. In his farewell to the inhabitants of Pennsylvania, he stated:

You are come to a quiet land, and liberty and authority are in your hands. Rule for Him under whom the princes of this world will one day esteem it their honor to govern in their places.

William Penn wrote to Peter the Great, Czar of Russia:

If thou wouldst rule well, thou must rule for God, and to do that, thou must be ruled by him. . . . Those who will not be governed by God will be ruled by tyrants.

William Penn stated:

True Godliness doesn't turn men out of the World, but enables them to live better in it, and excites their endeavors to mend it.

In his Book of Psalms, William Penn stated:

Set forth and allowed to be sung in all churches, of all the people together, before and after morning and evening prayer, and moreover in private houses for their godly solace and comfort, laying apart all ungodly songs and ballads: which tend only to the nourishing of vice and corruption of youth.

In his sermon, A Summons or call to Christendom - In an earnest exhortation with her to prepare for the Great and Notable Day of the Lord that is at the Door, William Penn stated:

For in Jesus Christ, the light of the world, are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge; redemption and glory; they are hid from the worldly Christian, from all that are captivated by the spirit and lusts of the world:

and whoever would see them (for therein consists the things that belong to their eternal peace) must come to Christ Jesus the true light in their consciences, bring their deeds to Him, love Him and obey Him; whom God hath ordained a light to lighten the Gentiles, and for His salvation to the ends of the earth.

William Penn wrote:

My dear Wife and Children:

My love, which neither sea nor land nor death itself can extinguish or lessen toward you, most endearly visits you with eternal embraces, and will abide with you forever; and may the God of my life watch over you and bless you, and do good in this world and forever!

Some things are upon my spirit to leave with you in your respective capacities, as I am to the one a husband and to the rest a father, if I should never see you more in this world.

My dear wife, remember thou wast the love of my youth and much the joy of my life; the most beloved as well as the most worthy of all my earthly comforts; and the reason of that love was more thy inward than thy outward excellencies, which yet were many.

God knows, and thou knowest it, I can say it was a match of Providence's making and God's image in us both was the first thing, and the most amiable and engaging ornament in our eyes. Now I am to leave thee, and that without knowing whether I shall ever see thee more in this world; take my counsel into thy bosom and let it dwell with thee in my stead while thou livest.

First: Let the fear of the Lord and a zeal and love to his glory dwell richly in thy heart; and thou wilt watch for good over thyself and thy dear children and family, that no rude, light, or bad thing be committed; else God will be offended, and He will repent Himself of the good He intends thee and thine....

And now, my dearest, let me recommend to thy care my dear children; abundantly beloved of me as the Lord's blessings, and the sweet pledges of our mutual and endeared affection. Above all things endeavor to breed them up in the love and virtue, and that holy plain way of it which we have lived in, that the world in no part of it get into my family.

I had rather they were homely than finely bred as to outward behavior; yet I love sweetness mixed with gravity and cheerfulness tempered with sobriety. Religion in the heart leads into this true civility, teaching men and women to be mild and courteous in their behavior, an accomplishment worthy indeed of praise.

In 1819, the Biographical Review in London described William Penn as having:

Established an absolute toleration; it was his wish that every man who believed in God should partake of the rights of a citizen; and that every man who adored Him as a Christian, of whatever sect he might be, should be a partaker in authority.

Connecticut, Colony of (1647), passed the School Law of Connecticut, similar to the Old Deluder Satan Law passed in the Colony of Massachusetts, 1642. This law helped to prevent illiteracy, as well as the abuse of power over a population ignorant of Scriptures, as had been the case in Europe. The law stated:

It being one chiefe project of that old deluder, Sathan, to keepe men from the knowledge of the Scriptures, as in former time, and that learning may not be buried in the grave of our forefathers in church and Commonweal th....

It is therefore ordered by this Court... that every township within this jurisdiction, after the Lord hath increased them to the number of fifty howshoulders, shall forthwith appoint one within their towne, to teach all such children as shall resorte to him, to write and read....

and it is further ordered, That where any towne shall increase to the number of one hundred families or howshoulders, they shall sett up a grammar schoole for the universi ty.

Massachusetts Bay Colony, Cambridge Platform of the (1648), recorded in the Plymouth Colony Records IX, 1663, listed the proposal of William Vassall and others:

1. CHAP: XVII: Of The Civil Magistrates power in Matters Ecclesiastical.... It is lawfull, profitable, & necessary for christians to gather themselves into Church estate, and therein to exercise all the ordinances of Christ according unto the word,... because the Apostles & Christians in their time did frequently thus practise, when the Magistrates being all of them Jewish or pagan, & mostly persecuting enemies, would give no countenance or consent to such matters.

2. Church-government stands in no opposition to civil government of commonwealths, nor any intrencheth upon the authority of civil Magistrates in their jurisdictions; nor any wit weakeneth their hands in governing; but rather strengthneth them, & furthereth the people in yielding more hearty and conscionable obedience unto them, whatsoever some ill affected persons to the wayes of Christ have suggested to alienate the affections of Kings & Princes from the ordinances of Christ; as if the kingdome of Christ in his church could not rise & stand, without the falling and weakening of their government, which is also of Christ: whereas the contrary is most true, that they may both stand together & flourish the one being helpful to the other, in distinct and due administrations.

3. The power & authority of Magistrates is not for the restraining of churches, or any other good workes, but for helping in and furthering thereof; & therefore the consent & countenance of Magistrates when it may be had, is not to be slighted, or lightly esteemed; but on the contrary; it is part of that honour due to christian Magistrates to desire & crave their consent & approbation therein: which being obtayned, the churches may then proceed in their way with much more encouragement, & comfort.

4. It is not in the power of Magistrates to compell their subjects to become churchmembers, & to partake at the Lord's table:... Those whom the church is to cast out of they were in, the Magistrates ought not to thrust into the church, nor to hold them therein.

5. As it is unlawful for church-officers to meddle with the sword of the Magistrates, so is it unlawfull for the Magistrates to meddle with the work proper to church-officers...

6. It is the duty of the Magistrate, to take care of matters of religion, & to improve his civil authority for the observing of the duties commanded in the first, as well as for observing the duties commanded in the second table...

8. Idolatry, Blasphemy, Heresy, venting corrupt & pernicious opinions, that destroy the foundation, open contempt of the word preached, prophanation of the Lord's day, disturbing the peaceable administration & exercise of the worship & holy things of God, & the like, are to be restrayned, & punished by civil authority.

9. If any church one or more shall grow schismaticall, rending it self from the communion of other churched, or shall walke incorrigibly or obstinately in any corrupt way of their own, contrary to the rule of the word; in such a case, the Magistrate is to put forth his coercive powr, as the matter shall require. The tribes on this side Jordan intended to make warr against the other tribes, for building the altar of witness, whom they suspected to have turned away therin from following of the Lord. Finis.

New England, Synod of Churches of (September 30, 1648), defined the nature of civil government, the function of civil magistrates and the duties of citizens:

I. God, Supreme Lord and King of all the world, hath ordained civil magistrates to be under him, over the people, and for his own glory and the public good; and to this end hath armed them with the power of the sword for the defense and encouragement of them that do well, and for the punishment of evil-doers.

II. It is lawful for Christians to accept and execute the office of magistrate when called thereunto. In the management whereof, as they ought especially to maintain piety, justice, and peace, according to the wholesome laws of the Commonwealth, so for that end they may lawfully now, under the New Testament, wage war upon just and necessary occasions....

IV. It is the duty of the people to pray for magistrates, to honor their persons, to pay them tribute and other dues, to obey their lawful commands, and to be subject to their authority for conscience's sake.

Maryland, Toleration Act of (April 21, 1649), transformed the Colony of Maryland, which was founded initially as a refuge for persecuted Catholics, into a region that gave Christians of all denominations religious liberty:

Be it therefore...enacted...that no person or persons whatsoever within this province...professing to believe in Jesus Christ shall...from henceforth be any ways troubled, molested (or disapproved of)...in respect of his or her religion nor in the free exercise thereof.

The form of oath prescribed in Governor Stone's time avouched:

I do further swear that I will not myself, nor any other person, directly or indirectly, trouble, molest, or discountenance any person whatever, in the said province, professing to believe in Jesus Christ.

The Colony of Maryland required the every governor annually take an oath that they would not:

By themselves, or indirectly, to trouble, molest, or discountenance any person professing to believe in Jesus Christ, for or in respect of religion; and if any such were so molested, to protect the person molested, and punish the offender.

Connecticut General Court, Code of the (1650), in the Capital Laws Section of the Code, stated offenses and their punishments:

1. If any man after legal conviction shall have or worship any other God but the Lord God, he shall be put to death. Deut. 13:6, 17:2; Ex. 22:20.

2. If any man or woman be a witch, that is, has or consults with a familiar spirit, they shall be put to death. Ex. 22:18; Lev. 20:27; Deut. 18:10, 11.

3. If any person shall blaspheme the Name of God the Father, Son or Holy Ghost with direct, express, presumptuous, or high-handed blasphemy, or shall curse in the like manner, he shall be put to death. Lev. 24:15, 16.

6. If any man or woman shall lie with any beast or brute creature, by carnal copulation, they shall surely be put to death, and the beast shall be slain and buried. Lev. 20:15, 16.

7. If any man lies with mankind as he lies with a woman, both of them have committed abomination, they both shall surely be put to death. Lev. 20:13.

Phips, Sir William (February 2, 1651-February 18, 1695), was a colonial Governor of Massachusetts, 1692-95, who, during the French and Indian Wars, led the troops to capture the French colony of Port Royal. He stated:

I have divers times been in danger of my life; and I have been brought to see that I owe my life to Him who has given His precious life for me. I thank God He has led me to see myself altogether unhappy without an interest in the Lord Jesus Christ, and to close heartily with Him, desiring Him to execute all His offices on my behalf. I have now, for some time, been under serious resolution, that I should avoid whatever I knew to be displeasing to God, that I should serve Him all the days of my life....

I knew that if God had a people anywhere, it was here, and I resolved to rise or fall with them; neglecting very great advantages for my worldly interests, that I might come and enjoy the ordinances of the Lord Jesus here.

Dampier, William (August 1651-March 1757) was an English explorer and privateer, exploring the coasts of Australia, New Guinea and New Britain. In his popular book, A New Voyage Around the World, (1657), William Dampier recorded he:

Gave continual thanks to Almighty God...for His wonderful deliverance from so many and great dangers... The various and wonderful Works of God in different Parts of the World.

Tate, Nahum (1652-August 12, 1715), was honored by England's royalty with the title of poet-laureate, December 24, 1692. He was acclaimed for his version of Shakespeare's King Lear, and for co-authoring Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel. In 1700, in his Christmas Hymn, Nahum Tate wrote:

While shepherds watched their flocks by night,
All seated on the ground,
The angel of the Lord came down,
And glory shone around.

Defoe, Daniel (c.1660-April 24, 1731), was an English author who was one of the originators of the English novel. A merchant by profession, he began writing pamphlets against the Anglican High Church, for which he was fined and placed in stocks. Being nearly 60 years of age, Daniel Defoe began writing novels, his most popular of which were: Robinson Crusoe, 1719; Moll Flanders, 1722, and A Journal of the Plague Year, 1722.

In volume III of A Selection from the Works of Daniel Defoe, he wrote:

In what glorious colors do the Scriptures, upon all occasions, represent these two hand-in-hand graces, faith and repentance? There is not one mention of faith in the whole Scriptures but what is recommended in some way or other to our admiration, and to our practice; it is the foundation and the top-stone of all religion, the right hand to lead, and the left hand to support, in the whole journey of the Christian, even through this world, and into the next; in a word, it is the sum and substance of the Gospel foundation.

How incongruous is it to the decoration of the government, that a man should be punished for drunkenness and set in stocks for swearing, but shall have liberty to deny the God of Heaven, and dispute against the very sum and substance of the Christian doctrine; shall banter the Scripture, and make ballads of the Pentateuch; turn all the principles of religion, the salvation of the soul, the death of our Saviour, and the revelation of the Gospel into ridicule.

And shall we pretend to reformation of manners, and suppressing immoralities, while such as this is the general mixture of conversation?

If a man talk against the government, or speak scurrilously of the King, he is led to the old Bailey, and from thence to the pillory, or whipping-post, and it should be so; but he may speak treason against the Majesty of Heaven, deny the Godhead of the Redeemer, and make a jest of the Holy Ghost, and thus affront the Power we all adore, and yet with impunity.

In a satirical poem written in 1701, entitled The True Born Englishman, Daniel Defoe quipped:

Whenever God erects a house of prayer
The devil always builds a chapel there;
And 'twill be found, upon examination,
The latter has the largest congregation.

Virginia, Commonwealth of (1662), enacted:

Enacted that the Lord's Day be kept holy, and no journeys be made on that day, unless upon necessity. And all persons inhabiting in this country, having no lawful excuse, shall, every Sunday, resort to the parish church or chapel, and there abide orderly during the common prayer, preaching, and divine service.

Carolina, Charter of (1663), was granted by King Charles II to Sir William Berkeley and the seven other Lord proprietors. Named "Carolina" or "Charles' Land," after King Charles I of England, it had initially been granted by Charles I to Sir Robert Heath, 1629. English colonists began to settle the area permanently in the in the 1650's. The first governor, William Sayle, was a Nonconformist and allowed religious toleration to all denominations: Calvinists and Baptists from England and parts of New England, Huguenot Protestants from France, Episcopalians, Scotch-Irish Presbyterians, Lutherans, German Reformed, Moravians, etc. Many Christians began to settle in North Carolina beginning in 1653, with some of the most notable being the Quaker missionaries. Even George Fox, the founder of Quakerism, preached there. At a later date, the Quaker family of Daniel Boone, along with others, pioneered the Yadkin River Valley along the North Carolina frontier. The first Baptist congregation was formed there in 1727, followed later by the Methodist congregations, who recognized Negro ministers and preached strongly against slavery.

The Charter of Carolina, 1663, stated:

Being excited with a laudable and pious zeal for the propagation of the Christian faith... have humbly besought leave of us... to transport and make an ample colony... unto a certain country... in the parts of America not yet cultivated or planted, and only inhabited by some barbarous people, who have no knowledge of Almighty God.

Carolina's Fundamental Constitutions of the (1663), were drawn up by the philosopher, John Locke, at the request of Sir William Berkeley and the seven other Lord proprietors of the colony. It stated:

No man shall be permitted to be a freeman of Carolina, or to have any estate of habitation within it that doth not acknowledge a God, and that God is publicly and solemnly to be worshiped.

[No person may use] reproachful, reviling, or abusive language [against any religion.]

Carter, Robert "King" (1663-August 4, 1732), was Lieutenant Commander of the counties of Lancaster and Northumberland, 1715, and Governor of the Virginia Colony, approved by King George II in July of 1726. He owned over 300,00 acres; was a Member of the House of Burgesses at Jamestown; Colonial Treasurer; President of the Council; Speaker of the House; Chairman of the powerful Committee of Propriations and Grievances, and was acting rector of the College of William and Mary. His descendants include two U.S. Presidents, six governors of Virginia, and he was the father of Anne Hill Carter, who married Revolutionary War hero Light Horse Harry Lee, whose son was Robert E. Lee. In Lancaster County, Virginia, Robert Carter helped build Christ Church, where he served as a vestryman.

Robert Carter's son, John, who traveled to England in pursuit of an education, temporarily squandered his father's money. After accumulating numerous debts, the young Carter repented. On July 22, 1720, Robert Carter wrote to Mr. Perry, his son's guardian in England:

My son, I find, upon the stool of repentance. It will be well he will come to his senses at last....He begs of me to forget his past extravagances, and desires I may not insist upon a particular account from him, and that he will give me no more occasion of future complaints. Upon these terms I am willing....Thus you see I am no stranger to the story of the Gospel.

On July 23, 1720, Robert Carter wrote:

Dear Son John:

May Heaven keep you fixed to this resolution without wavering. It will prove a cordial to your heart all the days of your life. Upon these hopes I shall pass over what's past....Pray take a little more care of your brothers in England. The rest is to beg God's blessing upon you.

Robert Carters epitaph stated:

Robert Carter, Esq., an honorable man, who exalted his high birth by noble endowments and pure morals. He sustained the College of William and Mary in the most trying times. He was Governor, Speaker of the House and Treasurer....He built and endowed at his own expense, this sacred edifice, a lasting monument of his piety to God.

Mather, Cotton (February 12, 1663-February 13, 1728), was an American colonial clergyman and educator. He graduated from Harvard, 1678, and joined his father, Increase Mather, in the pastorate of the Second Church in Boston, 1680. The House of Representatives had attempted to appoint him President of Harvard, 1703. He helped found Yale University, and in 1721, became President of the Connecticut College. He authored 450 books, and was the first person born in America to be elected to the Royal Society of London. Cotton Mather was regarded as the most brilliant man of New England in his time. Among his many accomplishments was the introduction of the smallpox inoculation during an epidemic in 1721.

In 1702, Cotton Mather published Magnalia Christi Americana (The Great Achievement of Christ in America), which is the most detailed history written of the first 50 years of New England. In it, he stated:

I write the wonders of the Christian religion, flying from the depravations of Europe, to the American strand: and, assisted by the Holy Author of that religion, I do, with all conscience of truth, required therein by Him, who is the Truth itself, report the wonderful displays of His infinite power, wisdom, goodness, and faithfulness, wherewith his Divine Providence hath irradiated an Indian wilderness.

The sum of the matter is that from the beginning of the Reformation in the English nation, there had always been a generation of godly men, desirous to pursue the reformation of religion, according to the Word of God... [though resisted by individuals with] power... in their hands... not only to stop the progress of the desired reformation but also, with innumerable vexation, to persecute those that heartily wish well unto it... [The Puritans were] driven to seek a place for the exercise of the Protestant religion, according to the light of conscience, in the deserts of America.

In observing the rising trend in the Colonies, Cotton Mather wrote:

Religion begat prosperity, and the daughter devoured the mother.

Benjamin Franklin, as a young man, visited the Rev. Cotton Mather, who proffered this advice as Franklin approached a low-hanging beam in Mather's parsonage:

You are young and have the world before you; stoop as you go through it, and you will miss many hard bumps.

Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Charter of (July 8, 1663), was granted by King Charles II, in the 14th year of his reign, to Roger Williams. In 1636, Williams left Massachusetts with his followers, for the purpose of religious freedom, and founded Providence Plantation. There they established the First Baptist Church in America in 1639. The colonial patent of 1644 was confirmed by the Royal Charter of 1663, which read:

We submit our persons, lives, and estates unto our Lord Jesus Christ, the King of kings and Lord of Lords and to all those perfect and most absolute laws of His given us in His Holy Word.

That they, pursueing, with peaceable and loyal mindes, sober, serious and religious intentions, of godlie edifieng themselves, and one another, in the holie Christian ffaith and worshipping... together with the gaineing over and conversione of the poore ignorant Indian natives... to sincere professions and obedienc of the same faith and worshipping... a most flourishing civill state may stand and best be maintained, . . . with a full liberty in religious concerns, and that true piety, rightly grounded upon gospel principles, will lay in the hearts of men the strongest obligations to true loyalty.

New York Colony, Colonial Legislature of (1665), enacted:

Whereas, The public worship of God is much discredited for want of painful [serious] and able ministers to instruct the people in the true religion, it is ordered that a church shall be built in each parish, capable of holding two hundred persons; that ministers of every church shall preach every Sunday, and pray for the king, queen, the Duke of York, and the royal family; and to marry persons after legal publication of license. . .

Sunday is not to be profaned by traveling, by laborers, or vicious persons. . .

Church wardens to report twice a year all misdemeanors, such as swearing, profaneness, Sabbath-breaking, drunkenness, fornication, adultery, and all such abominable sins.

Harris, John (c.1666-September 7, 1719), was an English mathematician. He edited The Dictionary of Arts and Sciences, 1704, which was the first encyclopedia in the English language. He was vice-president of the Royal Society and participated in giving the Boyle Lectures which defended the Christian faith.

The lectures given by John Harris in 1698, were entitled:

Atheistical Objections Against the Being of God and His Attributes, Fairly Considered and Fully Refuted.

Virginia, Commonwealth of (1668), enacted:

The 27th of August appointed for a day of humiliation, fasting, and prayer, to implore God's mercy: if any person by found upon that day gaming, drinking, or working (works of necessity excepted), upon presentment by church-wardens and proof, he shall be fined one hundred pounds of tobacco.

Watts, Isaac (July 17, 1674-November 25, 1748), was an English dissenting theologian, poet and hymn writer. He composed over 600 hymns, many of which are still sung. His work, Isaac Watts' Psalms, Hymns, and Spiritual Songs, 1707, was chosen, along with the Bible, as a principal textbook to teach reading in the public schools of the District of Columbia by President Thomas Jefferson, who chaired the school board and authored the city's first plan of education.

In his Psalms, Hymns, and Spiritual Songs, 1707, Isaac Watts wrote the carol, "Joy to the World":

Joy to the World, the Lord is come,
Let earth receive her King;
Let every heart, prepare Him room,
And Heaven and nature sing,

And Heaven and nature sing,
And Heaven, and Heaven, and nature sing!

Joy to the World, the Savior reigns,
Let men their songs employ;
While fields and floods, rocks, hills and plains
Repeat the sounding joy,
Repeat the sounding joy,
Repeat, Repeat, the sounding joy!

He rules the world with truth and grace,
And makes the nations prove,
The glories of His righteousness
And wonders of His love,
And wonders of His love,
And wonders, and wonders, of His love!

Isaac Watts wrote:

The Excellency of the Bible:

The stars, that in their courses roll,
Have much instruction given;
But thy good Word informs my soul
How I may climb to heaven.

How glad the heathens would have been,
That worship idols, wood and stone,
If they the book of God had seen,
Or Jesus and his gospel known!

Praise to God for Learning to Read:

And make me holy too.

In Psalm 90, 1719, st. 1, Isaac Watts wrote:

O God, our help in ages past,
Our hope for years to come,
Our shelter from the stormy blast,
And our eternal home.

Logan, James (October 20, 1674-October 31, 1751), was the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1731-39, and private Secretary of William Penn. He stated:

Remember thou art by profession a Christian; that is, one who art called after the immaculate Lamb of God, who, by offering Himself a sacrifice for thee, atoned for thy sins. . . . Rouse with the more simple servants of nature, and borrowing one hour from the sleep of sluggards, spend it in thy chamber in dressing thy soul with prayer and meditation, reading the Scriptures. . . .

Remember that the same enemy that caused thy first parents to forfeit their blessed condition, notwithstanding the gate is now open for restoration, is perpetually using his whole endeavors to prevent thee from attaining this, and frustrate to thee the passion of thy Redeemer.

Bienville, Jean Baptiste LeMoyne Sieur de (February 23, 1680-March 7, 1768), was the French naval officer who founded New Orleans. Born in Canada, he helped to colonize French Louisiana and served as its Colonial Governor various times during the period 1701 and 1743.

In his Last Will and Testament, Jean Baptiste LeMoyne Sieur de Bienville:

In the name of the Father, etc. Persuaded, as I am, of the necessity of death, and the uncertainty of the hour, I wish, before it arrives, to put my affairs in order. First, I consign my soul to God...I implore the mercy of God and of Jesus Christ, my Saviour.

Pennsylvania, Charter of (1681), was granted to William Penn by King Charles II of England, in payment of a large debt he owed to Penn's father, who had been an Admiral in the king's navy. When his father died, 1670, William Penn inherited his estate. The area consisted of all the land between Maryland and New York. The following year Penn received from the Duke of York the territory that is now Delaware. William Penn had named the area "Sylvania," meaning "woodland," but King Charles II changed it to "Pennsylvania." The state has since become known as "The Quaker State," due to the members of the Society of Friends who helped found it.

The Charter of Pennsylvania, 1681, stated:

Whereas our trusty and well beloved subject, William Penn, Esquire, son and heir of Sir William Penn, deceased, out of a commendable desire to enlarge our English Empire and promote such useful commodities as may be of benefit to us and our dominions, and also to reduce the savage natives by gentle and just manners to the Love of Civil Societe and Christian religion, hath humbly besought leave of us to transport an ample colony unto a certain country hereinafter describe in the parts of America not yet cultivated and planted.

Pennsylvania, Frame of Government of (April 25, 1682), composed by William Penn, stated in the preface:

When the great and wise God had made the world of all His creatures, it pleased him to chose man His deputy to rule it; and to fit him for so great a charge and trust, He did not only qualify him with skill and power but with integrity to use them justly....

The origination and descent of all human power [comes] from God... This settles the divine right of government beyond exception, and that for two ends: first, to terrify evil doers; secondly, to cherish those that do well; which gives government a life beyond corruption, and makes it as durable in the world, as good men shall be.

So that government seems to me a part of religion itself, a thing sacred in its institution and end. For, if it does not directly remove the cause, it crushes the effects of evil, and is as such, (though a lower, yet) an emanation of the same Divine Power, that is both the author and object of pure religion....

Government, like clocks, go from the motion men give them; and as governments are made and moved by men, so by them they are ruined too. Wherefore governments rather depend upon men, than men upon governments. Let men be good, and the government cannot be bad... But if men be bad, let the government be never so good, they will endeavor to warp and spoil it to their turn. I know some say, "Let us have good laws and no matter for the men that execute them." But let them consider that though good laws do well, good men do better, for good laws may want good men and be abolished or invaded by ill men; but good men will never want good laws nor suffer ill ones....

That, therefore, which makes a good constitution must keep it, - namely men of wisdom and virtue, - qualities that, because they descend not with worldly inheritances, must be carefully propagated by a virtuous education of youth....

[Be it enacted] that all persons... having children... shall cause such to be instructed in reading and writing, so that they may be able to read the Scriptures and to write by the time they attain to 12 years of age.

The Fundamental Constitutions stated:

I. Constitution.

Considering that it is impossible that any People or Government should ever prosper, where men render not unto God, that which is God's, as well as to Caesar, that which is Caesar's; and also perceiving that disorders and Mischiefs that attend those places where force is used in matters of faith and worship, and seriously reflecting upon the tenure of the new and Spiritual Government, and that both Christ did not use force and that he did expressly forbid it in his holy Religion, as also that the Testimony of his blessed Messengers was, that the weapons of the Christian warfare were not Carnal but Spiritual....

Therefore, in reverence to God the Father of Lights and spirits, the Author as well as object of all divine knowledge, faith and worship, I do hereby declare for me and mine and establish it for the first fundamental of the Government of my Country; that every Person that does or shall reside therein shall have and enjoy the Free Possession of his or her faith and exercise of worship towards God, in such way and manner as every Person shall in Conscience believe is most acceptable to God and so long as every such Person useth not this Christian Liberty to Licentiousness, that is to say to speak loosely and prophainly of God, Christ or Religion, or to Commit any evil in their Conversation [behavior], he or she shall be protected in the enjoyment of the aforesaid Christian Liberty by the civil Magistrate.

Article XXII. That as often as any day of the month, mentioned in any article of this charter, shall fall upon the first day of the week, commonly called the Lord's Day, the business appointed for that day shall be deferred till the next day, unless in the case of emergency.

Pennsylvania, Great Law of (December 7, 1682), the first legislative act of Pennsylvania, stated:

Whereas the glory of Almighty God and the good of mankind is the reason and the end of government, and, therefore government itself is a venerable Ordinance of God... [let there be established] laws as shall best preserve true Christian and Civil Liberty, in opposition to all unchristian, licentious, and unjust practices, whereby God may have his due, and Caesar his due, and the people their due, from tyranny and oppression.

That no person, now or at any time hereafter, Living in this Province, who shall confess and acknowledge one Almighty God to be the Creator, Upholder and Ruler of the World, And who professes, him or herself Obligated in Conscience to Live peaceably and quietly under the civil government, shall in any case be molested or prejudiced for his, or her Conscientious persuasion or practice.

Nor shall he or she at any time be compelled to frequent or maintain any religious worship, place of Ministry whatever, Contrary to his, or her mind, but shall freely and fully enjoy his, or her, Christian Liberty in that respect, without any Interruption or reflection.

And if any person shall abuse or deride any other, for his, or her different persuasion and practice in matters of religion, such person shall be looked upon as a Disturber of the peace, and be punished accordingly.

Handel, George Frederick (February 23, 1685-April 14, 1759), was a German-born musical composer who settled in England, 1712, considered one of the foremost composers of the baroque era. He is renowned for having written the immortal oratorio, Messiah, 1742, completed in just twenty-five days. Written for the benefit program of the Dublin Foundling Hospital, this oratorio was so stirring that when King George II heard the "Hallelujah Chorus," he rose to his feet, at which point the entire audience stood.

George Frederick Handel wrote oratorios, operas, organ concertos, orchestra concertos, as well as music for the wind instruments, harpsichord and drums. A gifted composer, Handel was known for having a temper in his youth. Once, challenged to a sword duel by another young musician, Handel would have been killed had not his opponent's sword struck a button on his coat. Handel's other great works include: Water Music, 1717; Saul, 1739; Israel in Egypt, 1739; Belshazzar, 1745; and Music for the Royal Fireworks, 1749.

In his masterpiece Messiah, 1742, George Frederick Handel wrote the line:

I know that my Redeemer liveth.

In reflecting on the "Hallelujah Chorus" in Messiah, 1742, Handel expressed:

I did think I did see all heaven before me, and the great God Himself.

In 1751-52, with the onset of blindness, Handel retired. As he was taken in this last illness, having been blind for seven years, George Frederick Handel expressed he was:

In hopes of meeting his good God, his sweet (precious) Saviour, on the day of His resurrection.

Bach, Johann Sebastian (March 21, 1685-July 28, 1750), was a German composer, considered the "master of masters," combining the polyphonic tradition of Baroque music with harmonic innovations. He held positions at the court of the Duke of Weimar, the court of Prince Leopold of Kothlen, and directed music at St. Thomas's School at Leipzig. The majority of his choral works are of religious inspiration, as seen in his over 200 cantatas, including Passion According to St. Matthew Passion, Passion According to St. John Passion, B Minor Mass and Christmas Oratorio. His great organ and keyboard works include The Well-Tempered Clavier and the Goldberg Variations. Among his instrumental masterpieces are pieces for the cello, the solo violin and the Brandenburg Concertos.

Johann Sebastian Bach composed a cantata which expressed the fervency of his faith in Christ's atoning work on the cross, entitled:

Jesus, Meine Freude. (Jesus, My Joy!)

In expressing his conviction concerning the purpose of music, Johann Sebastian Bach asserted:

The aim and final end of all music should be none other than the glory of God and the refreshment of the soul. If heed is not paid to this, it is not true music but a diabolical bawling and twanging.

Dr. Thomas R. Rossin, director of the professional chamber choir and orchestra Exultate, studied for his doctoral dissertation the notes Johann Sebastian Bach had made in his personal Bible, which was a three volume set of the Calov Bible written in German by the noted 17th century Lutheran theologian Abraham Calov. The Bible, found in a Michigan farmhouse in 1934, had belonged for over a century to a family which was unaware of its historical value, until a visiting pastor recognized Bach's monogram on the title page. The volumes were authenticated and donated to the Concordia Seminary in St. Louis, Missouri.

The foremost authority on the over 400 personal notations Bach had made in his Bible, Dr. Rossin stated: "Only three percent of the markings relate to music, and there's only one reference to a specific piece of music. Otherwise we learn about the man Bach, his personality, and that he really was believing what he was writing, that his music was not just a reflection of his job... He was employed by the church to write church music, so of course he was going to write that [he was an orthodox Lutheran.] But now we have proof - things that Bach wrote in there point directly to his personal faith. He wrote for his own edification, not for anyone else to read... No longer can we have purely academic performances where all the notes are lined up right and the phrases are beautiful and it's done musically. It has to be more than that. One must understand the theology in order to perform the music well."

In his personal Bible, Johann Sebastian Bach made the notation:

In devotional music, God is always present with His grace."

In his personal Bible, Johann Sebastian Bach made the notation near the 25th chapter of First Chronicles:

This chapter is the true foundation of all God-pleasing church music.

Pope, Alexander (May 21, 1688-May 30, 1744), was the greatest English poet and satirist of the early 1700's. Ranking with Shakespeare in influence, his works include: Ode to Solitude, 1700-09; An Essay on Criticism, 1711; The Rape of the Lock, 1712, 1714; Dunciad, 1728; An Essay on Man, 1733; The Universal Prayer, 1738; Imitations of Horace, 1733; and The Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, 1735. In An Essay of Criticism, 1711, Alexander Pope wrote:

To err is human, to forgive divine.

Fools rush in where angels fear to tread.

In Of the Character of Women, 1735, 1744, Alexander Pope wrote:

A very heathen in the carnal part
Yet still a sad, good Christian at her heart.

In An Essay on Man, 1733, Epistle I, line 95, Alexander Pope wrote:

Hope springs eternal in the human breast.

In An Essay on Man, Epistle IV, line 247, Alexander Pope stated:

A wit's a feather, and a chief a rod;
An honest man's the noblest work of God.

Montesquieu, Baron Charles Louis Joseph de Secondat (January 18, 1689-February 10, 1755), was a French political philosopher who greatly influenced nineteenth century thought. He wrote Persian Letters, 1721, which was a satirical reflection on France's sociopolitical institutions. In 1748, he wrote The Spirit of the Laws, introducing a revolutionary concept of government where the powers of a monarch were divided into judicial, legislative and executive bodies to guarantee individual freedoms. In reviewing nearly 15,000 items written by the Founding Fathers, including newspaper articles, monographs, books, pamphlets, etc., Baron Charles Montesquieu was the most frequently quoted source next to the Bible.

In the beginning of his work The Spirit of the Laws, 1748, Baron Montesquieu wrote:

God is related to the universe, as Creator and Preserver; the laws by which He created all things are those by which He preserves them....

But the intelligent world is far from being so well governed as the physical. For though the former has also its laws, which of their own nature are invariable, it does not conform to them so exactly as the physical world. This is because, on the one hand, particular intelligent beings are of a finite nature, and consequently liable to error; and on the other, their nature requires them to be free agents. Hence they do not steadily conform to their primitive laws; and even those of their own instituting they frequently infringe....

Man, as a physical being, is like other bodies governed by invariable laws. As an intelligent being, he incessantly transgresses the laws established by God, and changes those of his own instituting. He is left to his private direction, though a limited being, and subject, like all finite intelligences, to ignorance and error: even his imperfect knowledge he loses; and as a sensible creature, he is hurried away by a thousand impetuous passions.

Such a being might every instant forget his Creator; God has therefore reminded him of his duty by the laws of religion. Such a being is liable every moment to forget himself; philosophy has provided against this by the laws of morality. Formed to live in society, he might forget his fellow-creatures; legislators have therefore, by political and civil laws, confined him to his duty.

Montesquieu understood the inherently selfish nature of man, and that, opportunity provided, he would accumulate more and more power unto himself, becoming despotic. He based this understanding on Jeremiah 17: 9:

The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked: who can know it?

Montesquieu's philosophy, therefore, promulgated the idea that powers of government should be separated into branches, allowing power to check power in order to safeguard personal liberty. His concept of three branches of Government: Judicial, Legislative and Executive, was based on Isaiah 33: 22:

For the Lord is our Judge, the Lord is our Lawgiver, the Lord is our king.

In The Spirit of the Laws, 1748, Montesquieu wrote:

The Christian religion, which orders men to love one another, no doubt wants the best political laws and the best civil laws for each people, because those laws are, after [religion], the greatest good that men can give and receive.

Nor is there liberty if the power of judging is not separated from legislative power and from executive power. If it [the power of judging] were joined to legislative power, the power over life and liberty of the citizens would be arbitrary, for the judge would be the legislator. If it were joined to executive power, the judge could have the force of an oppressor. All would be lost if the same...body of principal men...exercised these three powers.

In Book XXIV of The Spirit of the Laws, Montesquieu wrote:

I have always respected religion; the morality of the Gospel is the noblest gift ever bestowed by God on man. We shall see that we owe to Christianity, in government, a certain political law, and in war a certain law of nations - benefits which human nature can never sufficiently acknowledge.

The principles of Christianity, deeply engraved on the heart, would be infinitely more powerful than the false honor of monarchies, than the humane virtues of republics, or the servile fear of despotic states.

It is the Christian religion that, in spite of the extent of empire and the influence of climate, has hindered despotic power from being established in Ethiopia, and has carried into the heart of Africa the manners and laws of Europe.

The Christian religion is a stranger to mere despotic power. The mildness so frequently recommended in the Gospel is incompatible with the despotic rage with which a prince punishes his subjects, and exercises himself in cruelty....

A moderate Government is most agreeable to the Christian Religion, and a despotic Government to the Mahomedan....While the Mahomedan princes incessantly give or receive death, the religion of the Christians renders their princes less timid, and consequently less cruel.

The prince confides in his subjects, and the subjects in the prince. How admirable the religion which, while it only seems to have in view the felicity of the other life, continues the happiness of this!

Society...must repose on principles that do not change.

Connecticut, Colony of (1690), in the Legislature, passed the law:

This [Legislature] observing that...there are many persons unable to read the English tongue and thereby incapable to read the holy Word of God or the good laws of this colony...it is ordered that all parents and masters shall cause their respective children and servants, as they are capable, to be taught to read distinctly the English tongue.

New England Primer (1691), was in its second edition, as recorded in an advertisement by Benjamin Harris of Boston. The oldest extant copy is dated 1737. It was used to teach colonial era children the alphabet, by the use of illustrations and rhyme:

A In ADAM'S Fall

William and Mary, College of (1692), was named for King William III, Prince of Orange (1650-1702) and Queen Mary II (1662-1694), who jointly ruled England and after James II was driven to out. The second oldest college in the United States, it was founded in Williamsburg, Virginia, through the efforts of Reverend James Blair (1656-1743), who was its first president, 1693-1743.

James Blair was born and educated in Scotland, moved to England, where he met Dr. Compton, Bishop of London. In 1685, he was sent as a missionary to colonial Virginia, where he was appointed Commissary of the Bishop of London for the Province in order to reform the Anglican Church there. Blair received a seat on the colonial council which heard trials pertaining to clergymen, 1689-1743. He was president of the Virginia Council and acting governor of the Colony of Virginia, 1740-41. James Blair served as minister in Bruton Parish Church in Williamsburg, 1710-43, and published Our Saviour's Divine Sermon on the Mount, 1722.

In 1749, George Washington received his surveyor's commission from the College of William and Mary, and from 1788 to 1799, served as the College's Chancellor. Benjamin Franklin received an honorary degree of Master of Arts from the College in 1756. In 1782, the College bestowed Thomas Jefferson with a degree of Doctor of Civil Law under George Wythe. Notable alumni of the College of William and Mary include: President James Monroe, President John Tyler, Chief Justice John Marshall, and Peyton Randolph, who was the first president of the Continental Congress, as well as sixteen other members of the Continental Congress.

The Charter of the College of William and Mary, granted to James Blair, 1692, stated:

William and Mary, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, King and Queen, Defenders of the Faith, to all whom these our present Letters shall come, greeting.

Forasmuch as our well-beloved and trusty Subjects, constituting the General Assembly of our Colony of Virginia, have had it in their minds, and have proposed to themselves, to the end that the Church of Virginia may be furnished with a Seminary of Ministers of the Gospel;

And that the Youth may be piously educated in Good Letters and Manners, and that the Christian Faith may be propagated amongst the Western Indians, to the glory of God.

In 1792, the requirements of the College of William and Mary stated:

The students shall attend prayers in chapel at the time appointed and there demean themselves with that decorum which the sacred duty of public worship requires.

Voltaire (November 21, 1694-May 30, 1778), whose given name was Francois Marie Arouet, was a French author. In a letter to M. Damilaville, May 16, 1767, Voltaire wrote:

I have never made but one prayer to God, a very short one: "O Lord, make my enemies ridiculous." And God granted it.

Voltaire expressed:

Every man is guilty of all the good he didn't do.

New Jersey, Colony of (1697), Governor Basse stated:

It being very necessary for the good and prosperity of this province that our principal care be, in obedience to the laws of God, to endeavor as much as in us lyeth the extirpation of all sorts of looseness and profanity, and to unite in the fear and love of God and one another, ..

Take due care that all laws made and provided for the suppression of vice and encouraging of religion and virtue, particularly the observance of the Lord's day, be duly put into execution.

New Jersey, Seal of the Province of (1697), had inscribed on it Proverbs 14: 34:

Righteousness exalteth a nation.

Yale College (1701), was founded by ten Congregational ministers as the Collegiate School at Killingworth, Milford and Saybrook, Connecticut. In 1716, it was moved to New Haven, Connecticut, and in 1718, it was renamed Yale College, after the benefactor Elihu Yale (1649-1721). An American-born English merchant, Elihu Yale amassed a considerable fortune as governor of the East India Company. He donated books and goods to the college from his estate in the amount of $2,800.

The act authorizing the new college, passed by the General Court, declared it to be an institution in which:

Youth may be instructed in the Arts and Sciences who through the blessing of Almighty God may be fitted for Publick employment both in Church and Civil State.

On November 11, 1701, the purpose of Yale College was recorded in the proceedings of the Trustees:

To plant, and under ye Divine blessing to propagate in this Wilderness, the blessed Reformed, Protestant Religion, in ye purity of its Order, and Worship.

The rules of Yale College, set by the founders, stated:

Whereunto the Liberal, and Religious Education of Suitable youth is under ye blessing of God, a chief, & most probable expedient...we agree to...these Rules:

1. The said rector shall take Especial Care as of the moral Behaviour of the Students at all Times so with industry to Instruct and Ground Them well in Theoretical divinity...and [not to] allow them to be Instructed and Grounded in any other Systems or Synopses....To recite the Assemblies Catechism in Latin...[and] such Explanations as may be (through the Blessing of God) most Conducive to their Establishment in the Principles of the Christian protestant Religion.
2. That the said Rector shall Cause the Scriptures Daily...morning and evening to be read by the Students at the times of prayer in the School...Expound practical Theology...Repeat Sermons...studiously Endeavor[ing] in the Education of said students to promote the power and the Purity of Religion and Best Edification and peace of these New England Churches.

The founders of Yale College stated:

Every student shall consider the main end of his study to wit to know God in Jesus Christ and answerably to lead a Godly, sober life.

In 1720, the students of Yale College were instructed:

Seeing God is the giver of all wisdom, every scholar, besides private or secret prayer, where all we are bound to ask wisdom, shall be present morning and evening at public prayer in the hall at the accustomed hour.

In 1745, Yale College stated it:

Has received the favourable benefactions of many liberal and piously disposed persons, and under the blessing of Almighty God has trained up many worthy persons for the service of God in the state as well as in the church.

In 1755, students of Yale College were instructed:

Above all have an eye to the great end of all your studies, which is to obtain the clearest conceptions of Divine things and to lead you to a saving knowledge of God in his Son Jesus Christ.

In 1787, the requirements of Yale College stated:

All scholars are required to live a religious and blameless life according to the rules of God's Word, diligently reading the Holy Scriptures, that fountain of truth, and constantly attending all the duties of religion, both in public and secret....

All the scholars are obliged to attend Divine worship in the College Chapel on the Lord's Day and on Days of Fasting and Thanksgiving appointed by public Authority.

Benjamin Silliman, a noted American science educator and editor, served on the faculty of Yale College during the tenure of President Timothy Dwight, 1795-1817. He recorded his observations of the campus:

It would delight your heart to see how the trophies of the cross are multiplied in this institution. Yale College is a little temple: prayer and praise seem to be the delight of the greater part of the students.

Pennsylvania, Charter of Privileges of (October 28, 1701), issued by William Penn, stated:

Because no People can be truly happy, though under the greatest Enjoyments of Civil Liberties, if abridged of the Freedom of their Consciences, as to their Religious Profession and Worship:

And Almighty God being the only Lord of Conscience, Father of Lights and Spirits; and the Author as well as Object of all divine Knowledge, Faith and Worship, who only doth enlighten the Minds, and persuade and convince the Understandings of People, I do hereby grant and declare:

That no Person or Persons, inhabiting in this province or Territories, who shall confess and acknowledge One Almighty God, the Creator, Upholder and Ruler of the World; and profess Him or themselves obliged to live quietly under the Civil Government, shall be in any Case molested or prejudiced, in his or their Person or estate, because of his or their conscientious Persuasion of Practice, nor be compelled to frequent or maintain any religious Worship, Place or Ministry, contrary to his or their Mind, or to do or suffer any other Act or Thing, contrary to their religious Persuasion.

And that all persons who also profess to believe in Jesus Christ, the Savior of the World, shall be capable (notwithstanding their other Persuasions and Practices in Point of Conscience and Religion) to serve this government in any capacity, both Legislatively or executively, he or they solemnly promising, when lawfully required, allegiance to the King as Sovereign, and fidelity to the Proprietary and Governor, and taking the Attests as now established by the Law made at New Castle, in the Year One Thousand and Seven Hundred, entitled, An Act directing the Attests of several Officers and Ministers, as now amended and confirmed this present Assembly.

Wesley, John (June 17, 1703-March 2, 1791), was an evangelist and religious leader who founded the Methodist denomination. While students at Oxford University, he and his brother Charles formed a scholarly Christian group called, the "Holy Club." The Wesleys were close friends with George Whitefield, the renowned preacher of the American Great Awakening. In 1738, the Wesleys set sail from England to Georgia to serve as missionaries. During the tumultuous voyage at sea, they observed the faith of the Moravian Christians. There was awakened within them a desire for a more intimate relationship with God, eventually leading them to faith in Christ. Together with George Whitefield, John and Charles Wesley were among the most influential ministers of the 1700's.

In his journal, John Wesley wrote:

On shipboard, however, I was again active in outward works: where it pleased God, of his free mercy, to give me twenty-six of the Moravian brethren for companions, who endeavored to shew me a more excellent way.

But I understood it not at first. I was too learned and too wise; so that it seemed foolishness unto me. And I continued...trusting in that righteousness whereby no flesh can be justified.

All the time I was at Savannah I was thus beating the air. Being ignorant of the righteousness of Christ, which, by a living faith in him bringeth salvation to every one that believeth, I sought to establish my own righteousness, and so laboured in the fire all my days.

In my return to England, January 1738, being in imminent danger of death, and very uneasy on that account, I was strongly convinced that the cause of uneasiness was unbelief, and that the gaining a true, living faith was the one thing needful for me...

So that when Peter Boehler, whom God prepared for me as soon as I came to London, affirmed of true faith in Christ...that it has those two fruits inseparably attending it, "Dominion over sin, and constant peace, from a sense of forgiveness," I was quite amazed, and looked upon it as a new Gospel....

In the evening, I went very unwillingly to a Society in Aldersgate-Street, where one was reading Luther's preface to the Epistle to the Romans. About a quarter before nine, while he was describing the change which God works in the heart through faith in Christ, I felt my heart strangely warmed.

I felt I did trust in Christ; Christ alone, for salvation; and an assurance was given me, that he had taken away my sins, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death.

On June 11, 1739, in his Journal, John Wesley wrote:

I look upon the world as my parish.

On February 12, 1772, in his Journal, John Wesley wrote:

That execrable sum of all villainies, commonly called the Slave Trade.

John Wesley wrote as his Rule:

Do all the good you can,
By all the means you can,
In all the ways you can,
In all the places you can,
At all the times you can,
To all the people you can,
As long as ever you can.

John Wesley stated:

My mother was the source from which I derived the guiding principles of my life.

Edwards, Jonathan (October 5, 1703-March 22, 1758), was an American theologian and minister of the Calvinist Puritan tradition. His preaching began the Great Awakening revival which swept the Colonies. This was responsible in part for uniting the Colonies prior to the Revolutionary War. In 1757, he became the third president of Princeton University, formerly the College of New Jersey. His most notable works include Religious Affections, 1746, and The Freedom of the Will, 1754.

In 1727, he married Sarah Pierrepont. Their success as parents was revealed in a study done in 1900, showing their descendants included: a dean of a prestigious law school, 1 Vice-President of the United States; 1 comptroller of the U.S. Treasury; 3 U.S. Senators, 3 governors, 3 mayors of large cities, 13 college presidents, 30 judges, 65 professors, 80 public office holders, 100 lawyers, and nearly 100 missionaries.

In his Narrative of Surprising Conversions, Jonathan Edwards wrote:

And then it was, in the latter part of December, that the Spirit of God began extraordinarily to...work amongst us. There were, very suddenly, one after another, five or six persons who were, to all appearance, savingly converted, and some of them wrought upon in a very remarkable manner.

Particularly I was surprised with the relation of a young woman, who had been one of the greatest company-keepers in the whole town. When she came to me, I had never heard that she was become in any ways serious, but by the conversation I had with her, it appeared to me that what she gave an account of was a glorious work of God's infinite power and sovereign grace, and that God had given her a new heart, truly broken and sanctified....

God made it, I suppose, the greatest occasion of awakening to others, of anything that ever came to pass in the town. I have had abundant opportunity to know the effect it had, by my private conversation with many. The news of it seemed to be almost like a flash of lightning upon the hearts of young people all over the town, and upon many others....

Presently upon this, a great and earnest concern about the great things of religion and the eternal world became universal in all parts of the town and among persons of all degrees and all ages. The noise of the dry bones waxed louder and louder....

Those that were wont to be the vainest and loosest, and those that had been the most disposed to think and speak slightly of vital and experimental religion, were not generally subject to great awakenings. And the work of conversion was carried on in a most astonishing manner and increased more and more; souls did, as it were, come by flocks to Jesus Christ....

This work of God, as it was carried on and the number of true saints multiplied, soon made a glorious alteration in the town, so that in the spring and summer following, Anno 1735, the town seemed to be full of the presence of God.

It never was so full of love, nor so full of joy... there were remarkable tokens of God's presence in almost every house. It was a time of joy in families on the account of salvation's being brought unto them, parents rejoicing over their children as new born, and husbands over their wives, and wives over their husbands.

The goings of God were then seen in His sanctuary, God's day was a delight and His tabernacles were amiable. Our public assemblies were then beautiful; the congregation was alive in God's service, everyone earnestly intent on the public worship, every hearer eager to drink the words of the minister as they came from his mouth.

The assembly in general were, from time to time, in tears while the word was preached, some weeping with sorrow and distress, others with joy and love, others with pity and concern for their neighbors.

There were many instances of persons that came from abroad, on visits or on business... [that] partook of that shower of divine blessing that God rained down here and went home rejoicing. Till at length the same work began to appear and prevail in several other towns in the country.

In the month of March, the people of South Hadley began to be seized with a deep concern about the things of religion, which very soon became universal... About the same time, it began to break forth in the west part of Suffield... and it soon spread into all parts of the town. It next appeared at Sunderland...

About the same time it began to appear in a part of Deerfield... Hatfield... West Springfield... Long Meadow... Endfield... Westfield... Northfield... In every place, God brought His saving blessings with Him, and His Word, attended with Spirit... returned not void.

Jonathan Edwards stated:

There is no leveler like Christianity, but it levels by lifting all who receive it to the lofty table-land of a true character and of undying hope both for this world and the next.

Resolved: never to do anything which I should be afraid to do if it were the last hour of my life.

I have reason to hope that my parents' prayers for me have been, in many things, very powerful and prevalent, that God has... taken me under His care and guidance, provision and direction, in answer to their prayers.

Jonathan Edwards, in his work, "The Latter-Day Glory Is Probably to Begin in America," proposed the idea that the continents could be classified into two groups, the New World and the Old World. Since the Old World had the honor of hosting Christ's first coming, he reasoned that the New World would be given the honor of preparing the earth for His second coming. Observing the "Sun of Righteousness" travels from east to west, Jonathan Edwards' perspective enlightened the origins of America's "Manifest Destiny":

When the time comes of the church's deliverance from her enemies, so often typified by the Assyrians, the light will rise in the west, till it shines through the world like the sun in its meridian brightness....

And if we may suppose that this glorious work of God shall begin in any part of America, I think, if we consider the circumstances of the settlement of New England, it must needs appear the most likely, of all American colonies, to be the place whence this work shall principally take its rise....

Jonathan Edwards wife, Sarah Edwards, wrote to her brother in New Haven documenting the response to George Whitefield's preaching during the first Great Awakening in the Colonies:

It is wonderful to see what a spell he casts over an audience by proclaiming the simplest truths of the Bible... Our mechanics shut up their shops, and the day laborers throw down their tools to go and hear him preach, and few return unaffected.

Alison, Francis (1705-November 28, 1779), was an educator in colonial America, described by Ezra Stiles as "the greatest classical scholar in America, especially in Greek."

On May 27, 1759, in a letter to Ezra Stiles, the future president of Yale, Francis Alison gave his support to a proposal written by Yale's then current president, Thomas Clap, recommending a uniform plan of education for the colonial colleges. He stated:

Euclid's elements and algebra... should be taught the classes statedly and carefully, and moral philosophy should be a business of greater care and closer application than is now the common practice; without this branch of knowledge, we shall be ill able to defend our holy Christian religion; to understand the rights of mankind; or to explain and enforce the duties which we owe to God, our neighbors and ourselves.

Franklin, Benjamin (January 17, 1706-April 17, 1790), was an American printer, writer, scientist, philosopher and statesman. Born to a poor candle-maker in Boston, Massachusetts, he was 15th of 17 children. Since his family could not afford to provide him with a formal education, he began apprenticing as a printer at the age of twelve. In 1723, he moved to Philadelphia and married Deborah Read, by whom he had two children. He initially gained literary acclaim through the annual publication of his book, Poor Richard's Almanac (1732-57). At the age of forty-two he was successful enough to retire and devote himself to science, writing and public life. In 1743, he helped found the American Philosophical Society.

Benjamin Franklin, who had taught himself five languages, became known as "the Newton of his Age." His experiments in electrostatics, 1750-51, led to the well-known kite experiment which proved that lightning was a form of electricity. His invention of the lightning rod earned him honorary degrees from Harvard and Yale, 1753, and the Royal Society's Copley Medal. He is credited for having coined the terms "battery," "condenser," "conductor," "positive and negative charges" and "electric shock." He invented the Franklin stove, the rocking chair, bifocal glasses, the glass harmonica, in addition to numerous scientific discoveries. He developed theories of heat absorption, meteorology and ocean currents.

Benjamin Franklin organized the first postal system in America, serving as the deputy postmaster general of the colonies, 1753-54. He established the first volunteer fire department, a circulating public library and the lighting of city streets. He helped found the University of Pennsylvania, a hospital, an insurance company, a city police force, a night watch and in 1747, the first militia. In 1754, he organized defenses in the French and Indian War.

Benjamin Franklin was Pennsylvania's delegate to the Albany Congress and acted as its agent in London. He helped draft and signed the Declaration of Independence. In 1776, he served as a diplomat to France, and was largely responsible for France joining the Revolutionary War on the side of the Colonies. In 1785, he became the President (Governor) of Pennsylvania and signed the Treaty of Alliance, the Treaty of Peace, the Articles of Confederation, and the United States Constitution. He supported the abolition of slavery and in 1788, he was appointed the first president of the first anti-slavery society in America.

In Poor Richard's Almanac (1732-57), Benjamin Franklin published proverbs such as:

God heals, and the doctor takes the fees.

God helps them that help themselves. (June 1736)

Work as if you were to live 100 years; pray as if you were to die tomorrow. (May 1757)

Benjamin Franklin once remarked to his wife:

Debby, I wish the good Lord had seen fit to make each day just twice as long as it is. Perhaps then I could really accomplish something.

In 1728, Benjamin Franklin wrote his Articles of Belief and Acts of Religion:

I believe there is One Supreme, most Perfect

Being....

It is that particular wise and good God, who is the Author and Owner of our system, that I propose for the Object of my praise and adoration.

For I conceive that He has in Himself some of those passions He has planted in us, and that, since He has given us reason whereby we are capable of observing His wisdom in the Creation, He is not above caring for us, being pleas'd with our praise, and offended when we slight Him, or neglect His Glory.

I conceive for many reasons that He is a good Being, and as I should be happy to have so wise, good and powerful a Being my Friend, let me consider in what Manner I shall make myself most acceptable to Him.

Next to the praise resulting from and due to His wisdom, I believe He is pleased and delights in the happiness of those he has created; and since without virtue man can have no happiness in this world, I firmly believe He delights to see me virtuous, because He is pleased when He sees me happy.

And since He has created many things which seem purely designed for the delight of man, I believe He is not offended when He sees his children solace themselves in any manner of pleasant exercises and innocent delights; and I think no pleasure innocent that is to man hurtful. I love Him therefore for His Goodness, and I adore Him for His wisdom.

Regarding prayer, Benjamin Franklin wrote:

Being mindful that before I address the Deity my soul ought to be calm and serene, free from passion and perturbation, or otherwise elevated with rational joy and pleasure, I ought to use a countenance that expresses a filial respect, mixed with a kind of smiling that signifies inward joy and satisfaction and admiration.

Let me not fail, then, to praise my God continually, for it is His due, and it is all I can return for His many favors and great goodness to me; and let me resolve to be virtuous, that I may be happy, that I may please Him, who is delighted to see me happy. Amen!

O Creator, O Father, I believe that Thou are Good, and Thou art pleas'd with the pleasure of Thy children.

Praised be Thy Name forever.

By Thy Power hast thou made the glorious Sun, with his attending worlds; from the energy of Thy mighty Will they first received their prodigious motion, and by Thy Wisdom hast Thou prescribed the wondrous laws by which they move.

Praised be Thy Name forever.

By Thy Wisdom hast thou formed all things, Thou hast created man, bestowing life and reason, and plac'd him in dignity superior to Thy other earthly Creatures.

Praised be Thy Name forever.

Thy Wisdom, Thy Power, and Thy GOODNESS are every where clearly seen; in the air and in the water, in the heavens and on the earth; Thou providest for the various winged fowl, and the innumerable inhabitants of the water; Thou givest cold and heat, rain and sunshine in their season, and to the fruits of the earth increase.

Praised be Thy Name forever.

I believe Thou hast given life to Thy creatures that they might live, and art not delighted with violent death and bloody sacrifices.

Praised be Thy Name forever.

Thou abhorrest in Thy creatures treachery and deceit, malice, revenge, Intemperance and every other hurtful Vice; but Thou art a Lover of justice and sincerity, of friendship, benevolence and every virtue. Thou art my Friend, my Father, and my Benefactor.

Praised be Thy Name, O God, forever. Amen.

That I may be preserved from atheism and infidelity, impiety and profaneness, and in my addresses to Thee carefully avoid irreverence and ostentation, formality and odious hypocrisy, Help me, O Father.

And forasmuch as ingratitude is one of the most odious of vices, let me not be unmindful gratefully to acknowledge the favours I receive from Heaven... For all Thy innumerable benefits; For life and reason, and the use of speech, for health and joy and every pleasant hour, my Good God, I thank Thee.

Benjamin Franklin wrote his own version of the Lord's Prayer:

Heavenly Father, May all revere Thee, And become Thy dutiful children and faithful subjects. May thy Laws be obeyed on earth as perfectly as they are in Heaven. Provide for us this day as Thou hast hitherto daily done. Forgive us our trespasses, and enable us likewise to forgive those that offend us. Keep us out of temptation and deliver us from Evil.

Benjamin Franklin listed topics and doctrines, which he considered of vital importance, to be shared and preached:

That there is one God Father of the Universe.

That He [is] infinitely good, powerful and wise.

That He is omnipresent.

That He ought to be worshipped, by adoration, prayer and thanksgiving both in publick and private.

That He loves such of His creatures as love and do good to others: and will reward them either in this world or hereafter.

That men's minds do not die with their bodies, but are made more happy or miserable after this life according to their actions.

That virtuous men ought to league together to strengthen the interest of virtue, in the world: and so strengthen themselves in virtue.

That knowledge and learning is to be cultivated, and ignorance dissipated. That none but the virtuous are wise. That man's perfection is in virtue.

Benjamin Franklin stated:

A Bible and a newspaper in every house, a good school in every district - all studied and appreciated as they merit - are the principal support of virtue, morality, and civil liberty.

A nation of well informed men who have been taught to know and prize the rights which God has given them cannot be enslaved. It is in the region of ignorance that tyranny begins.

God grant that not only the Love of Liberty but a thorough knowledge of the rights of man may pervade all the nation.

In his Autobiography, published in complete form in 1868, Franklin mentions a small book which he carried with him, listing 13 virtues:

- 1) Temperance: ... drink not to elevation.
- 2) Silence: ... avoid trifling conversation.
- 3) Order: Let all your things have their places...
- 4) Resolution: ... perform without fail what you resolve.
- 5) Frugality: ... i. e. waste nothing.
- 6) Industry: Lose no time; be always employ'd...
- 7) Sincerity: Use no hurtful deceit; think innocently...
- 8) Justice: Wrong none by doing injuries...
- 9) Moderation: Avoid extremes; forbear resenting...
- 10) Cleanliness: Tolerate no uncleanness in body...
- 11) Tranquility: Be not disturbed at trifles...
- 12) Chastity:
- 13) Humility: Imitate Jesus.

Benjamin Franklin noted in his Autobiography that he began each day by praying:

O Powerful Goodness! Bountiful Father! Merciful Guide! Increase in me that wisdom which discovers my truest interest. Strengthen my resolution to perform what that wisdom dictates. Accept my kind offices to Thy other children as the only return in my power for Thy continual favours to me.

In his Autobiography, Benjamin Franklin stated:

I had been religiously educated as a Presbyterian; and tho' some of the dogmas of that persuasion, such as the eternal degrees of God, election, reprobation, etc., appeared to me unintelligible, others doubtful, and I early absented myself from the public assemblies of the sect, Sunday being my studying day, I never was without some religious principles.

I never doubted, for instance, the existence of the Deity; that He made the world, and govern'd it by His Providence; that the most acceptable service of God was the doing good to man; that our souls are immortal; and that all crime will be punished, and virtue rewarded, either here or hereafter.

These I esteem'd the essentials of every religion; and, being to be found in all the religions we had in our country, I respected them all, tho' with different degrees of respect, as I found them more or less mix'd with other articles, which without any tendency to inspire, promote, or confirm morality, serv'd principally to divide us, and make us unfriendly to one another.

This respect of all, with an opinion that the worst had some good effects, induc'd me to avoid all discourse that might tend to lessen the good opinion another might have of his own religion; and as our province increas'd in people, and new places of worship were continually wanted, and generally erected by voluntary contribution, my mite for such purpose, whatever might be the sect, was never refused.

Though I seldom attended any public worship, I had still an opinion of its propriety, and of its utility when rightly conducted, and I regularly paid my annual subscription for the support of the only Presbyterian minister or meeting we had in Philadelphia. He used to visit me sometimes as a friend, and admonish me to attend his administration.

Many of Benjamin Franklin's axioms are contained in his Maxims and Morals:

Contrary habits must be broken, and good ones acquired and established, before we can have any dependence on a steady, uniform rectitude of conduct.

Freedom is not a gift bestowed upon us by other men, but a right that belongs to us by the laws of God and nature.

Without virtue man can have no happiness.

Virtue alone is sufficient to make a man great, glorious and happy.

Self-denial is really the highest self-gratification.

Hope and faith may be more firmly grounded upon Charity than Charity upon hope and faith.

Beware of little expenses.

I never doubted the existence of the Deity, that he made the world, and governed it by His Providence.

The event God only knows.

Good wives and good plantations are made by good husbands.

Let the fair sex be assured that I shall always treat them and their affairs with the utmost decency and respect.

Virtue is not secure until its practice has become habitual.

Nothing is so likely to make a man's fortune as virtue.

My father convinced me that nothing was useful which was not honest.

The pleasures of this world are rather from God's goodness than our own merit.

Search others for their virtues, thy self for thy vi ces.

Let no pleasure tempt thee, no profit allure thee, no ambition corrupt thee, no example sway thee, no persuasion move thee to do anything which thou knowest to be evil; so thou shalt live jollily, for a good conscience is a continual Christmas.

Remember Job suffered and was afterwards prosperous.

Keep your eyes open before marriage, half shut afterwards.

In 1742, Benjamin Franklin stated:

Young Man, my advice to you is that you cultivate an acquaintance with, and a firm belief in, the Holy Scriptures. This is your certain interest.

On July 28, 1743, Benjamin Franklin wrote to his sister, Jane Mecom:

You express yourself as if you thought I was against Worshipping of God, and believed Good Works would merit Heaven; which are both Fancies of your own, I think, without Foundation. - I am so far from thinking that God is not to be worshipped, that I have compos'd and wrote a whole Book of Devotions for my own Use: And I imagine there are few, if any, in the World, so weak as to imagine, that the little Good we can do here, can merit so vast a Reward hereafter.

There are some Things in your New England Doctrines and Worship, which I do not agree with, but I do not therefore condemn them, or desire to shake your Belief or Practice of them...

In "The Speech of Polly Baker," printed in the Gentleman's Magazine, April 1747, Benjamin Franklin referred to:

[The] great command of Nature and Nature's God.

In 1748, as Pennsylvania's Governor, Benjamin Franklin proposed Pennsylvania's first Fast Day:

It is the duty of mankind on all suitable occasions to acknowledge their dependence on the Divine Being... [so that] Almighty God would mercifully interpose and still the rage of war among the nations... [that] He would take this province under His protection, confound the designs and defeat the attempts of its enemies, and unite our hearts and strengthen our hands in every undertaking that may be for the public good, and for our defence and security in this time of danger.

In Philadelphia, 1749, Benjamin Franklin stated in his Proposals Relating to the Education of Youth in Pennsylvania:

History will also afford the frequent opportunities of showing the necessity of a public religion, from its usefulness to the public; the advantage of a religious character among private persons; the mischiefs of superstition, &c. and the excellency of the Christian religion above all others, ancient or modern.

On August 23, 1750, from Philadelphia, Benjamin Franklin wrote to Dr. Samuel Johnson (October 14, 1696-January 6, 1772), the first President of King's College (now Columbia University) regarding education:

I think with you, that nothing is of more importance for the public weal, than to form and train up youth in wisdom and virtue... I think also, general virtue is more probably to be expected and obtained from the education of youth, than from the exhortation of adult persons; bad habits and vices of the mind being, like diseases of the body, more easily prevented than cured.

I think, moreover, that talents for the education of youth are the gift of God; and that he on whom they are bestowed, whenever a way is opened for the use of them, is as strongly called as if he heard a voice from heaven.

On June 6, 1753, Benjamin Franklin wrote from Philadelphia to Joseph Huey:

I can only show my gratitude for these mercies from God, by a readiness to help his other children and my brethren. For I do not think that thanks and compliments, though repeated weekly, can discharge our real obligations to each other, and much less those to our Creator.

You will see in this my notion of good works, that I am far from expecting to merit heaven by them. By heaven we understand a state of happiness, infinite in degree, and eternal in duration. I can do nothing to deserve such rewards... Even the mixed, imperfect pleasures we enjoy in this world, are rather from God's goodness than our merit; how much more such happiness of heaven!

For my part I have not the vanity to think I deserve it... but content myself in submitting to the will and disposal of that God who made me, who has hitherto preserved and blessed me, and in whose fatherly goodness I may well confide, that he will never make me miserable; and that even the afflictions I may at any time suffer shall tend to my benefit.

The faith you mention has certainly its use in the world. I do not desire to see it diminished, nor would I endeavor to lessen it in any man. But I wish it were more productive of good works, than I have generally seen it; I mean real good works; works of kindness, charity, mercy, and public spirit; not holiday-keeping, sermon-reading or hearing; performing church ceremonies, or making long prayers, filled with flatteries and compliments...

The worship of God is a duty; the hearing and reading of sermons may be useful; but, if men rest in hearing and praying, as too many do, it is as if a tree should value itself on being watered and putting forth leaves, though it never produce any fruit.

In Some Account of the Pennsylvania Hospital from its first rise (1751), to the beginning of the fifth month, called May 1754, Benjamin Franklin stated:

It would be a neglect of that justice which is due to the physicians and surgeons of this hospital, not to acknowledge that their care and skill, and their punctual and regular attendance, under the Divine Blessing, has been a principal means of advancing this charity to the flourishing state in which we have now the pleasure to view it.

Relying on the continuance of the Favour of Heaven, upon the future endeavors of all who may be concerned in the management of the institution, for its further advancement, we close this account with the abstract of a sermon, preached before the Governors...

The Hospital cornerstone recorded text composed by Franklin:

In the year of Christ, 1755:... This building, by the bounty of the Government and of many private persons, was piously founded, for the relief of the sick and miserable. May the God of mercies bless the undertaking!

In 1754, in a pamphlet entitled Information to Those Who Would Remove to America, Benjamin Franklin wrote to Europeans interested in immigrating or sending their youth to this land:

Hence bad examples to youth are more rare in America, which must be a comfortable consideration to parents. To this may be truly added, that serious religion, under its various denominations, is not only tolerated, but respected and practised.

Atheism is unknown there; Infidelity rare and secret; so that persons may live to a great age in that country without having their piety shocked by meeting with either an Atheist or an Infidel.

And the Divine Being seems to have manifested his approbation of the mutual forbearance and kindness with which the different sects treat each other; by the remarkable prosperity with which he has been pleased to favor the whole country.

In 1757, in an essay entitled The Ways to Wealth, composed while sailing as a Colonial Agent to England, Benjamin Franklin wrote:

This doctrine, my friends, is reason and wisdom; but after all, do not depend too much upon your own industry, and frugality, and prudence, though excellent things, for they may all be blasted without the blessing of Heaven; and therefore, ask that blessing humbly, and be not uncharitable to those that at the present seem to want [lack] it, but comfort and help them. Remember, Job suffered, and was afterwards prosperous.

On November 8, 1764, Benjamin Franklin wrote to his daughter, Sarah:

Go constantly to church, whoever preaches. The act of devotion in the Common Prayer Book is your principle business there, and if properly attended to, will do more towards amending the heart than sermons generally can do.

For they were composed by men of much greater piety and wisdom, than our common composers of sermons can pretend to be; and therefore I wish you would never miss the prayer days; yet I do not mean you should despise sermons, even of preachers you dislike, for the discourse is often much better than the man, as sweet and clear waters come through very dirty earth.

I am the more particular, on this head, as you seemed to express a little before I came away some inclination to leave our church, which I would not have you do.

On January 1, 1769, Benjamin Franklin penned a letter to Lord James:

The moral character and happiness of mankind, are so interwoven with the operation of government, and the progress of the arts and sciences is so dependent on the nature of our political institutions, that it is essential to the advancement of civilized society to give ample discussion to these topics.

Benjamin Franklin had become very close friends with George Whittfield, the renowned preacher of the Great Awakening. In his Autobiography, Franklin wrote of having attended the crusades of George Whittfield at the Philadelphia Courthouse steps. He noted over 30,000 people were present, and that Whittfield's voice could be heard nearly a mile away. Benjamin Franklin became very appreciative of the preaching of George Whittfield, even to the extent of printing many of his sermons and journals.

So great was the response of the Colonies to Whittfield's preaching of the Gospel, that the churches were not able to hold the people. Benjamin Franklin built a grand auditorium for the sole purpose of having his friend George Whittfield preach in it when he came to Pennsylvania. After the crusades, Franklin donated the auditorium to be the first building of the University of Pennsylvania. A bronze statue of George Whittfield still stands in front, commemorating the Great Awakening Revivals in the colonies prior to the Revolutionary War.

In 1739, noting the effects of George Whittfield's ministry and the resulting Christian influence on city life, Benjamin Franklin later recorded in his Autobiography:

It was wonderful to see the change soon made in the manners of our inhabitants. From being thoughtless or indifferent about religion, it seemed as if all the world were growing religious, so that one could not walk thro' the town in an evening without hearing psalms sung in different families of every street.

In 1752, Benjamin Franklin received a letter from his friend George Whittfield, who wrote:

My Dear Doctor....I find that you grow more and more famous in the learned world.

In 1764, Benjamin Franklin wrote a letter George Whittfield, ending with the salutation:

Your frequently repeated Wishes and Prayers for my Eternal as well as temporal Happiness are very obliging. I can only thank you for them, and offer you mine in return.

In 1769, George Whitefield wrote to Benjamin Franklin on the night before his last trip to America. In this last surviving letter, Whitefield shared his desire that both he and Franklin would:

Be in that happy number of those who, in the midst of the tremendous final blaze, shall cry Amen.

In the last letter Benjamin Franklin wrote to George Whitefield, he expressed:

Life, like a dramatic piece, should... finish handsomely. Being now in the last act, I began to cast about for something fit to end with....

I sometimes wish, that you and I were jointly employ'd by the Crown to settle a colony on the Ohio... to settle in that fine country a strong body of religious and industrious people!...

Might it not greatly facilitate the introduction of pure religion among the heathen, if we could, by such a colony, show them a better sample of Christians than they commonly see in our Indian traders?

In July of 1776, Benjamin Franklin was appointed part of a committee to draft a seal for the newly united states which would characterize the spirit of this new nation. He proposed:

Moses lifting up his wand, and dividing the red sea, and pharaoh in his chariot overwhelmed with the waters. This motto: "Rebellion to tyrants is obedience to God.

Benjamin Franklin is attributed to have stated in a letter to the French ministry, March 1778:

Whoever shall introduce into public affairs the principles of primitive Christianity will change the face of the world.

Franklin was responsible for bringing France into the Revolutionary War on the side of the Colonies, which proved to be of vital importance to cause of independence. He also went to Paris in August 1781 to negotiate the Treaty of Paris, which ended the War with the British on September 3, 1783. The terms of this treaty were described as "so advantageous to the Colonies that it has been called the greatest achievement in the history of American diplomacy."

In the name of the Most Holy and Undivided Trinity. It having pleased the Divine Providence to dispose the hearts of the most serene and most potent Prince George the Third, by the Grace of God, King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, ... and of the United States of America, to forget all past misunderstandings and differences. ... Done at Paris, this third day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three.

As an ambassador of the United States, Benjamin Franklin was at a dinner of foreign dignitaries in Versailles. The minister of Great Britain proposed a toast to King George III, likening him to the sun. The French minister, in like kind, proposed a toast to King Louis XVI, comparing him with the moon. Benjamin Franklin stood up and toasted:

George Washington, Commander of the American armies, who, like Joshua of old, commanded the sun and the moon to stand still, and they obeyed him.

In 1784, to Robert R. Livingston, Benjamin Franklin wrote:

I am now entering on my 78th year... If I live to see this peace concluded, I shall beg leave to remind the Congress of their promise, then to dismiss me. I shall be happy to sing with old Simeon, "Now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation."

In a letter dated April 17, 1787, Benjamin Franklin stated:

Only a virtuous people are capable of freedom. As nations become corrupt and vicious, they have more need of masters.

On Thursday, June 28, 1787, Benjamin Franklin delivered a speech to the Constitutional Convention, which was embroiled in a debate over how each state was to be represented in the new government. The hostile feelings, created by the smaller states being pitted against the larger states, was so bitter that some delegates actually left the Convention.

Benjamin Franklin, being the President (Governor) of Pennsylvania, hosted the rest of the 55 delegates attending the Convention. Being the senior member of the convention at 81 years of age, he commanded the respect of all present, and, as recorded in James Madison's detailed records, rose to speak in this moment of crisis:

Mr. President:

The small progress we have made after 4 or 5 weeks close attendance & continual reasonings with each other - our different sentiments on almost every question, several of the last producing as many noes as ayes, is methinks a melancholy proof of the imperfection of the Human Understanding.

We indeed seem to feel our own want of political wisdom, since we have been running about in search of it. We have gone back to ancient history for models of Government, and examined the different forms of those Republics which, having been formed with the seeds of their own dissolution, now no longer exist. And we have viewed Modern States all round Europe, but find none of their Constitutions suitable to our circumstances.

In this situation of this Assembly, groping as it were in the dark to find political truth, and scarce able to distinguish it when presented to us, how has it happened, Sir, that we have not hitherto once thought of humbly applying to the Father of lights to illuminate our understanding?

In the beginning of the Contest with G. Britain, when we were sensible of danger, we had daily prayer in this room for Divine protection. - Our prayers, Sir, were heard, & they were graciously answered. All of us who were engaged in the struggle must have observed frequent instances of a Superintending Providence in our favor.

To that kind Providence we owe this happy opportunity of consulting in peace on the means of establishing our future national felicity. And have we now forgotten that powerful Friend? or do we imagine we no longer need His assistance?

I have lived, Sir, a long time, and the longer I live, the more convincing proofs I see of this truth - that God Governs in the affairs of men. And if a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without His notice, is it probable that an empire can rise without His aid?

We have been assured, Sir, in the Sacred Writings, that "except the Lord build the House, they labor in vain that build it." I firmly believe this; and I also believe that without his concurring aid we shall succeed in this political building no better than the Builders of Babel: We shall be divided by our partial local interests; our projects will be confounded, and we ourselves shall become a reproach and bye word down to future ages.

And what is worse, mankind may hereafter from this unfortunate instance, despair of establishing Governments by Human wisdom and leave it to chance, war and conquest.

I therefore beg leave to move - that henceforth prayers imploring the assistance of Heaven, and its blessing on our deliberations, be held in this Assembly every morning before we proceed to business, and that one or more of the clergy of this city be requested to officiate in that service.

The response of the convention to Dr. Benjamin Franklin's speech was reported by General Jonathan Dayton, the delegate from New Jersey and later Speaker of the House of Representatives, to William Steele:

The Doctor sat down; and never did I behold a countenance at once so dignified and delighted as was that of Washington at the close of the address; nor were the members of the convention generally less affected. The words of the venerable Franklin fell upon our ears with a weight and authority, even greater than we may suppose an oracle to have had in a Roman senate!

Following Franklin's historical address, Roger Sherman of Connecticut seconded his motion. Edmund Jennings Randolph of Virginia moved:

That a sermon be preached at the request of the convention on the 4th of July, the anniversary of Independence; & thenceforward prayers be used in ye Convention every morning. [Dr. Franklin seconded this motion.]

The clergy of the city responded to this request and effected a profound change in the convention, as noted by General Jonathan Dayton when they reconvened, July 2, 1787:

American Quotations.txt

We assembled again; and...every unfriendly feeling had been expelled, and a spirit of conciliation had been cultivated.

On July 4th, the entire Convention assembled in the Reformed Calvinistic Lutheran Church, according to the proposal by Edmund Jennings Randolph of Virginia, and heard a sermon by Rev. William Rogers. His prayer reflected the hearts of the delegates following Franklin's admonition:

We fervently recommend to the fatherly notice...our federal convention...Favor them, from day to day, with thy inspiring presence; be their wisdom and strength; enable them to devise such measures as may prove happy instruments in healing all divisions and prove the good of the great whole;...that the United States of America may form one example of a free and virtuous government...

May we...continue, under the influence of republican virtue, to partake of all the blessings of cultivated and Christian society.

The Reverend James Campbell exhorted the delegates to establish a:

Free and vigorous government.

On September 19, 1787, after the Constitutional Convention endorsed the final form of the Constitution, Ben Franklin went outside the hall in Philadelphia and was asked by a Mrs. Powell: "Well Doctor, what have we got, a republic or a monarchy?" Franklin replied:

A republic, if you can keep it.

In a speech he delivered in 1788, Benjamin Franklin stated:

There seems to me at present to be great occasion for raising a United Party for Virtue, by forming the virtuous and good men of all nations into a regular body, to be governed by suitable good and wise rules, which good and wise men may probably be more unanimous in their obedience to, than common people are to common laws. I at present think that whoever attempts this aright, and is well qualified, cannot fail of pleasing God and of meeting with success.

On April 9, 1789, only nine days after the first Constitutional Congress convened with a quorum, the House of Representatives and the Senate approved having chaplains open every session with prayer, paying them a salary of $500 each.

On March 9, 1790, Benjamin Franklin wrote to Ezra Stiles, President of Yale University:

Here is my Creed. I believe in one God, the Creator of the Universe. That He governs it by His Providence. That He ought to be worshipped.

That the most acceptable service we render to Him is in doing good to His other Children. That the soul of Man is immortal, and will be treated with Justice in another Life respecting its conduct in this. These I take to be the fundamental points in all sound Religion, and I regard them as you do in whatever Sect I meet with them.

As to Jesus of Nazareth, my Opinion of whom you particularly desire, I think the System of Morals and his Religion, as he left them to us, is the best the World ever saw, or is likely to see;

But I apprehend it has received various corrupting changes, and I have, with most of the present dissenters in England, some doubts as to his divinity; though it is a question I do not dogmatize upon, having never studied it, and think it needless to busy myself with it now, when I expect soon an opportunity of knowing the truth with less trouble. I see no harm, however, in its being believed, if that belief has the good consequence, as probably it has, of making his doctrines more respected and more observed; especially as I do not perceive, that the Supreme takes it amiss, by distinguishing the unbelievers in his government of the world with any peculiar marks of his displeasure.

In closing his letter to Ezra Stiles, March 9, 1790, Benjamin Franklin mentioned his generosity to all denominations. Dying less than two months later, Franklin's goodwill was evidenced by the entire membership of the clergy of Philadelphia leading his funeral procession as he was buried in the Old Christ Church cemetery. Benjamin Franklin concluded:

I shall only add, respecting myself, that having experienced the goodness of that Being in conducting me prosperously through a long life, I have no doubt of its continuance in the next, without the smallest conceit of meriting it....

All sects here, and we have a great variety, have experienced my good will in assisting them with subscriptions for building their new places of worship; and, as I never opposed any of their doctrines, I hope to go out of the world in peace with them all.

Benjamin Franklin wrote his own epitaph:

THE BODY of
BENJAMIN FRANKLIN
Printer
Like the cover of an old book,
Its contents torn out,
And stripped of its lettering and gilding
Lies here, food for worms;
Yet the work itself shall not be lost,
For it will (as he believed) appear once more,
In a new,
And more beautiful edition,
Corrected and amended
By The AUTHOR

On the pew in Christ Church belonging to Franklin's family is written:

Here worshipped Benjamin Franklin, philosopher and patriot.... Member of the Committee which erected the Spire of the Church. Interred according to the terms of his will in this churchyard.

Fielding, Henry (April 22, 1707-October 8, 1754), was an English novelist, dramatist and playwright. His satirical comedies offended the Whig premier, Sir John Walpole, and he was pressured to abandon the stage. He turned to law, became a magistrate, 1748, and helped organize an early police force named the Bow Street Runners. Henry Fielding's greatest novels include: Joseph Andrews, 1742; Jonathan Wild, 1743; Tom Jones, 1749; Amelia, 1752 and Journal of a Voyage to Lisbon, written shortly before his death.

In Joseph Andrews, book III, chapter 5, Henry Fielding stated:

Public schools are the nurseries of all vice and immorality.

Linnaeus, Carolus (May 23, 1707-January 10, 1778), born Carl von Linné, was a Swedish botanist and physician. He was considered the father of modern taxonomy, being the first naturalist to classify plants. He introduced the use of two Latin names, identifying genus and species, to classify all plants and animals. Many of his principles and taxonomic names are still used. His works include: Bibliotheca Botanica; Systema Naturae, 1735; Genera Plantarum, 1737; and Species Plantarum, 1753.

Carolus Linnaeus had inscribed over the door of his bedchamber:

Live innocently; God is here.

Wesley, Charles (December 18, 1707-March 29, 1788), was a prolific hymn writer and theologian, and the brother of John Wesley, founder of Methodism. He wrote an estimated 6,500 hymns, of which 500 are in continual use.

In 1739, Charles Wesley published his Hymns and Sacred Poems, which contained the song, "Christ, the Lord, Is Risen Today":

"Christ, the Lord, is risen today,"
Sons of men and angels say,
Raise your joys and triumphs high,
Sing, ye heavens, and earth reply.

In his hymn, "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," 1740, Charles Wesley wrote:

Jesus, lover of my soul,
Let me to Thy bosom fly,
While the nearer waters roll,
While the tempest still is high!
Hide me, O my Savior, hide,
Till the storm of life is past;
Safe into the haven glide,
O receive my soul at last.

In 1742, Charles Wesley wrote "Gentle Jesus, Meek and Mild":

Gentle Jesus, meek and mild,
Look upon a little child;
Pity my simplicity,

Suffer me to come to Thee.

In 1749, Charles Wesley composed "Soldiers of Christ, Arise":

Soldiers of Christ, arise,
And put your armor on.

In the Christmas hymn, 1753, Charles Wesley wrote:

Hark the herald angels sing,
Glory to the new-born King;
Peace on earth, and mercy mild,
God and sinners reconciled.
Joyful all ye nations rise,
Join the triumph of the skies;
With th' angelic host proclaim
Christ is born in Bethlehem.
Hark the herald angels sing,
Glory to the new-born King.

Johnson, Samuel (September 18, 1709-December 13, 1784), was an English poet, essayist, critic and lexicographer. He wrote one of the first dictionaries in the English language. He was respected for his judgment, which was coupled with a probing wit. Samuel Johnson organized the London Literary Club. He wrote the poems London, 1738; The Vanity of Human Wishes, 1749; the satirical work Rasselas, 1759; an edition of Shakespeare, 1765; and the significant work, The Lives of the Most Eminent English Poets, 1779-81, wherein he gives profound critical examination of 52 English poets.

In his Dictionary of the English Language, 1755, Samuel Johnson gave the definition:

PROVIDENCE - (Providenti a, Latin).

1. Foresight; timely care. . Sidney.
2. The care of God over created beings; divine superintendence - Raleigh.

Samuel Johnson attested:

It appears evident that the writers of the Old Testament were the original and best writers, and that from them are borrowed numerous ideas attributed to the poets themselves.

Almighty God, the Giver of all good things, without whose help all labor is ineffectual, and without whose grace all wisdom is folly, grant, I beseech Thee, that in this undertaking Thy Holy Spirit may not be withheld from me, but that I may promote Thy glory and the salvation of myself and others; grant this, O Lord, for the sake of Thy Son, Jesus Christ.

I bless Thee for creation, preservation, and redemption; for the knowledge of Thy Son, Jesus Christ. . . Create in me a contrite heart that I may worthily lament my sins and acknowledge my wickedness, and obtain remission and forgiveness through the satisfaction of Jesus Christ. . . Grant this, Almighty God, for the merits and through the mediation of our most holy and blessed Saviour, Jesus Christ; to whom, with Thee and the Holy Spirit, three Persons in one God, be all honor and glory, world without end. Amen.

Friendship, like love, is destroyed by long absences, though it may be increased by short intermissions.

In 1763, Samuel Johnson wrote:

Sir, I think all Christians, whether Papists or Protestants, agree in the essential articles and that their differences are trivial, and rather political than religious.

In 1772, Johnson commented:

All denominations of Christians have really little difference in point of doctrine, though they may differ widely in external forms.

Samuel Johnson's last words, December 13, 1784, were:

God bless you, my dear!

Trumbull, Jonathan (October 12, 1710-August 17, 1785), was a jurist, clergyman, businessman and the British Governor of Connecticut, appointed by King George III. He was also the father of the Revolutionary artist of the same name, (1756-1843). He was a close friend of George Washington and a strong supporter of American Independence, contributing large amounts of arms, munitions, supplies, etc.

On October 12, 1770, a Proclamation was given from New Haven by the Honorable Jonathan Trumbull, Esq., Governor of the English Colony of Connecticut, in New England:

Pray that God would graciously pour out His Spirit upon us and make the blessed Gospel in His hand effectual to a thorough reformation and general revival of the holy and peaceful religion of Jesus Christ.

Another Proclamation by His Excellency Jonathan Trumbull, Esq., Governor and Commander in Chief in and over the State of Connecticut, stated:

And I do hereby call upon the people... [to] offer to our Almighty and all-gracious God, through our Great Mediator, our sincere and solemn prayers for His Divine assistance and the influences of His Holy Spirit.

In 1773, Jonathan Trumbull stated:

It is hard to break connections with our mother country, but when she strives to enslave us, the strictest union must be dissolved... "The Lord reigneth; let the earth rejoice; let the multitudes of isles be glad thereof" - the accomplishment of such noble prophecies is at hand.

In the early 1770's, the tension was mounting in the Colonies prior to the Revolution. The attitude toward the governors appointed by King George III was recorded in debates of the British Parliament:

American Quotations.txt

Sir Richard Sutton read a copy of a letter relative to the government of America from a governor in America to the Board of Trade showing that...If you ask an American, who is his master? He will tell you he has none, nor any governor but Jesus Christ.

On April 19, 1775, in a Proclamation of a Day of Fasting and Prayer for the Connecticut Colony, Governor Jonathan Trumbull beseeched that:

God would graciously pour out His Holy Spirit on us to bring us to a thorough Repentance and effectual Reformation that our iniquities may not be our ruin; that He would restore, preserve and secure the Liberties of this and all the other British American colonies, and make the Land a mountain of Holiness, and Habitation of Righteousness forever.

On July 13, 1775, Governor Jonathan Trumbull wrote from Lebanon, Connecticut, to the General who had recently been placed in command of the Continental Army, George Washington:

The Honorable Congress have proclaimed a Fast to be observed by the inhabitants of all the English Colonies on this continent, to stand before the Lord in one day, with public humiliation, fasting, and prayer, to deplore our many sins, to offer up our joint supplications to God, for forgiveness, and for his merciful interposition for us in this day of unnatural darkness and distress.

They have, with one united voice, appointed you to the high station you possess. The Supreme Director of all events hath caused a wonderful union of hearts and counsels to subsist among us. Now therefore, be strong and very courageous.

May the God of the armies of Israel shower down the blessings of his Divine Providence on you, give you wisdom and fortitude, cover your head in the day of battle and danger, add success, convince our enemies of their mistaken measures, and that all their attempts to deprive these Colonies of their inestimable constitutional rights and liberties are injurious and vain.

In August of 1776, General Washington gave a desperate plea for reinforcements. Governor Jonathan Trumbull sent out an appeal, calling for nine more regiments of volunteers:

In this day of calamity, to trust altogether to the justice of our cause, without our utmost exertion, would be tempting Providence...March on! - This shall be your warrant: Play the man for God, and for the cities of our God. May the Lord of Hosts, the God of the armies of Israel, be your Captain, your Leader, your Conductor, and Saviour.

Muhlenberg, Henry Melchior (September 6, 1711-October 7, 1787), was one of the founders of the Lutheran Church in America. He was the father of John Peter Gabriel Muhlenberg, the Lutheran clergyman who became a major general in the Continental Army and U.S. Senator. He was also father of Frederick Augustus Conrad Muhlenberg, a clergyman who was a member of the Continental Congress and eventually the first Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives. Henry Melchior Muhlenberg pastored the Lutheran Church near Valley Forge during the Revolutionary War. He commented regarding George Washington:

I heard a fine example today, namely that His Excellency General Washington rode around among his army yesterday and admonished each and every one to fear God, to put away wickedness that has set in and become so general, and to practice Christian virtues.

From all appearances General Washington does not belong to the so-called world of society, for he respects God's Word, believes in the atonement through Christ, and bears himself in humility and gentleness.

Therefore, the Lord God has also singularly, yea, marvelously preserved him from harm in the midst of countless perils, ambuscades, fatigues, etc., and has hitherto graciously held him in his hand as a chosen vessel.

Rousseau, Jean Jacques (June 28, 1712-July 2, 1778), was a Swiss-born French philosopher, writer and political theorist. He was made famous by his essay on how arts and sciences corrupt human behavior, 1749. His works include: writing for Diderot's Encyclopedie, 1745; Origin of the Inequality of Man, 1755; Confessions, 1782; and The Social Contract, 1762, which influenced the French Revolution.

In the didactic novel Emilius and Sophia, 1762, vol.III, Book IV, he wrote:

I will confess to you, that the majesty of the Scriptures strikes me with admiration, as the purity of the Gospel has its influence upon my heart. Peruse the works of our philosophers; with all their pomp of diction, how mean, how contemptible, are they, compared with the Scriptures! Is it possible that a Book at once so simple and sublime should be merely the work of man?

It is possible that the Person whose history it relates be Himself a mere man? Does it contain the language of an enthusiast or an ambitious sectary? What sweetness, what purity in His manners! What affecting goodness in His instructions! What sublimity in His maxims! What profound wisdom in His discourses! What presence of mind! What sagacity and propriety in His answers! How great the command over His passions! Where is the man, where the philosopher, who could so live, suffer, and die, without weakness and without ostentation!...

The Jewish authors were incapable of the diction, and strangers to the morality contained in the Gospel, the marks of whose truths are so striking and inimitable that the inventor would be a more astonishing character than the hero...

Yes, if the life and death of Socrates are those of a philosopher, the life and death of Jesus Christ are those of a God.

Should we suppose the Gospel was a story, invented to please? It is not in this manner that we forge tales; for the actions of Socrates, of which no person has the least doubt, are less satisfactorily attested than those of Jesus Christ. Such a supposition, in fact, only shifts the difficulty without removing it; it is more conceivable that a number of persons should agree to write such a history, than that one should furnish the subject of it.

In 1762, in his work Emile; ou, De l'Education, Jean Jacques Rousseau verbalized:

Everything is good when it leaves the hands of the Creator; everything degenerates in the hands of man.

I shall always maintain that whoso says in his heart, "There is no God," while he takes the name of God upon his lips, is either a liar or a madman.

Where is the man who owes nothing to the land in which he lives? Whatever that land may be, he owes to it the most precious thing possessed by man, the morality of his actions and the love of virtue.

Vattel, Emmerich de (1714-1767), was a German diplomat on assignment to Bern, Switzerland. He was acclaimed for having written The Law of Nations, 1758. This work, especially with its emphasis on liberty, equality of individuals, and the right of nations to defend themselves, significantly impacted the Founding Fathers. The son of a Protestant minister, Vattel's work drew heavily upon the German philosopher Christian Wolff's 1749 work by the same title. Vattel implicated that men need to live:

Agreeably to their nature, and in conformity to the views of their common Creator; a law that our own safety, our happiness, our most precious advantages, ought to render sacred to every one of us.

Shipley, Jonathan (1714-December 6, 1788), was the bishop of St. Asaph Anglican Church in London, and a friend of Benjamin Franklin. In 1774, he appealed in the House of Lords:

At present we force every North American to be our enemy...It is a strange idea we have taken up, to cure their resentments by increasing provocation...That just God, whom we have all so deeply offended, can hardly inflict a severer national punishment than by committing us to the natural consequences of our own conduct.

I look upon North America as the only great nursery of freeman left on the face of the earth.

Whitefield, George (December 16, 1714-September 30, 1770), was an evangelist of the Great Awakening in the American colonies prior to the Revolutionary War. He attended Oxford with John and Charles Wesley, who began the Methodist movement. He confronted the established churches, resulting in doors being closed to him. He resorted to preaching out-of-doors, and the colonial population responded with crowds sometimes over thirty thousand. Benjamin Franklin wrote in his autobiography that he was able to hear Whitefield's voice nearly a mile away!

George Whitefield's preaching throughout the Eastern seaboard, greatly contributed toward the thirteen individualistic colonies melding into one country. Benjamin Franklin was so impressed by his preaching that he printed Whitefield's Journal, which grew to be tremendously popular. As no church could hold the large number of people that attended the crusades, Franklin built an auditorium in Philadelphia for Whitefield to preach in, which was latter donated as the first building of the University of Pennsylvania. A bronze statue of George Whitefield stands in front of it.

In 1733, when he was converted, George Whitefield exclaimed:

Joy - joy unspeakable - joy that's full of, big with glory!

In a sermon, George Whitefield proclaimed:

Never rest until you can say, "the Lord our righteousness." Who knows but the Lord may have mercy, nay, abundantly pardon you? Beg of God to give you faith; and if the Lord give you that, you will by it receive Christ, with his righteousness, and his all....

None, none can tell, but those happy souls who have experienced it with what demonstration of the Spirit this conviction comes.... Oh, how amiable, as well as all sufficient, does the blessed Jesus now appear! With what new eyes does the soul now see the Lord its righteousness! Brethren, it is unutterable....

Those who live godly in Christ, may not so much be said to live, as Christ to live in them.... They are led by the Spirit as a child is led by the hand of its father....

They hear, know, and obey his voice.... Being born again in God they habitually live to, and daily walk with God.

George Whitefield declared:

Would you have peace with God? Away, then, to God through Jesus Christ, who has purchased peace; the Lord Jesus has shed his heart's blood for this. He died for this; he rose again for this; he ascended into the highest heaven, and is now interceding at the right hand of God.

Sarah Edwards, the wife of Jonathan Edwards, wrote to her brother in New Haven concerning the effects George Whitefield's ministry:

It is wonderful to see what a spell he casts over an audience by proclaiming the simplest truths of the Bible.... Our mechanics shut up their shops, and the day laborers throw down their tools to go and hear him preach, and few return unaffected.

Benjamin Franklin wrote in his autobiography of the effect George Whitefield's preaching was having on the colonies:

It was wonderful to see the change soon made in the manners of our inhabitants. From being thoughtless or indifferent about religion, it seemed as if all the world were growing religious, so that one could not walk thro' the town in an evening without hearing psalms sung in different families of every street.

In 1752, George Whitefield wrote to his friend Benjamin Franklin:

My Dear Doctor... I find that you grow more and more famous in the learned world.

In 1764, George Whitefield received a letter from Benjamin Franklin, in which Franklin ended with the salutation:

Your frequently repeated Wishes and Prayers for my Eternal as well as temporal Happiness are very obliging. I can only thank you for them, and offer you mine in return.

In 1769, George Whitefield wrote Benjamin Franklin on the night before his last trip to America. In this last surviving letter, Whitefield shares his desire that both he and Franklin would:

Be in that happy number of those who is the midst of the tremendous final blaze shall cry Amen.

The last letter George Whitefield received from Benjamin Franklin revealed Franklin's heart:

Life, like a dramatic piece, should... finish handsomely. Being now in the last act, I began to cast about for something fit to end with... I sometimes wish, that you and I were jointly employ'd by the Crown to settle a colony on the Ohio... to settle in that fine country a strong body of religious and industrious people!...

Might it not greatly facilitate the introduction of pure religion among the heathen, if we could, by such a colony, show them a better sample of Christians than they commonly see in our Indian traders?

In 1770, as he was dying, Whitefield declared:

How willing I would ever live to preach Christ!
But I die to be with Him!

Nicholas, Robert Carter (January 28, 1715-September 8, 1780) was a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses, representing James City. He was appointed Judge of the High Court of Chancery and Court of Appeals. He was a member of the Committees of Correspondence, attended all major conventions, and in 1775, served as President Pro-tem of the Continental Convention.

When the English tea was dumped into the Boston harbor to protest taxes, the British navy retaliated by blockading the port. The colonies surrounding Massachusetts responded with sympathy and action. On May 24, 1773, Robert Carter Nicholas, Treasurer of the House of Burgesses in Virginia, proposed a Day of Fasting, Humiliation and Prayer, that was approved with virtually no comment:

This House, being deeply impressed with apprehension of the great dangers to be derived to British America from the hostile invasion of the city of Boston in our Sister Colony of Massachusetts Bay, whose commerce and harbor are, on the first day of June next, to be stopped by an armed force, deem it highly necessary that the said first day of June be set apart, by the members of this House, as a Day of Fasting, Humiliation and Prayer, devoutly to implore the Divine interposition, for averting the heavy calamity which threatens destruction to our civil rights and the evils of civil war;

to give us one heart and mind firmly opposed, by all just and proper means, every injury to American rights; and that the minds of His Majesty and his Parliament, may be inspired from above with wisdom, moderation and justice, to remove from the loyal people of America all cause of danger from a continued pursuit of measures pregnant with their ruin.

Mayhew, Jonathan (October 8, 1720-July 9, 1766), was a Congregational minister of West Church in Boston. In 1747, he graduated with honors from Harvard and in 1765, he was given the distinguished position of Dudley Lecturer at Harvard. In 1765, reflecting the colonists' feelings toward King George III's hated Stamp Act, Jonathan Mayhew stated in a sermon:

The king is as much bound by his oath not to infringe the legal rights of the people, as the people are bound to yield subjection to him. From whence it follows that as soon as the prince sets himself above the law, he loses the king in the tyrant. He does, to all intents and purposes, un-king himself.

In 1749, in response to the English Parliament's plan to impose the Episcopal Church as America's State Church, Jonathan Mayhew delivered the sermon, Concerning Unlimited Submission to the Higher Powers, to the Council and House of Representatives in Colonial New England:

It is hoped that but few will think the subject of it an improper one to be discoursed in the pulpit, under a notion that this is preaching politics instead of Christ. However, to remove all prejudices of this sort, I beg it may be remembered that "all Scripture is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness."

Why, then, should not those parts of Scripture which relate to civil government be examined and explained from the desk, as well as others?...

It is evident that the affairs of civil government may properly fall under a moral and religious consideration... For, although there be a sense, and a very plain and important sense, in which Christ's Kingdom is not of this world, His inspired apostles have nevertheless, laid down some general principles concerning the office of civil rulers, and the duty of subjects, together with the reason and obligation of that duty.

And... it is proper for all who acknowledge the authority of Jesus Christ, and the inspiration of His apostles, to endeavor to understand what is in fact the doctrine which they have delivered concerning this matter....

Civil tyranny is usually small at the beginning, like "the drop of a bucket," till at length, like a mighty torrent, or the raging waves of the sea, it bears down all before it, and deluges whole countries and empires.

On January 30, 1750, Jonathan Mayhew delivered a sermon which on Romans 13: 1-7:

The apostle's [Paul] doctrine... may be summed up in the following observations, viz.:

That the end of magistracy is the good of civil society, as such.

That civil rulers, as such, are the ordinance and ministers of God; it being by His permission and providence that any bear rule and agreeable to His will that there should be some persons vested with authority in society, for the well-being of it....

It is obvious then, in general, that the civil rulers whom the apostle speaks of, and obedience to whom he presses upon Christians as a duty, are good rulers, such as are, in the exercise of their office and power, benefactors to society....

Sherman, Roger (April 19, 1721-July 23, 1793), was an American Revolutionary patriot, jurist and politician. He was distinguished as the only Founding Father to sign all four major founding documents: The Articles of Association, 1774; The Declaration of Independence, 1776; The Articles of Confederation, 1777; and The Constitution of the United States, 1787.

Roger Sherman was a shoe cobbler, surveyor and merchant prior to his political career. He was a self-taught lawyer; a state senator; a superior court judge; and a judge in Connecticut for fourteen years. He was member of the Continental Congress and helped draft the Declaration of Independence. He was a member of the Constitutional Convention, where he made 138 speeches. He was a U.S. Representative, 1789-91, and at the age of 70, was elected a U.S. Senator, 1791-93.

On Thursday, June 28, 1787, during an almost fatal crisis in the Constitutional Convention, Roger Sherman seconded a motion to enact Dr. Benjamin Franklin's request that Congress be opened with prayer each day. This practice has continued since. The heated dispute was over how Congress would insure that the smaller states would be equally represented in comparison with the larger states. This debate grew so serious that it threaten the convention itself, as some delegates had already left. Shortly after Franklin's call for prayer, Roger Sherman made the suggestion that state representation in the Senate be equal and that state representation in the House be based on population. This historic proposal, which came to be called the "Connecticut Compromise," was adopted and the system has been in use since. Roger Sherman was also on the committee which decided the wording of the First Amendment. He was originally opposed to the First Amendment, considering it unnecessary, since Congress had no authority delegated from the Constitution in such areas.

In February 1776, along with John Adams and George Wythe of Virginia, Roger Sherman, served on a committee responsible for creating instructions for an embassy headed for Canada. The instructions directed:

You are further to declare that we hold sacred the rights of conscience, and may promise to the whole people, solemnly in our name, the free and undisturbed exercise of their religion. And... that all civil rights and the right to hold office were to be extended to persons of any Christian denomination.

On October 17, 1777, when he heard of the British General Burgoyne surrendering over 5000 troops to the American General Gates at Saratoga, Roger Sherman exclaimed:

This is the Lord's doing, and marvelous in our eyes!

Roger Sherman supported the act of Congress authorizing President Washington to officially declare a national Thanksgiving Day holiday. His remarks were recorded in the Journals of Congress:

Mr. Sherman justified the practice of thanksgiving, on any signal event, not only as a laudable one in itself, but as warranted by a number of precedents in Holy Writ: for instance, the solemn thanksgivings and rejoicings which took place in the time of Solomon, after the building of the temple, was a case in point. This example, he thought, worthy of Christian imitation on the present occasion.

While he was in Congress, Roger Sherman objected to a report from the War Committee which would have allowed the army to give five hundred lashes by the courts-martial to a delinquent soldier. He successfully opposed the proposal, using for his argument the scripture Deuteronomy chapter 25, verse 3:

Forty stripes he may give him, and not exceed: lest, if he should exceed, and beat him above these with many stripes, then thy brother should seem vile unto thee.

Roger Sherman described the necessity of:

Admiring and thankfully acknowledging the riches of redeeming love, and earnestly imploring that divine assistance which may enable us to live no more to ourselves, but to him who loved us and gave himself to die for us.

Roger Sherman joined the Congregational Church in 1742 and faithfully served as clerk, deacon and treasurer. He spoke very highly of his pastor, the Reverend Jonathan Edwards, the younger:

I esteem him one of the best of preachers that I am acquainted with, sound in faith, and pious and diligent in his studies and attention to the duties of his office.

In 1788, as a member of the White Haven Congregational Church, Roger Sherman was asked to use his expertise in revising the wording of their creed. In his own handwriting, he wrote the following:

I believe that there is one only living and true God, existing in three persons, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, the same in substance equal in power and glory.

That the scriptures of the old and new testaments are a revelation from God, and a complete rule to direct us how we may glorify and enjoy him.

That God has foreordained whatsoever comes to pass, so as thereby he is not the author or approver of sin.

That he creates all things, and preserves and govern all creatures and all their actions, in a manner perfectly consistent with the freedom of will in moral agents, and the usefulness of means.

That he made man at first perfectly holy, that the first man sinned, and as he was the public head of his posterity, they all became sinners in consequence of his first transgression, are wholly indisposed to that which is good and inclined to evil, and on account of sin are liable to all the miseries of this life, to death, and to the pains of hell forever.

I believe that God having elected some of mankind to eternal life, did send his own Son to become man, die in the room and stead of sinners and thus to lay a foundation for the offer of pardon and salvation to all mankind, so as all may be saved who are willing to accept the gospel offer:

also by his special grace and spirit, to regenerate, sanctify and enable to persevere in holiness, all who shall be saved; and to procure in consequence of their repentance and faith in himself their justification by virtue of his atonement as the only meritorious cause.

I believe a visible church to be a congregation of those who make a credible profession of their faith in Christ, and obedience to him, joined by the bond of the covenant....

I believe that the souls of believers are at their death made perfectly holy, and immediately taken to glory: that at the end of this world there will be a resurrection of the dead, and a final judgement of all mankind, when the righteous shall be publicly acquitted by Christ the Judge and admitted to everlasting life and glory, and the wicked be sentenced to everlasting punishment.

In 1789, while serving as a U.S. Representative from Connecticut, Roger Sherman wrote a sermon titled, "A Short Sermon on the Duty of Self-Examination Preparatory to Receiving the Lord's Supper":

Self-examination previous to an approach to the holy supper of the Lord is a necessary, tho' I fear too much neglected duty...

Representative Roger Sherman wrote a letter from New York to Samuel Hopkins, the Congregational minister of Newport, Rhode Island:

That a God of infinite Goodness can (through atonement) have mercy on whom He will, consistent with the honor of His Law and Government and all of His perfections, is a much better ground of hope than the denial of self-love.

Benjamin Rush, also a signer of the Declaration of Independence, wrote his estimation of Roger Sherman in 1777:

He was not less distinguished for his piety than his patriotism. He once objected to a motion for Congress sitting on a Sunday upon an occasion which he thought did not require it, and gave as a reason for his objection a regard for the commands of his Maker.

President John Adams described Roger Sherman, who had been elected a U.S. Senator in 1791, as:

...an old Puritan, as honest as an angel and as firm in the cause of American Independence as Mount Atlas.

Engraved on Roger Sherman's tomb is the Epitaph:

IN MEMORY OF
THE HON. ROGER SHERMAN, ESQ.
MAYOR OF THE CITY OF NEW HAVEN, AND SENATOR OF THE UNITED STATES.
HE WAS BORN AT NEWTOWN, IN MASSACHUSETTS,
APRIL 19th, 1721
AND DIED IN NEW HAVEN, JULY 23rd, A. D. 1793, AGED LXXII.
...He ever adorned the profession of Christianity which he made in youth; and, distinguished through life for public usefulness, died in the prospect of a blessed immortality.

Adams, Samuel (September 27, 1722-October 2, 1803), was a Revolutionary leader and signer of the Declaration of Independence. He was the cousin John Adams, the second President. Samuel Adams was known as the "Father of the American Revolution." He labored over 20 years as a patriot and leader. He instigated the Boston Tea Party, signed the Declaration of Independence, called for the first Continental Congress and served as a member of Congress until 1781. He helped draft the Massachusetts Constitution, 1779; served as the state's Lieutenant Governor under Governor John Hancock, 1789-93; and Governor of Massachusetts, 1793-97. The State of Massachusetts, as evidence of the high esteem in which he was held, chose to be represented by a statue of Samuel Adams in the U.S. Capitol.

In 1750, Samuel Adams wrote:

He therefore is the truest friend to the liberty of his country who tries most to promote its virtue, and who, so far as his power and influence extend, will not suffer a man to be chosen into any office of power and trust who is not a wise and virtuous man...The sum of all is, if we would most truly enjoy this gift of Heaven, let us become a virtuous people.

Samuel Adams formed the Committees of Correspondence, which were largely responsible for the unity and cohesion of the Colonists preceding the Revolution. The original Committee, formed in Boston, had three goals: (1) delineate the rights of Colonists as men; (2) detail how these rights had been violated; (3) publicize these rights and the violations thereof throughout the Colonies. His reports spread like fire through the towns and parishes, many times by an early pony express system. His work, The Rights of the Colonists, began to be circulated on November 20, 1772. In it, Samuel Adams stated:

Among the natural rights of the Colonists are these: First, a right to life; Secondly, to liberty; Thirdly, to property; together with the right to support and defend them in the best manner they can... The supreme power cannot justly take from any man any part of his property, without his consent in person or by his representative.

On November 20, 1772, in the section of The Rights of the Colonists entitled, "The Rights of the Colonist as Subjects," Samuel Adams stated:

[Government] has no right to absolute, arbitrary power over the lives and fortunes of the people; nor can mortals assume a prerogative not only too high for men, but for angels, and therefore reserved for the exercise of the Deity alone.

On November 20, 1772, in the section of The Rights of the Colonists entitled, "The Rights of the Colonist as Men," Samuel Adams declared:

As neither reason requires nor religion permits the contrary, every man living in or out of a state of civil society has a right peaceably and quietly to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience.

"Just and true liberty, equal and impartial liberty," in matters spiritual and temporal, is a thing that all men are clearly entitled to by the eternal and immutable laws of God and nature, as well as by the law of nations and all well-grounded municipal laws, which must have their foundation in the former.

In regards to religion, mutual toleration in the different professions thereof is what all good and candid minds in all ages have ever practiced, and, both by precept and example, inculcated on mankind, and it is now generally agreed among Christians that this spirit of toleration, in the fullest extent consistent with the being of civil society, is the chief characteristical mark of the church.

On November 20, 1772, in the section of The Rights of the Colonists entitled, "The Rights of the Colonist as Christians," Samuel Adams declared:

The right to freedom being the gift of God Almighty, the rights of the Colonists as Christians may best be understood by reading and carefully studying the institutions of The Great Law Giver and the Head of the Christian Church, which are to be found clearly written and promulgated in the New Testament.

On September 6, 1774, the second day of the Congressional Congress, Samuel Adams proposed that the session be opened with prayer, in spite of the various Christian sects represented:

Christian men, who had come together for solemn deliberation in the hour of their extremity, to say there was so wide a difference in their religious belief that they could not, as one man, bow the knee in prayer to the Almighty, whose advice and assistance they hoped to obtain.

In 1775, in response to an entreaty by British General Gage, who intended to dissuade him from his resolve, Samuel Adams answered:

I trust I have long since made my peace with the King of Kings. No personal consideration shall induce me to abandon the righteous cause of my country. Tell Governor Gage it is the advise of Samuel Adams to him no longer to insult the feelings of an exasperated people.

On April 16, 1776, Samuel Adams wrote a letter to James Warren from Philadelphia:

My Dear Sir, - I have not yet congratulated you in the unexpected and happy change of our affairs in the removal of the rebel army from Boston. Our worthy friend Major Hawley in his letter to me declines giving me joy on this occasion.

He thinks it best to put off the ceremony till the congress shall proclaim Independence. In my opinion, however, it becomes us to rejoice and religiously to acknowledge the goodness of the Supreme Being who in this instance hath signally appeared for us...

They have attempted to subdue us by force, but God Be praised, in vain.

On April 30, 1776, Samuel Adams wrote to John Scollay of Boston:

Our grateful acknowledgements are to the Supreme Being who has not been regardless of the multiplied oppressions which the inhabitants of that city have suffered....

Revelation assures us that "Righteousness exalteth a nation." Communities are dealt with in this world by the wise and just Ruler of the Universe. He rewards or punishes them according to their general character.

The diminution of public virtue is usually attended with that of public happiness, and the public liberty will not long survive the total extinction of morals. "The Roman Empire," says the historian, "must have sunk, though the Goths had not invaded it. Why? Because the Roman virtue was sunk."

Could I be assured that America would remain virtuous, I would venture to defy the utmost efforts of enemies to subjugate her.

You will allow me to remind you, that the morals of that city which has borne so great a share in the American contest, depend much upon the vigilance of the respectable body of magistrates, of which you are a member.

As the Declaration of Independence was being signed, 1776, Samuel Adams declared:

We have this day restored the Sovereign to Whom all men ought to be obedient. He reigns in heaven and from the rising to the setting of the sun, let His kingdom come.

Following the public reading of the Declaration of Independence, Samuel Adams noted:

The people, I am told, recognize the resolution as though it were a decree promulgated from heaven.

On August 1, 1776, Samuel Adams addressed the Continental Congress assembled at the State House in Philadelphia:

Countrymen and brethren: I would gladly have declined an honor to which I find myself unequal. I have not the calmness and impartiality which the infinite importance of the occasion demands.

I will not deny the charge of my enemies, that resentment for the accumulated injuries of our country and an ardor for her glory... may deprive me of that accuracy of judgement and expression which men of cooler passions may possess.

Let me beseech you then, to hear me with caution, to examine without prejudice, and to correct the mistakes into which I may be hurried by my zeal....

This day, I trust, the reign of political protestantism will commence. We have explored the temple of royalty, and found that the idol we have bowed down to, has eyes which see not, ears that hear not our prayers, and a heart like the nether millstone.

We have this day restored the Sovereign, to whom alone all men ought to be obedient. He reigns in Heaven, and with a propitious eye beholds his subjects assuming that freedom of thought, and dignity of self-direction which He bestowed on them....

We are now on this continent to the astonishment of the world three millions of souls united in one common cause. We have large armies, well disciplined and appointed, with commanders inferior to none in military skill, and superior in activity and zeal.

We are furnished with arsenals and stores beyond our most sanguine expectations, and foreign nations are waiting to crown our success by their alliances.

There are instances of, I would say, an almost astonishing Providence in our favor; our success has staggered our enemies, and almost given faith to infidels; so that we may truly say it is not our own arm which has saved us.

The hand of Heaven appears to have led us on to be, perhaps, humble instruments and means in the great Providential dispensation which is completing.

We have fled from the political Sodom; let us not look back, lest we perish and become a monument of infamy and derision to the world!...

And, brethren and fellow-countrymen, if it was ever granted to mortals to trace the designs of Providence, and interpret its manifestations in favor of their cause, we may, with humility of soul, cry out, "Not unto us, not unto us, but to thy Name be the praise."

The confusion of the devices among our enemies, and the rage of the elements against them, have done almost as much towards our success as either our councils or our arms.

The time at which this attempt on our liberties was made, when we were ripened into maturity, had acquired a knowledge of war, and were free from the incursions of enemies in this country, the gradual advances of our oppressors enabling us to prepare for our defence, the unusual fertility of our lands and clemency of the seasons, the success which at first attended our feeble arms, producing unanimity among our friends and reducing our internal foes to acquiescence

These are all strong and palpable marks and assurances, that Providence is yet gracious unto Zion, that it will turn away the captivity of Jacob.

Our glorious reformers, when they broke through the fetters of superstition, effected more than could be expected from an age so darkened.

But they left much to be done by their posterity. They lopped off, indeed, some of the branches...but they left the root and stock when they left us under the domination of human systems and decisions, usurping the infallibility which can be attributed to Revelation alone. They dethroned one usurper only to raise up another....

And if we now cast our eyes over the nations of the earth we shall find, that instead of possessing the pure religion of the gospel, they may be divided either into infidels who deny the truth, or politicians who make religion a stalking horse for their ambition, of professors, who walk in the trammels of orthodoxy, and are more attentive to traditions and ordinances of men than to the oracles of truth.

Thus by the beneficence of Providence, we shall behold our empire arising, founded on justice and the voluntary consent of the people, and giving full scope to the exercise of those faculties and rights which most ennoble our species.

Besides the advantages of liberty and the most equal constitution, Heaven has given us a country with every variety of climate and soil, pouring forth in abundance whatever is necessary for the support, comfort, and strength of a nation.

Within our own borders we possess all the means of sustenance, defence, and commerce; at the same time, these advantages are so distributed among the different States of this continent, as if nature had in view to proclaim to us - be united among yourselves, and you will want nothing from the rest of the world.

Go on, then, in your generous enterprise, with gratitude to Heaven for past success, and confidence of it in the future. For my own part, I ask no greater blessing than to share with you the common danger and common glory.

On November 22, 1780, Samuel Adams gave this advice to T. Wells, his daughter's fiancée:

I could say a thousand things to you, if I had leisure. I could dwell on the importance of piety and religion, of industry and frugality, of prudence, economy, regularity and even Government, all of which are essential to the well being of a family. But I have not time. I cannot however help repeating piety, because I think it indispensable. Religion in a family is at once its brightest ornament and its best security.

On November 27, 1780, in a letter to Elbridge Gerry, Samuel Adams stated:

More, in my opinion, is to be done than conquering our British enemies, in order to establish the liberties of our country on a solid basis. Human nature, I am afraid, is too much debased to relish the republican principles in which the new government of the commonwealth of Massachusetts appears to be founded. Mankind is prone to political idolatry....

May Heaven inspire the present rulers with wisdom and sound understanding! In all probability they will stamp the character of the people...if we look into the history of governors, we shall find that their principles and manners have always had a mighty influence on the people.

On October 4, 1790, Samuel Adams wrote to his cousin, John Adams, who was then the Vice-President of the United States:

Let divines and philosophers, statesmen and patriots, unite their endeavors to renovate the age, by impressing the minds of men with the importance of educating their little boys and girls, of inculcating in the minds of youth the fear and love of the Deity and universal philanthropy, and, in subordination to these great principles, the love of their country; of instructing them in the art of self-government without which they never can act a wise part in the government of societies, great or small; in short, of leading them in the study and practice of the exalted virtues of the Christian system.

On October 18, 1790, John Adams wrote in reply concerning these issues, stating:

You and I agree.

In 1794, Governor Samuel Adams of Massachusetts, having just risen from Lieutenant Governor following the death of Governor John Hancock, addressed the State Legislature:

In the supposed state of nature, all men are equally bound by the laws of nature, or to speak more properly, the laws of the Creator: - They are imprinted by the finger of God on the heart of man. Thou shalt do no injury to thy neighbor, is the voice of nature and reason, and it is confirmed by written revelation.

On January 17, 1794, Governor Samuel Adams addressed the Massachusetts Legislature:

Human laws excite fears and apprehensions, lest crimes committed be detected and punished; But a virtuous education is calculated to reach and influence the heart, and to prevent crimes....

Such an education, which leads the youth beyond mere outside show, will impress their minds with a profound reverence of the Deity, universal benevolence, and a warm attachment and affection towards their country. It will excite in them a just regard to Divine Revelation, which informs them of the original character and dignity of man; and it will inspire them with a sense of true honor.

On October 14, 1795, Samuel Adams, as Governor of the State of Massachusetts, issued a Proclamation for a Day of Public Thanksgiving and Praise:

Published by Authority (Seal) Commonwealth of Massachusetts

BY THE GOVERNOR

A PROCLAMATION FOR A DAY OF PUBLIC THANKSGIVING AND PRAISE

Forasmuch as the occasional meeting of a people for the exercise of piety and devotion towards God, more especially of those who enjoy the light of divine revelation, as a strong tendency to impress their minds with a sense of dependence upon Him and their obligations to Him;

I have thought fit, according to the ancient and laudable practice of our renowned ancestors, to appoint a day of public thanksgiving to God, for the great benefits which he has been pleased to bestow upon us, in the year past.

And I do by advice and consent of the council, appoint Thursday, the nineteenth day of November next, to be observed as a day of public thanksgiving and praise throughout this commonwealth: calling upon the ministers of the Gospel of all denominations, with their respective congregations to assemble on that day to offer to God, their unfeigned gratitude, for his great goodness to the people of the United States in general, and of this commonwealth in particular.

More especially in that he hath in His good providence united the several states under a national compact formed by themselves, whereby they may defend themselves against external enemies, and maintain peace and harmony with each other.

That internal tranquility has been contained within this commonwealth; and that the voice of health is so generously heard in the habitations of the people.

That the earth has yielded her increase, so that the labors of our industrious husbandmen have been abundantly crowned with plenty...

That while other nations have been involved in war, attended with an uncommon profusion of human blood, we in the course of Divine Providence, have been preserved from so grievous a calamity, and have enjoyed so great a measure of the blessing of peace.

And I do recommend that together with our thanksgiving, humble prayer may be offered to God, that we may be enabled, by the subsequent obedience of our hearts and manners, to testify the sincerity of our profession of gratitude, in the sight of God and man; and thus be prepared for the reception of future blessings.

That God would be pleased to guide and direct the administration of the Federal government, and those of the several states, in union, so that the whole people may continue to be safe and happy in the constitutional enjoyment of their rights, liberties and privileges, and our governments be greatly respected at home and abroad...

And I do recommend to the people of this commonwealth, to abstain from all such labor and recreations as may not be consistent with the solemnity of the said day.

On March 20, 1797, in a Proclamation of a Day of Fast, Massachusetts Governor Samuel Adams declared:

And as it is our duty to extend our wishes to the happiness of the great family of man, I conceive that we cannot better express ourselves than by humbly supplicating the Supreme Ruler of the world that the rod of tyrants may be broken to pieces, and the oppressed made free again;

that wars may cease in all the earth, and that the confusions that are and have been among nations may be overruled by promoting and speedily bringing on that holy and happy period when the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ may be everywhere established, and all people everywhere willingly bow to the sceptre of Him who is Prince of Peace.

In 1800, Dr. Benjamin Rush described Governor Samuel Adams:

He considered national happiness and the public patronage of religion inseparably connected; and so great was his regard for public worship, as a means of promoting religion, that he constantly attended divine service in the German church in Yorktown while Congress sat there, when there was no service in their chapel....

His morals were irreproachable, and even ambition and avarice, the usual vices of politicians, seemed to have no place in his breast.

In his last known letter to Thomas Paine, Samuel Adams voiced:

When I heard you had turned your mind to a defense of infidelity, I felt myself much astounded and more grieved, that you had attempted a measure so injurious to the feelings and so repugnant to the true interest of so great a part of the citizens of the United States. The people of New England, if you will allow me to use a Scripture phrase, are fast returning to their first love.

On February 12, 1779, in a letter to James Warren, Samuel Adams stated:

A general Dissolution of Principles and Manners will more surely overthrow the Liberties of America than the whole Force of the Common Enemy. While the People are virtuous they cannot be subdued; but when they lose their virtue they will be ready to surrender their Liberties to the first external or internal invader....

If Virtue and Knowledge are diffused among the People, they will never be enslaved. This will be their great Security.

Samuel Adams stated:

American Quotations.txt

Neither the wisest constitution nor the wisest laws will secure the liberty and happiness of a people whose manners are universally corrupt.

I conceive we cannot better express ourselves than by humbly supplicating the Supreme Ruler of the world....

that the confusions that are and have been among the nations may be overruled by the promoting and speedily bringing in the holy and happy period when the kingdoms of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ may be everywhere established, and the people willingly bow to the sceptre of Him who is the Prince of Peace.

Samuel Adams wrote in his Last Will and Testament:

Principally, and first of all, I resign my soul to the Almighty Being who gave it, and my body I commit to the dust, relying on the merits of Jesus Christ for the pardon of my sins.

Langdon, Samuel (January 12, 1723-November 29, 1797), was the president of Harvard University and a member of the New Hampshire Convention to ratify the U.S. Constitution, 1788. He was an original member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences.

On May 31, 1775, Harvard President Samuel Langdon addressed the Massachusetts Provincial Congress:

Wherefore is all this evil upon us? Is it not because we have forsaken the Lord? Can we say we are innocent of crimes against God? No, surely it becomes us to humble ourselves under His mighty hand, that He may exalt us in due time....

We have rebelled against God. We have lost the true spirit of Christianity, though we retain the outward profession and form of it.... By many, the Gospel is corrupted into a superficial system of moral philosophy, little better than ancient Platonism....

My brethren, let us repent and implore the divine mercy. Let us amend our ways and our doings, reform everything that has been provoking the Most High, and thus endeavor to obtain the gracious interpositions of Providence for our deliverance....

If God be for us, who can be against us? The enemy has reproached us for calling on His name and professing our trust in Him. They have made a mock of our solemn fasts and every appearance of serious Christianity in the land....

May our land be purged from all its sins! Then the Lord will be our refuge and our strength, a very present help in trouble, and we will have no reason to be afraid, though thousands of enemies set themselves against us round about.

May the Lord hear us in this day of trouble.... We will rejoice in His salvation, and in the name of our God, we will set up our banners!

Witherspoon, John (February 5, 1723-November 15, 1794), was an American Revolutionary patriot and clergyman. Born in Scotland, being a descendant of John Knox on his mother's side, John Witherspoon's influence as an educator was widely felt in America. He signed the Declaration of Independence and was a member of the Continental Congress. He was a primary proponent of separation of powers insisting on inclusions to check and balance the power of government. He served on over 120 Congressional committees, including: the Board of War, the Committee on Secret Correspondence, or Foreign Affairs, and the Committee on Clothing for the Army.

As president of Princeton University, 1768-94, he graduated 478 students who directly shaped America, including: James Madison, who served eight years as Secretary of State and eight years as U.S. President; Aaron Burr, Jr., who was a U.S. Vice-President; 3 U.S. Supreme Court justices; 10 Cabinet members; 13 state governors; 21 U.S. Senators; 39 U.S. Representatives; and 114 ministers. Through his students, John Witherspoon's views were reflected in our Constitution, as 9 (one-sixth) of the 55 delegates to the Constitutional Convention were graduates of Princeton University: Gunning Bedford Jr. of Delaware; David Brearley of New Jersey; William Richardson Davie of North Carolina; Jonathan Dayton of New Jersey; William Churchill Houston of New Jersey; James Madison of Virginia; Alexander Martin of North Carolina; Luther Martin of Maryland; and William Paterson of New Jersey.

On May 17, 1776, the same day the Continental Congress declared a National Day of Fasting, Humiliation and Prayer, Reverend John Witherspoon delivered a sermon at Princeton University entitled "The Dominion of Providence over the Passions of Men," in which he stated:

While we give praise to God, the Supreme Disposer of all events, for His interposition on our behalf, let us guard against the dangerous error of trusting in, or boasting of, an arm of flesh....

If your cause is just, if your principles are pure, and if your conduct is prudent, you need not fear the multitude of opposing hosts.

What follows from this? That he is the best friend to American liberty, who is most sincere and active in promoting true and undefiled religion, and who sets himself with the greatest firmness to bear down profanity and immorality of every kind.

Whoever is an avowed enemy of God, I scruple not to call him an enemy of his country.

It is in the man of piety and inward principle, that we may expect to find the uncorrupted patriot, the useful citizen, and the invincible soldier. - God grant that in America true religion and civil liberty may be inseparable and that the unjust attempts to destroy the one, may in the issue tend to the support and establishment of both.

John Witherspoon championed against "tyranny of conscience," citing:

There is not a single instance in history, in which civil liberty was lost, and religious liberty preserved entire.... If therefore we yield up our temporal property, we at the same time deliver the conscience into bondage.... [Governments are to] defend and secure rights of conscience in the most equal and impartial manner....

John Witherspoon continually crusaded for freedom, not only by circulating a letter urging ministers to support independence, but also by publishing a sermon beseeching Scotsmen to insist on their "ancient rights" against Britain, entitled:

"Address to the Natives of Scotland residing in America."

In his "Pastoral Letter," he explained:

Universal profligacy makes a nation ripe for divine judgements and is the natural means of bringing them to ruin; reformation of manners is of the utmost necessity in our present distress.

As a convention delegate from the colony of New Jersey, Rev. Witherspoon argued in favor of separation from England, declaring:

Gentlemen, New Jersey is ready to vote for independence. In our judgement, the country is not only ripe for independence, but we are in danger of becoming rotten for the want of it, if we delay any longer!

After the peace treaty was negotiated with England, John Witherspoon delivered his "Thanksgiving Sermon," entreating Americans to live for:

The Glory of God, the public interest of religion and the good of others, [as] civil liberty cannot be long preserved without virtue. [A Republic] must either preserve its virtue or lose its liberty.

An insight into John Witherspoon's convictions can be gleaned from the sermons he presented while pastor of Laigh Kirk in Paisley, Scotland, from 1757 to 1768, which included:

"The Absolute Necessity of Salvation through Christ." ;

"Inquiry into the Scripture Meaning of Charity," which he described as "an ardent and unfeigned love to others and a desire of their welfare, temporal and eternal... [with] the deepest concern for their dangerous state." ;

"The Trial of Religious Truth by Its Moral Influence," using the text "By their fruits ye shall know them." ;

John Witherspoon's beliefs can be seen in his statements:

The character of a Christian must be taken from Holy Scriptures... the unerring standard.

Fly also for forgiveness to the atoning blood of the great Redeemer...

Press every hearer to a sincere concern for his own soul's salvation.

The doctrine of divine Providence is very full and complete in the sacred oracles.

In his Lectures on Divinity, Witherspoon enumerated:

Religion is the grand concern of us all... the salvation of our souls in the one thing needful.

In regards to man's need for redemption, Reverend John Witherspoon explained:

The corruption of our nature... is the foundation-stone of the doctrine of redemption. Nothing can be more absolutely necessary to true religion, than a clear conviction of the sinfulness of our nature and state....

Men of lax and corrupt principles take great delight in speaking to the praise of human nature, and extolling its dignity, without distinguishing what it was at its first creation, from what it is in its present fallen state. But I appeal from these visionaries' reasonings to the history of all ages, and the inflexible testimony of daily experience. (C)andid attention, either to past history or present state of the world, but above all, the ravages of lawless power, ought to humble us in the dust....

The evil of sin appears from every page of the sacred oracles.... The history of the world is little else than the history of human guilt....

Nothing is more plain from scripture, or better supported by daily experience, than that man by nature is in fact incapable of recovery without the power of God specially interposed.

In reflecting on "conscience," Reverend John Witherspoon delineated:

There remains so much of God written on the conscience of even the most profligate....

It pleased God to write his law upon the heart of man at first. And the great lines of duty, however obscured by their original apostasy, are still so visible as to afford an opportunity of judging what conduct and practice is or is not agreeable to its dictates.

Such authority hath natural conscience still in man that it renders those... inexcusable in the sight of God (Rom. 1:20-2:14). But it is of importance in the present argument to observe, that every one is able to pass a far surer judgement on the moral character of another, than his own. The pollution of the heart brings a corrupt bias on the judgement, in the man's own case.... In determining the character of others, this bias is less sensibly felt.

A course advertisement for Reverend John Witherspoon's classes at Princeton University read:

The President has also engaged to give Lectures twice in the Week, on the following Subjects (1) On Chronology and History, civil as well as sacred; a Branch of Study, of itself extremely useful and delightful, and at present in the highest Reputation in every Part of Europe, (2) Critical Lectures on the Scripture, with the Addition of Discourses on Criticism in general; the several Species of Writing, and the fine Arts, (3) Lectures on Composition, and the Eloquence of the Pulpit and the Bar.

With prophetic insight as to our country's growth, John Witherspoon commented to his friend, Rev. Ashabel Green:

Don't be surprised if you see a turnpike all the way to the Pacific Ocean in your lifetime.

John Adams, after attending church at the College of New Jersey, wrote:

Heard Dr. Witherspoon all Day. A clear, sensible, Preacher.

Reverend John Witherspoon, who had lost two sons in the Revolutionary War, was the epitome of a patriot. After his wife died in October of 1789, he re-entered politics, heading up a committee in the New Jersey legislature to abolish slavery. Following John Witherspoon's death, John Adams admired him as:

A true son of liberty. So he was. But first, he was a son of the Cross.

Blackstone, Sir William (July 10, 1723-February 14, 1780), was an English jurist who deeply influenced the growth of Common Law, jurisprudence and the basis of law in America. In 1758, he was honored by being elected Oxford's first Vinerian Lecturer, and in 1770, he became one of the Judges of the Common Pleas. From 1765 to 1770, Sir William Blackstone published his highly influential work entitled, Commentaries on the Laws of England. These were so universally accepted in America that by 1775 they had sold more copies in America than in England. This work set the foundation for America's great legal minds including Chief Justice John Marshall. When scholars examined nearly 15,000 items written by the Founding Fathers from 1760 to 1805 (including books, newspapers articles, monographs, pamphlets, etc.), it was found that Sir William Blackstone was quoted more than any other author except one.

James Madison, the "Chief Architect of the Constitution," endorsed Blackstone, saying:

I very cheerfully express my approbation of the proposed edition of Blackstone's Commentaries.

Sir William Blackstone expressed the presuppositional base for law in his Commentaries on the Laws of England, 1765-70:

Man, considered as a creature, must necessarily be subject to the laws of his Creator, for he is entirely a dependent being... And, consequently, as man depends absolutely upon his Maker for everything, it is necessary that he should in all points conform to his Maker's will... this will of his Maker is called the law of nature.

Law of Nature. This will of his Maker is called the law of nature. For as God, when He created matter, and endued it with a principle of mobility, established certain rules for the perpetual direction of that motion; so, when He created man, and endued him with free will to conduct himself in all parts of life, He laid down certain immutable laws of human nature, whereby that free will is in some degree regulated and restrained, and gave him also the faculty of reason to discover the purport of those laws.

Considering the Creator only a Being of infinite power, He was able unquestionably to have prescribed whatever laws He pleased to His creature, man, however unjust or severe. But as He is also a Being of infinite wisdom, He has laid down only such laws as were founded in those relations of justice, that existed in the nature of things antecedent to any positive precept.

These are the eternal, immutable laws of good and evil, to which the Creator Himself in all His Dispensations conforms; and which He has enabled human reason to discover, so far as they are necessary for the conduct of human actions. Such among others, are these principles: that we should live honestly, should hurt nobody, and should render to everyone his due; to which three general precepts Justinian has reduced the whole doctrine of law. . . .

This law of nature, being coeval with mankind and dictated by God Himself, is of course superior in obligation to any other. It is binding over all the globe in all countries, and at all times: no human laws are of any validity, if contrary to this. . . .

Revealed Law. This has given manifold occasion for the interposition of divine providence; which in compassion to the frailty, the imperfection, and the blindness of human reason, hath been pleased, at sundry times and in divers manners, to discover and enforce its laws by an immediate and direct revelation.

The doctrines thus delivered we call the revealed or divine law, and they are to be found only in the Holy Scriptures. These precepts, when revealed, are found upon comparison to be really a part of the original law of nature as they tend in all their consequences to man's felicity.

But we are not from thence to conclude that the knowledge of these truths was attainable by reason, in its present corrupted state; since we find that, until they were revealed, they were hid from the wisdom of the ages.

As then the moral precepts of this law are indeed of the same original with those of the law of nature, so their intrinsic obligation is of equal strength and perpetuity. Yet undoubtedly the revealed law is of infinitely more authenticity than that moral system, which is framed by ethical writers, and denominated the natural law.

Because one is the law of nature, expressly declared so to be by God Himself; the other is only what, by the assistance of human reason, we imagine to be that law. If we could be as certain of the latter as we are of the former, both would have an equal authority; but, till then, they can never be put in any competition together.

Upon these two foundations, the law of nature and the law of revelation, depend all human laws; that is to say, no human laws should be suffered to contradict these.

Sir William Blackstone explicated:

Blasphemy against the Almighty is denying his being or providence, or uttering contumelious reproaches on our Savior Christ. It is punished, at common law by fine and imprisonment, for Christianity is part of the laws of the land.

If [the legislature] will positively enact a thing to be done, the judges are not at liberty to reject it, for that were to set the judicial power above that of the legislature, which would be subversive of all government.

To deny the possibility, nay, actual existence, of witchcraft and sorcery, is at once to contradict the revealed Word of God in various passages both of the Old and New Testament.

The preservation of Christianity as a national religion is abstracted from its own intrinsic truth, of the utmost consequence to the civil state, which a single instance will sufficiently demonstrate.

The belief of a future state of rewards and punishments, the entertaining just ideas of the main attributes of the Supreme Being, and a firm persuasion that He superintends and will finally compensate every action in human life (all which are revealed in the doctrines of our Savior, Christ), these are the grand foundations of all judicial oaths, which call God to witness the truth of those facts which perhaps may be only known to Him and the party attesting; all moral evidences, therefore, all confidence in human veracity, must be weakened by apostasy, and overthrown by total infidelity.

Wherefore, all affronts to Christianity, or endeavors to depreciate its efficacy, in those who have once professed it, are highly deserving of censure.

Livingston, William (November 1723-July 25, 1790), was a Brigadier General in the militia and a member of the First and Second Continental Congresses. He signed the U.S. Constitution, being 61 years old at the time. He served as the first Governor of New Jersey, and was re-elected for 14 years.

Growing up on the frontier around Albany, William Livingston knew the missionaries who worked among the Mohawks. He graduated first in his class from Yale and went on to study law. While living in New York, he published articles defending the faith, many of which were published in The Independent Reflector, such as No. 46:

I believe the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, without any foreign comments or human explanations...I believe that he who feareth God and worketh righteousness will be accepted of Him...

I believe that the virulence of some...proceeds not from their affection to Christianity, which is founded on too firm a basis to be shaken by the freest inquiry, and the Divine authority of which I sincerely believe without receiving a farthing for saying so.

In 1768, William Livingston said:

The land we possess is the gift of Heaven to our fathers, and Divine Providence seems to have decreed it to our latest posterity.

In 1772, William Livingston took in Alexander Hamilton, who was 16 years old at the time, and opened the doors for him to attend King's College (Columbia University) in New York. Hamilton went on to become the first Secretary of the Treasury.

On March 16, 1776, as recorded in the Journal of Congress, General William Livingston presented a resolution in the Continental Congress, which passed without dissent, declaring May 17, 1776, as a National Day of Humiliation, Fasting and Prayer:

We earnestly recommend that Friday, the 17th day of May next, be observed by the colonies as a day of humiliation, fasting, and prayer, that we may with united hearts confess and bewail our manifold sins and transgressions, and by a sincere repentance and amendment of life appease God's righteous displeasure, and through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ obtain His pardon and forgiveness.

In September of 1776, in his Inaugural Address as the first elected Governor of the State of New Jersey, William Livingston stated:

May the foundation of our infant State be laid in virtue and the fear of God, and the superstructure will rise glorious, and endure for ages.

William Livingston wrote in a letter:

If the history (New Testament) be not true, then all the whole laws of nature were changed; all the motives and incentives to human actions that ever had obtained in this world have been entirely inverted; the wickedest men in the world have taken the greatest pains and endured the greatest hardship and misery to invent, practice, and propagate the most holy religion that ever was.

Backus, Isaac (January 9, 1724-November 20, 1806), was an American separatist leader and colonial historian. He wrote many influence works, including: History of New England - with Particular Reference to the Denomination of Christians Called Baptist, published in 1777; and "A Declaration of the Rights of the Inhabitants of the State of Massachusetts-Bay in New England," in which he stated:

Nothing can be true religion but a voluntary obedience unto His revealed will, of which each rational soul has an equal right to judge for himself, every person has an unalienable right to act in all religious affairs according to the full persuasion of his own mind.

In September of 1775, Isaac Backus spoke to the Massachusetts Assembly, in behalf of the Warren Association, on the subject of taxing religious dissenters:

Is not all America now appealing to Heaven against the injustice of being taxed where we are not represented, and against being judged by men who are interested in getting away our money? And will heaven approve your doing the same thing to your fellow servants? No, surely....

Yet, as we are persuaded that an entire freedom from being taxed by civil rulers to religious worship is not mere favor from any men in the world but a right and property granted us by God, who commands us to stand fast in it, we have not only the same reason to refuse an acknowledgement of such a taxing power here, as America has the above said power, but also, according to our present light, we should wrong our consciences in allowing that power to men, which we believe belongs only to God.

Kant, Immanuel (April 22, 1724-February 12, 1804), was a German philosopher, whose major philosophical work, Critique of Pure Reason, published in 1781, is comparable to the works of Plato or Aristotle in importance. His later works include Critique of Practical Reason, 1788, and Critique of Judgement, 1790. Born in Kaliningrad, Immanuel Kant stated:

The existence of the Bible, as a book for the people, is the greatest benefit which the human race has ever experienced. Every attempt to belittle it is a crime against humanity.

In the life and the Divine doctrine of Christ which are recorded in the Gospel, example and precept conspire to call men to the regular discharge of every moral duty for its own sake, and to the universal practice of pure virtue. "He can't be wrong whose life is in the right."

The Sermon on the Mount, in particular, comprises so pure a doctrine of religion, which Jesus obviously had the intention of introducing among the Jews, that we can not avoid considering it the Word of God.

Beyond doubt, Christ is the Founder of the first true Church; that is, that Church which, purified from the folly of superstition and the meanness of fanaticism, exhibits the moral kingdom of God upon the earth as far as can be done for man.

Mason, George (1725-October 7, 1792), was an American Revolutionary statesman and delegate from Virginia to the Constitutional Convention. He was a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses, a lawyer, judge, political philosopher and planter. The richest man in Virginia, George Mason owned 15,000 acres in Virginia and 80,000 acres in the Ohio area. He was the author of the Virginia Constitution and the Virginia Bill of Rights.

Although a delegate to the Constitutional Convention, George Mason refused to sign the United States Constitution as it did not abolish slavery and did not sufficiently limit the Federal Government's power from infringing on the rights of States. He disapproved strongly of the slave trade, vehemently hated paper money and disliked the idea of a strong, centralized Federal Government, fearing it would usurp the sovereignty of the individual States.

Called the "Father of the Bill of Rights," George Mason insisted that Congress add the first ten amendments to the Constitution in order to restrict the power of the federal government. His influence is worldwide, as virtually all succeeding constitutions have incorporated the pattern he set forth. The first ten amendments limiting centralized power, may be found foreshadowed in the Virginia Bill of Rights, June 12, 1776:

Article XVI. That Religion, or the Duty which we owe our Creator, and the Manner of discharging it, can be directed only by Reason and Convictions, not by Force or Violence; and therefore all Men are equally entitled to the free exercise of Religion, according to the Dictates of Conscience; and that it is the mutual Duty of all to practice Christian Forbearance, Love, and Charity towards each other.

George Mason stated before the General Court of Virginia:

The laws of nature are the laws of God, whose authority can be superseded by no power on earth.

This phrase of Mason's was mirrored in the Declaration of Independence as "the laws of nature and nature's God."

On August 22, 1787, George Mason stated:

Every master of slaves is born a petty tyrant. They bring the judgement of heaven upon a country. As nations cannot be rewarded or punished in the next world, they must be in this. By an inevitable chain of causes and effects, Providence punishes national sins, by national calamities.

George Mason proposed wording for the First Amendment:

All men have an equal, natural and unalienable right to the free exercise of religion, according to the dictates of conscience; and that no particular sect or society of Christians ought to be favored or established by law in preference to others.

On Tuesday, March 9, 1773, George Mason recorded his wife's death inside their 1759 Family Bible:

About three o'clock in the morning, died at Gunston-Hall...Mrs. Ann Mason, in the thirty-ninth year of her age; after a painful and tedious illness of more than nine months, which she bore with truly Christian Patience and resignation, in faithful hope of eternal Happiness in the world to come...

For many days before her death she had lost all hopes of recovery, and endeavour'd to wean herself from the affections of this life, saying that tho' it must cost her a hard struggle to reconcile herself to the hopes of parting with her husband and children, she hoped God would enable her to accomplish it...

An easy and agreeable companion, a kind neighbor, a steadfast friend, a humane mistress, a prudent and tender mother, a faithful, affectionate and most obliging wife; charitable to the poor and pious to her Maker, her virtue and religion were unmixed with hypocrisy or ostentation.

In his Last Will and Testament, George Mason stated:

I, George Mason, of "Gunston Hall", in the parish of Truro and county of Fairfax, being of perfect and sound mind and memory and in good health, but mindful of the uncertainty of human life and the imprudence of man's leaving his affairs to be settled upon a deathbed, do make and appoint this my last Will and Testament.

My soul, I resign into the hands of my Almighty Creator, whose tender mercies are over all His works, who hateth nothing that He hath made and to the Justice and Wisdom of whose dispensation I willingly and cheerfully submit, humbly hoping from His unbounded mercy and benevolence, through the merits of my blessed Saviour, a remission of my sins.

Otis, James (February 5, 1725-May 23, 1783), was a colonial lawyer, statesman and brother to the American poet Mercy Otis Warren (1728-1814). He graduated from Harvard College and in 1756, became the King's advocate-general of the vice-admiralty court at Boston. In 1761, he was elected as a representative of Boston to the Massachusetts General Court. His efforts led to the Stamp Act Congress of 1765. In 1764, James Otis cited the reason for government in "The Rights of the British Colonies Asserted and Proved":

The first principle and great end of government being to provide for the best good of all the people, this can be done only by a supreme legislative and executive ultimately in the people or whole community where God has placed it....

All power is of God. Next and only subordinate to Him in the present state of the well-formed, beautifully constructed British monarchy, standing where I hope it ever will stand, for the pillars are fixed in Righteousness, and Truth, is the King and Parliament....

Though permanently injured from an attack by British revenue officers, James Otis' contribution to the rise of American was instrumental. He once said:

The people's safety is the law of God.

Newton, John (July 24, 1725-December 21, 1807), was the captain of a slave trading ship. He converted to Christianity and wrote the spiritual song, Amazing Grace, having realized the wretchedness of his former profession. So depraved was he, that even his crew became disgusted. Once in a drunken stupor he fell overboard, and his crew, in order to rescue him, threw a harpoon through his leg in order to reel him back aboard. His constant limp thereafter was a reminder of how God could save such a wretch. Throughout the remainder of his life, he kept the anniversary of his conversion, March 10, 1748 (21st N.S.) as a day of humiliation and thanksgiving for his "deliverance." In 1788, he aided William Wilberforce's efforts to rid England of slavery by publishing his ghastly experiences in the slave trade.

John Newton wrote:

Amazing Grace, How sweet the sound,

That saved a wretch like me.
I once was lost, but now am found,
Was blind, but now I see.

Wythe, George (1726-June 8, 1806), was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. He was a member of the Continental Congress, a member of the House of Burgesses and the Mayor of Williamsburg. He served as the attorney general of the Virginia Colony and established the first law professorship in the United States at the College of William and Mary.

In February of 1776, George Wythe, Roger Sherman and John Adams, comprised a committee responsible for establishing guidelines for an embassy bound for Canada. Their instructions stated:

You are further to declare that we hold sacred the rights of conscience, and may promise to the whole people, solemnly in our name, the free and undisturbed exercise of their religion. And... that all civil rights and the right to hold office were to be extended to persons of any Christian denomination.

Prescott, William (February 20, 1726-October 13, 1795), was an American Colonel during the Revolutionary War. He built the fortifications at Breed's Hill and commanded the Colonial Militia at the Battle of Bunker Hill, 1775. He was an instrumental part of the battles of Long Island, 1776, and Saratoga, 1777.

In 1774, when the British blockaded the Boston harbor, William Prescott wrote to the city's inhabitants:

We heartily sympathize with you, and are always ready to do all in our power for your support, comfort and relief, knowing that Providence has placed you where you must stand the first shock.

We consider that we are all embarked in (the same boat) and must sink or swim together... Let us all be of one heart, and stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free.

And may He, of His infinite mercy, grant us deliverance of all our troubles.

Bowdoin, James (August 7, 1726-November 6, 1790), was an American Revolutionary leader, scientist and successful colonial merchant. He graduated from Harvard, 1745; served in the Massachusetts General Court, 1753-56, and the Executive Council of Massachusetts, 1757-74. He was the president of the Massachusetts Constitutional Convention, 1779. In 1785, he was elected Governor of Massachusetts after John Hancock's first term, and was known for ending Shays' Rebellion. He was active in the Massachusetts Convention which ratified the U.S. Constitution, 1788. In 1780, he founded the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, serving as its first president, and was a member of the Society for Propagating the Gospel Among the Indians and Others. Bowdoin College in Maine, founded in 1794, was named for him.

In formulating the Constitution of the State of Massachusetts, 1780, James Bowdoin stated:

The happiness of a people and the good order and preservation of civil government essentially depend upon piety, religion, and morality.

On November 8, 1780, in Boston, as president of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, James Bowdoin delivered A Philosophical Discourse, Addresses to the American Academy, of Arts and Sciences, etc., etc. In the section on natural history, he mentioned:

At the origination of man, when it was indispensably necessary he should be supplied with the means of subsistence...his beneficent Creator, the first and the Supremely Great Naturalist, made known to him the nature and qualities of things.

Warren, James (September 28, 1726-November 28, 1808), was the president of the Massachusetts Provincial Congress, following Joseph Warren's death. He was a Major-General in the Provincial Militia; a member of the Navy board for the Eastern Department, a member of the Governor's Council, 1792-94; and a presidential elector from Massachusetts, 1804. He was married to Mercy Otis Warren, 1724-1814, a remarkable author of the Revolutionary period, whose correspondence with numerous founding fathers has granted invaluable insight into our nation's history. In 1805, she wrote the History of the Rise, Progress and Termination of the American Revolution, in 3 volumes.

It was James Warren who first proposed the Committees of Correspondence to Samuel Adams, which were of inestimable influence in inspiring the spirit of freedom among the Colonies. On June 16, 1775, President James Warren and the Massachusetts Provincial Congress resolved:

IN Provincial Congress, Watertown, June 16TH, 1775.

As it has pleased Almighty GOD in his Providence to suffer the Calamities of an unnatural War to take Place among us, in Consequence of our sinful Declensions from Him, and our great Abuse of those inestimable Blessings bestowed upon us. And as we have Reason to fear, that unless we become a penitent and reformed People, we shall feel still severer Tokens of his Displeasure.

And as the most effectual Way to escape those desolating Judgements, which so evidently hang over us, and if it may be obtain the Restoration of our former Tranquility, will be - That we repent and return every one from his Iniquities, unto him that correcteth us, which if we do in Sincerity and Truth, we have no Reason to doubt but he will remove his Judgements - cause our Enemies to be at Peace with us - and prosper the Work of our Hands.

And as among the prevailing Sins of this Day, which threaten the Destruction of this Land, we have Reason to lament the frequent Prophanation of the Lord's-Day, or Christian Sabbath; many spending their Time in Idleness and Sloth, others in Diversion, and others in Journeying of Business, which is not necessary on said Day:

And as we earnestly desire that a Stop might be put to this great and prevailing Evil:

It is therefore RESOLVED, That it be recommended by this Congress, to the People of all Ranks and Denominations throughout this Colony, that they not only pay a religious Regard to that Day, and to the public Worship of God thereon; but that they also use their Influence to discountenance and suppress any Prophanations thereof in others.

And it is further RESOLVED, That it be recommended to the Ministers of the Gospel to read this Resolve to their several Congregations, accompanied with such Exhortations as they shall think proper.

And whereas there is great Danger that the Prophanation of the Lord's-Day will prevail in the Camp:

We earnestly recommend to all the Officers, not only to set good Examples; but that they strictly require of their Soldiers to keep up a religious Regard to that Day, and attend upon the public Worship of God thereon, so far as may be consistent with other Duties.

A true Copy from the Minutes,
Attest. SAMUEL FREEMAN, Secry.
By Order of the Congress,
JAMES WARREN, President.

Johnson, William Samuel (October 7, 1727-November 14, 1819), was one of the signers of the United State Constitution. He was a distinguished lawyer, having received an honorary doctorate in civil law from Oxford, 1766. He was a delegate to the Stamp Act Convention, a Commissioner to England and a member of the Continental Congress. He served as a state representative, a U.S. Senator, and a Justice on the Supreme Court of Connecticut. He was the President of Columbia College, 1787-1800.

William Samuel Johnson was the son of the well-known Anglican minister, Samuel Johnson and the great grandson of Robert Johnson, who came to America in 1638:

To assist in founding a "Godly Commonweal th" at New Haven.

As president of Columbia University (formerly King's College), William Samuel Johnson gave these profound remarks to the first graduating class after the Revolutionary War:

You this day, gentlemen, assume new characters, enter into new relations, and consequently incur new duties. You have, by the favor of Providence and the attention of friends, received a public education, the purpose whereof hath been to qualify you the better to serve your Creator and your country....

Your first great duties, you are sensible, are those you owe to Heaven, to your Creator and Redeemer. Let these be ever present to your minds, and exemplified in your lives and conduct.

Imprint deep upon your minds the principles of piety towards God, and a reverence and fear of His holy name. The fear of God is the beginning of wisdom and its consummation is everlasting felicity. Possess yourselves of just and elevated notions of the Divine character, attributes, and administration, and of the end and dignity of your own immortal nature as it stands related to Him.

Reflect deeply and often upon those relations. Remember that it is in God you live and move and have your being, - that in the language of David He is about your bed and about your path and spieth out all your ways, - that there is not a thought in your hearts, nor a word upon your tongues, but lo! He knoweth them altogether, and that he will one day call you to a strict account for all your conduct in this mortal life.

Remember, too, that you are the redeemed of the Lord, that you are bought with a price, even the inestimable price of the precious blood of the Son of God. Adore Jehovah, therefore, as your God and your Judge. Love, fear, and serve Him as your Creator, Redeemer, and Sanctifier. Acquaint yourselves with Him in His word and holy ordinances.

Make Him your friend and protector and your felicity is secured both here and hereafter. And with respect to particular duties to Him, it is your happiness that you are well assured that he best serves his Maker, who does most good to his country and to mankind.

Stiles, Ezra (November 29, 1727-May 12, 1795), was a founder of Rhode Island College (later Brown University) in 1763, the president of Yale College, and was the president of the first society for the abolition of slavery formed in Connecticut, in 1790.

On May 8, 1783, as the president of Yale College, Ezra Stiles gave a major Election Address, entitled "The United States Elevated to Glory and Honor," before the Governor and the General Assembly of Connecticut, declaring:

All forms of civil polity have been tried by mankind, except one, and that seems to have been reserved in Providence to be realized in America.

Our system of dominion and civil polity would be imperfect without the true religion; or that from the diffusion of virtue among the people of any community would arise their greatest secular happiness: which will terminate in this conclusion, that holiness ought to be the end of all civil government. "That thou mayest be a holy people unto the Lord thy God."

In our lowest and most dangerous state, in 1776 and 1777, we sustained ourselves against the British Army of sixty thousand troops, commanded by... the ablest generals Britain could procure throughout Europe, with a naval force of twenty-two thousand seamen in above eighty men-of-war.

Who but a Washington, inspired by Heaven, could have conceived the surprise move upon the enemy at Princeton - that Christmas eve when Washington and his army crossed the Delaware?

Who but the Ruler of the winds could have delayed the British reinforcements by three months of contrary ocean winds at a critical point of the war?

Or what but "a providential miracle" at the last minute detected the treacherous scheme of traitor Benedict Arnold, which would have delivered the American army, including George Washington himself, into the hands of the enemy?

On the French role in the Revolution, it is God who so ordered the balancing interests of nations as to produce an irresistible motive in the European maritime powers to take our part....

The United States are under peculiar obligations to become a holy people unto the Lord our God.

Cook, James (October 27, 1728-February 14, 1779) was a British naval captain, navigator and explorer. In 1759 and again from 1763-67, he explored the coasts and seaways of Canada. He made three voyages to the Pacific Ocean, 1768-71, 1772-75, 1776-79, sailing from the Antarctic to the Bering Strait, from the coasts of North America to New Zealand and Australia.

Captain Cook was known for not allowing profanity on board, he required his men to wear clean clothes on Sunday and on occasions he conducted divine service for his crew.

Cook's wife gave him a Prayer Book, which he seems to have read in order, as he named a number of places discovered on significant day, such as the Whitsundays, Trinity Bay, Christmas Island and Pentecost Islands.

On Trinity Sunday, June 10, 1770, as Cook was sailing up the east coast of Australia, his ship, the Endeavour, struck the Great Barrier Reef. After much work, the crew managed to free her and steered the damaged ship towards a river-mouth, where the banks were suited to laying the vessel ashore for repairs. It was August 4, 1770 before the ship was ready, but no sooner had they embarked when the Endeavour was headed for the reef again. With no wind and seas too deep to cast anchor, the ship slowly was driven by the force of the tides toward certain destruction upon the perpendicular wall under the water.

The men manned the boats and tried in vain to tow her away. Just eighty yards away, "suddenly, a little breath of air moved, blew for a few minutes, faded, the merest cat's-paw." It was enough to carry them towards a narrow opening in the reef, but there was still no wind. Another narrow opening was seen in the reef and Cook pulled the head of the ship around.

At last a light breeze sprang up, and with the tide being in their favor, they hurried the vessel through this "Providential Channel," as Cook named it.

Richard Pickersgill, the master's mate wrote that it was:

The narrowest escape we ever had and had it not been for the immediate help of Providence we must inevitably have perished.

On August 16, 1770, Captain James Cook wrote of the situation:

It pleased God at this very juncture to send us a light air of wind, which, with the help of our boats, carried us about half a cable's length from the present danger.

On July 13, 1772, Captain Cook set sail with his ship, the Resolution, on his second voyage in the Pacific Ocean. He crossed the Antarctic Circle three times and reached the farthest south any man had gone, being stopped by solid ice at latitude 71 degrees 10' south, longitude 106 degrees 34' west. After three years and eighteen days, they returned home from one of the greatest exploration voyages in history. Cook attributed their success, and the fact only four men were lost out of a crew of 180, to the "care of Providence."

On July 12, 1776, Captain Cook set sail in the Resolution, accompanied by the Discovery, on his third voyage in the Pacific, attempting to find a north-west passage by sea from the Pacific to the Atlantic Ocean. After spending 1777-78 exploring the Friendly Islands, the Society Group and the Bering Strait, he headed toward the Sandwich Islands for the winter.

On February 14, 1779, at Karakakoa Bay on Hawaii Island, some natives stole the cutter (a small fast boat) of the Discovery. Cook attempted to take hostages of the natives until the cutter was returned - a practice he had used many times before with success. However, an angry native, incensed at the shooting of one of their chieftains by a member of Cook's crew, fired a shot at Cook. This caused fighting to break out, and in a moment when Cook's back was turned, Koa, the high priest, who just days before had deified Cook as one of their gods, struck him down with a club; others stabbed him to death. Cook was fifty years old.

Historian F. B. Goodrich gives the account:

The last time Cook was seen distinctly, he was standing at the water's edge, calling out to the people in the boats to cease firing. It is supposed that he was desirous of stopping further bloodshed, and wished the example of desisting to proceed from his side. His humanity proved fatal to him; and he lost his life in attempting to save the lives of others. It was noticed that while he faced the natives, none of them offered him any violence, deterred, perhaps, by the sacred character he bore as an Orono, but the moment he turned round to give his orders to the men in the boats, he was stabbed in the back and fell, face foremost, into the water.

Captain Cook's voyages made Englishmen aware of the existence of new lands. As a young man, William Carey read Captain Cook's Voyages and was inspired to take the Gospel to India.

Burke, Edmund (January 12, 1729-July 9, 1797), was an English orator, author and leader in Great Britain during the time of the Revolutionary War. On March 22, 1775, in his Second Speech on the Conciliation with America-The Thirteen Resolutions, Edmund Burke addressed Parliament, saying:

Religion, always a principle of energy, in this new people is no way worn out or impaired; and their mode of professing it is also one main cause of this free spirit.

The people are Protestants; and of that kind which is the most adverse to all implicit submission of mind and opinion. This is a persuasion not only favorable to Liberty, but built upon it....

All Protestantism, even the most cold and passive, is a sort of dissent. But the religion most prevalent in our Northern Colonies is a refinement on the principle of resistance; it is the dissidence of dissent, and the protestantism of the Protestant religion.

Freedom and not servitude is the cure of anarchy; as religion, and not atheism, is the true remedy for superstition.

I have been told by an eminent bookseller, that in no branch of his business, after tracts of popular devotion, were so many books as those on law exported to the Plantations...I hear that they have sold nearly as many of Blackstone's Commentaries in America as in England.

In The Works and Correspondence of the Right Honorable Edmund Burke, Volume VI, Edmund Burke stated:

The Scripture is no one summary of doctrines regularly digested, in which a man could not mistake his way; it is a most remarkable, but most multifarious, collection of the records of the Divine economy; a collection of an infinite variety of theology, history, prophecy, psalmody, morality, allegory, legislation, carried through different books, by different authors, at different ages, for different ends and purposes.

In his work, Reflections on the Revolution in France, Edmund Burke wrote in 1790:

People will not look forward to posterity who never look backward to their ancestors.

In 1791, Edmund Burke stated in "A Letter to a Member of the National Assembly":

What is liberty without wisdom and without virtue? It is the greatest of all possible evils; for it is folly, vice, and madness, without restraint.

Men are qualified for civil liberty in exact proportion to their disposition to put moral chains upon their own appetites; in proportion as they are disposed to listen to the counsels of the wise and good in preference to the flattery of knaves.

Society cannot exist, unless a controlling power upon will and appetite be placed somewhere; and the less of it there is within, the more there must be without.

It is ordained in the eternal constitution of things, that men of intemperate minds cannot be free. Their passions forge their fetters.

On May 28, 1794, in the Impeachment of Warren Hastings, Edmund Burke stated:

There is but one law for all, namely, that law which governs all law, the law of our Creator, the law of humanity, justice, equity - the law of nature, and of nations.

On January 9, 1795, in a letter to William Smith, Edmund Burke made the statement:

All that is necessary for evil to triumph is for good men to do nothing.

In 1797, in his Letters on a Regicide Peace, Edmund Burke wrote:

The blood of man should never be shed but to redeem the blood of man. It is well shed for our family, for our friends, for our God, for our country, for our kind. The rest is vanity; the rest is crime.

Edmund Burke resigned himself, stating:

First, according to the ancient, good, and laudable custom, of which my heart and understanding recognize the propriety, I bequeath my soul to God, hoping for His mercy through the only merits of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

West, Samuel (March 3, 1730-September 24, 1807), was a Chaplain in the Continental Army during the Revolutionary War. He was noted for greatly assisting General George Washington by deciphering a letter of treason from Dr. Benjamin Church intended for the British Admiral at Newport, Rhode Island.

A graduate of Harvard, 1754, Samuel West was a member of the committee to frame the Constitution of Massachusetts, and a member of the Massachusetts Convention to adopt the U.S. Constitution. In July of 1776, as Dartmouth's minister, Samuel West spoke in Boston concerning the War for Independence:

Our cause is so just and good that nothing can prevent our success but only our sins. Could I see a spirit of repentance and reformation prevail throughout the land, I should not have the least apprehension or fear of being brought under the iron rod combined against us.

And though I confess that the irreligion and profaneness which are so common among us gives something of a damp to my spirits yet I cannot help hoping and even believing, that Providence has designed this continent for to be the asylum of liberty and true religion.

Stockton, Richard (October 1, 1730-February 28, 1781), was a signer of the Declaration of Independence. He was a member of the Continental Congress, 1776; an associate justice on the Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1774-76; and a member of the Executive Council of New Jersey, 1768-76.

His son Richard was a U.S. Senator, 1796-99; and a U.S. Representative, 1813-15. Another son, Robert, served with prominence as a U.S. Naval officer in the War of 1812; helped freed slaves found the country of Liberia, West Africa in 1821; and conquered California, proclaiming it a U.S. Territory, on August 17, 1846. Robert also served as a U.S. Senator, 1851-53; and was honored when Stockton, California, was named after him.

In his Last Will and Testament, Richard Stockton wrote:

As my children will have frequent occasion of perusing this instrument, and may probably be peculiarly impressed with the last words of their father, I think proper here, not only to subscribe to the entire belief of the great leading doctrine of the Christian religion...but also in the heart of a father's affection, to charge and exhort them to remember "that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom."

Cowper, William (November 15, 1731-April 25, 1800), was an English poet who pioneered the English Romantic movement. His works include: Table Talk; Truth; Expostulations; On Receipt of My Mother's Picture; and The Castaway. His most renowned work, published in 1785, was The Task, which included his best-known poem, "The Diverting History of John Gilpin." He also completed a translation of Homer. In 1779, William Cowper published The Olney Hymns, which include: "Oh! for a Closer Walk with God," "There is a Fountain Filled with Blood," and "God Moves in a Mysterious Way."

In his work, The Task, 1785, William Cowper composed the poem, "Winter Walk at Noon":

Nature is but a name for an effect,
Whose cause is God.

Georgia, Colony of (1732), named in honor of King George II, was founded by James Edward Oglethorpe (1696-1785), who was granted the colonial charter and served as its governor till he returned to England, 1743. The colony was conceived as a refuge for poor debtors from England and persecuted Protestants from Europe. One hundred settlers moved into the area, quickly followed by the Moravians, who were enthusiastic Christian missionaries, and other Christian groups. As the settlers touched the shore, they knelt and declared:

Our end in leaving our native country is not to gain riches and honor, but singly this: to live wholly to the glory of God.

Their object was:

To make Georgia a religious colony.

John Wesley (1703-1791) and Charles Wesley (1707-1788), who led the Methodist movement, served in Georgia as ministers and missionaries to the Indians, along with George Whitefield (1714-1770), who built an orphanage there.

Marion, Francis (c. 1732-February 26, 1795), was a Major-General in the Revolutionary War. His daring tactics and exploits earned him the nickname "Old Swamp Fox" by the British General Banastre Tarleton, who spent much time and energy vainly pursuing, but never apprehending him.

"Marion's Brigade" was a volunteer force that could assemble at a moment's notice, and seemed, to the British, to be able to attack everywhere at once. Taking part in several important battles, and capturing many prisoners, General Francis Marion made communication impossible for the British troops in the Carolinas.

Marion's grandfather, a French Protestant Huguenot who fled to America in 1690 for religious freedom, settled on a farm in South Carolina. In 1775, Francis Marion was elected a member of the South Carolina Provincial Congress and, after the War, served in the State Senate of South Carolina for several terms. He stated:

Who can doubt that God created us to be happy, and thereto made us to love one another? It is plainly written as the Gospel. The heart is sometimes so embittered that nothing but Divine Love can sweeten it, so enraged that devotion can only becalm it, and so broken down that it takes all the forces of heavenly hope to raise it. In short, the religion of Jesus Christ is the only sure and controlling power over sin.

Blair, John (1732-August 31, 1800), was a signer of the Constitution of the United States, being only 33 years old at the time. He was elected to Virginia's Supreme Court of Appeals and was appointed a U.S. Supreme Court Justice, 1798, by President George Washington. John Blair was active in the Episcopal church in Williamsburg, Virginia.

In a letter to his sister, at the time of her husband's death, John Blair expressed:

With much grief of my own and real sympathy for yours, I sit down to write you a Letter of Condolence on as great a Loss as could have befallen you...but an event no way contingent but absolutely certain itself it being appointed for all men once to die....

Let us seek for comfort where alone it may be found, let us learn a dutiful acquiescence in whatsoever proceeds from that Great Being from whom we ourselves proceeded and who being the sole Author of all our enjoyments has an undoubted Right to withdraw them in his own good time and whose Goodness so conspicuous in his General Providence may be as eminent for aught we know though not so plainly discerned even when He deals to us the bitter cup of Affliction.

We may all profit in the School of Adversity if we will but make a proper use of its Sacred Lessons. If in this life only we had hope it would indeed be harder to acquire a due serenity of mind upon the loss of a beloved Friend.

If he were absolutely extinct, to forget him would be perhaps necessary to our Peace of Mind. But now as our Holy Religion teaches we may contemplate him translated to a better Life and ineffably enjoying all that variety of Bliss which Eye hath not seen nor Ear heard nor the Heart conceived.

May the Celestial vision forever preserve you from the Gloominess of Grief and reconcile you to all the Dispensations of Him who cannot err. My situation both with Respect to my Family and Fortune (all being in the Power of the Enemy and much in their possession) is bad enough. But I trust for a happy issue and for power to bear all His appointments as I ought.

Lee, Richard Henry (January 20, 1732-June 19, 1794), was a signer of the Declaration of Independence. He was a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses, a delegate to the First Continental Congress and a U.S. Senator. On November 1, 1777, as recorded in the Journals of Congress, Richard Henry Lee, along with the committee of Samuel Adams and General Daniel Roberdeau, recommended a resolution setting apart:

Thursday, the 18th of December next, for solemn thanksgiving and praise, that with one heart and one voice the good people may express the grateful feelings of their hearts, and consecrate themselves to the service of their Divine Benefactor; and that, together with their sincere acknowledgments and offerings, they may join the penitent confession of their manifold sins, whereby they had forfeited every favor, and their humble and earnest supplication that it may please God, through the merits of Jesus Christ, mercifully to forgive and blot them out of remembrance.

Washington, George (February 22, 1732-December 14, 1799), was the first President of the United States, 1789-97; Chancellor of the College of William and Mary, 1788-99; President of the Constitutional Convention, where the United States Constitution was formulated, May 14, 1787-September 17, 1787; Commander in Chief of the Continental Army during the Revolutionary War, 1775-83; delegate to First and Second Continental Congress, 1774-75; Justice of Fairfax County, 1768; member of the Virginia House of Burgesses, 1758-74; in 1759 married Martha Dandridge Custis (1731-1802), the widowed daughter of Col. John Dandridge; Colonel in the Virginia Militia, 1752-58; aide-de-camp to General Edward Braddock, 1755; Official Surveyor of Culpepper County, 1748-49; and received his surveyor's license from William and Mary College, 1749.

In addition to being politically involved, George Washington was also an active Episcopalian. Considered the most popular man in the Colonies, George Washington was described by Henry "Light Horse Harry" Lee in his now famous tribute, "First in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen."

The son of Augustine Washington and his second wife, Mary Ball, George Washington was also a descendant of King John of England, and nine of the twenty-five Baron Sureties of the Magna Carta. His great-great grandfather, Rev. Lawrence Washington, was a clergyman in the Church of England. His great-grandfather, John Washington, moved to America in 1657, and helped found a parish in Virginia. In his Last Will and Testament, John Washington left a gift to the church of a tablet with the Ten Commandments, on which he inscribed his testimony:

Being heartily sorry from the bottom of my hart for my sins past, most humbly desiring forgiveness of the same from the Almighty God (my Saviour) and Redeemer, in whom and by the merits of Jesus Christ, I trust and believe assuredly to be saved, and to have full remission and forgiveness of all my sins.

George Washington's father, Augustine Washington, who was an active vestryman in Truro Parish, Virginia, recorded the baptism of George in his own handwriting in the old family Bible, April of 1732:

George William, son to Augustine Washington and Mary, his wife, was born the eleventh day of February, 1731-32, about ten in the morning, and was baptized the 3rd April following, Mr. Bromley Whiting, and Captain Christopher Brooks godfathers, and Mrs. Mildred Gregory godmother.

George's father, who was a man of large stature, died on April 12, 1743, at the age of forty-nine, when George was only eleven years old. His last words were:

I thank God that in all my life I never struck a man in anger; for had I done so I am sure (so great is my strength) that I would have killed my antagonist. Then his blood, at this awesome moment, would lie heavily on my soul. As it is, I die at peace with all mankind.

From then, until the age of sixteen, George lived with his elder half-brother, Augustine, in Westmoreland County, just 40 miles outside of Fredericksburg, Virginia. Most of George's education was through home schooling and tutoring. In 1749, he received his surveyor's license from the College of William and Mary, and later served as the college's Chancellor from 1788 till his death.

In 1745, at thirteen years of age, George Washington copied some verses on "Christmas Day":

Assist me, Muse divine, to sing the Morn,
On Which the Saviour of Mankind was born.

George Washington also copied 110 Rules of Civility and Decent Behavior in Company and Conversation, which included:

108) When you speak of God, or His Attributes, let it be Seriously & Reverence, Honor & Obey your Natural Parents altho they be poor.

109) Let your Recreations be Manful not Sinful.

110) Labour to keep alive in your Breast that little Spark of Celestial fire called Conscience.

In 1747, at the age of fifteen years old, George Washington fulfilled the role of being a godfather to a child in baptism. The next year, 1748, he served as the godfather in baptism to his niece, Frances Lewis. In 1751, George again was the godfather to his nephew, Fielding Lewis, and in 1760, he sponsored his nephew, Charles Lewis.

In 1751, George Washington accompanied his older brother, Lawrence Washington, who, on the advice of physicians, spent the winter in the West Indies in a desperate attempt to regain his health. The illness nevertheless grew worse, and before he died, Lawrence left his estate at Mount Vernon to George. In his journal of the trip, George entered:

Sunday, November 11th - Dressed in order for Church but got to town too late. Dined at Major Clarke's with ye SeG. Went to Evening Service and return'd to our lodgings.

A 24 page prayer book, entitled "Daily Sacrifice," is credited to have been handwritten by George Washington in 1752.

SUNDAY MORNING. . . Almighty God, and most merciful Father, who didst command the children of Israel to offer a daily sacrifice to Thee, that thereby they might glorify and praise Thee for Thy protection both night and day, receive O Lord, my morning sacrifice which I now offer up to Thee;

I yield Thee humble and hearty thanks, that Thou hast preserved me from the dangers of the night past and brought me to the light of this day, and the comfort thereof, a day which is consecrated to Thine own service and for Thine own honour.

Let my heart therefore Gracious God be so affected with the glory and majesty of it, that I may not do mine own works but wait on Thee, and discharge those weighty duties Thou required of me:

American Quotations.txt

and since Thou art a God of pure eyes, and will be sanctified in all who draw nearer to Thee, who dost not regard the sacrifice of fools, nor hear sinners who tread in Thy courts, pardon I beseech Thee, my sins, remove them from Thy presence, as far as the east is from the west, and accept of me for the merits of Thy son Jesus Christ, that when I come into Thy temple and compass Thine altar, my prayer may come before Thee as incense, and as I desire Thou wouldst hear me calling upon Thee in my prayers, so give me peace to hear Thee calling on me in Thy Word, that it may be wisdom, righteousness, reconciliation and peace to the saving of my soul in the day of the Lord Jesus.

Grant that I may hear it with reverence, receive it with meekness, mingle it with faith, and that it may accomplish in me gracious God, the good work for which Thou hast sent it.

Bless my family, kindred, friends and country, be our God and guide this day and forever for His sake, who lay down in the grave and arose again for us, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

SUNDAY EVENING.... O most Glorious God, in Jesus Christ my merciful and loving Father, I acknowledge and confess my guilt, in the weak and imperfect performance of the duties of this day. I have called on Thee for pardon and forgiveness of sins, but so coldly and carelessly, that my prayers are become my sin and stand in need of pardon. I have heard Thy holy Word, but with such deadness of spirit that I have been an unprofitable and forgetful hearer, so that, O Lord, tho' I have done Thy work, yet it hat been so negligently that I may rather expect a curse than a blessing from Thee. But, O God, who art rich in mercy and plenteous in redemption, mark not, I beseech thee, what I have done amiss; remember that I am but dust, and remit my transgressions, negligences & ignorances, and cover them all with the absolute obedience of Thy dear Son, that those sacrifices which I have offered may be accepted by Thee, in and for the sacrifice of Jesus Christ offered upon the cross for me; for His sake, ease me of the burden of my sins, and give me grace that by the call of the Gospel I may rise from the slumber of sin into the newness of life. Let me live according to those holy rules which Thou hast this day prescribed in Thy holy Word; make me to know what is acceptable in Thy sight, and therein to delight, open the eyes of my understanding, and help me thoroughly to examine myself concerning my knowledge, faith and repentance, increase my faith, and direct me to the true object, Jesus Christ the Way, the Truth and the Life, bless, O Lord, all the people of this land, from the highest to the lowest, particularly those whom Thou hast appointed to rule us in church & state.

Continue Thy goodness to me this night. These weak petitions, I humbly implore Thee to hear, accept and answer for the sake of Thy Dear Son, Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

MONDAY MORNING.... O eternal and everlasting God, I presume to present myself this morning before Thy Divine Majesty, beseeching Thee to accept of my humble and hearty thanks, that it hath pleased Thy great goodness to keep and preserve me the night past from all the dangers poor mortals are subject to, and has given me sweet and pleasant sleep, whereby I find my body refreshed and comforted for performing the duties of this day, in which I beseech Thee to defend me from all perils of body and soul.

Direct my thoughts, words and work, wash away my sins in the immaculate Blood of the Lamb, and purge my heart by Thy Holy Spirit, from the dross of my natural corruption, that I may with more freedom of mind and liberty of will serve thee, the ever lasting God, in righteousness and holiness this day, and all the days of my life. Increase my faith in the sweet promises of the Gospel; give me repentance from dead works; pardon my wanderings, & direct my thoughts unto Thyself, the God of my salvation; teach me how to live in Thy fear, labor in Thy service, and ever to run in the ways of Thy commandments; make me always watchful over my heart, that neither the terrors of conscience, the loathing of holy duties, the love of sin, nor the unwillingness to depart this life, may cast me into a spiritual slumber, but daily frame me more and more into the likeness of Thy Son, Jesus Christ, that living in Thy fear, and dying in Thy favor, I may in Thy appointed time attain the resurrection of the just unto eternal life.

Bless my family, friends and kindred, and unite us all in praising and glorifying Thee in all our works begun, continued, and ended, when we shall come to make our last account before Thee, Blessed Saviour, who hath taught us thus to pray, Our Father, &c.

MONDAY EVENING. . . Most Gracious Lord God, from whom proceedeth every good and perfect gift, I offer to Thy Divine Majesty my unfeigned praise and thanksgiving for all Thy mercies towards me. Thou mad'st me at first and hast ever since sustained the work of Thy own hand; Thou gav'st Thy Son to die for me; and hast given me assurance of salvation, upon my repentance and sincerely endeavoring to conform my life to His holy precepts and example.

Thou art pleased to lengthen out to me the time of repentance and to move me to it by Thy Spirit and by Thy Word, by Thy mercies, and my own unworthiness, I do appear before Thee at this time; I have sinned and done very wickedly, be merciful to me, O God, and pardon me for Jesus Christ sake; instruct me in the particulars of my duty, and suffer me not to be tempted above what Thou givest me strength to bear. Take care, I pray Thee of my affairs and more and more direct me in Thy truth, defend me from my enemies, especially my spiritual ones.

Suffer me not to be drawn from Thee, by the blandishments of the world, carnal desires, the cunning of the devil, or deceitfulness of sin. Work in me Thy good will and pleasure, and discharge my mind from all things that are displeasing to Thee, of all ill will and discontent, wrath and bitterness, pride & vain conceit of myself, and render me charitable, pure, holy, patient and heavenly minded. Be with me at the hour of death; dispose me for it, and deliver me from the slavish fear of it, and make me willing and fit to die whenever Thou shalt call me hence.

Bless our rulers in church and state. Bless O Lord the whole race of mankind, and let the world be filled with the knowledge of Thee and Thy Son Jesus Christ. Pity the sick, the poor, the weak, the needy, the widows and fatherless, and all that mourn or are broken in heart, and be merciful to them according to their several necessities. Bless my friends and grant me grace to forgive my enemies as heartily as I desire forgiveness of Thee my heavenly Father. I beseech Thee to defend me this night from all evil, and do more for me than I can think or ask, for Jesus Christ sake, in whose most holy Name & Words, I continue to pray, Our Father, &c.

TUESDAY MORNING. . . O Lord our God, most mighty and merciful Father, I, thine unworthy creature and servant, do once more approach Thy presence. Though not worthy to appear before Thee, because of my natural corruptions, and the many sins and transgressions which I have committed against Thy Divine Majesty; yet I beseech Thee, for the sake of Him in whom Thou art well pleased, the Lord Jesus Christ, to admit me to render Thee deserved thanks and praises for Thy manifold mercies extended toward me, for the quiet rest & repose of the past night, for food, raiment, health, peace, liberty, and the hopes of a better life through the merits of Thy dear son's bitter passion. And O kind Father continue Thy mercy and favor to me this day, and ever hereafter; prosper all my lawful undertakings; let me have all my directions from Thy Holy Spirit, and success from Thy bountiful hand. Let the bright beams of Thy light so shine into my heart, and enlighten my mind in understanding Thy blessed Word, that I may be enabled to perform Thy will in all things, and effectually resist all temptations of the world, the flesh and the devil. Preserve and defend our rulers in church & state.

Bless the people of this land, be a Father to the fatherless, a Comforter to the comfortless, a Deliverer to the captives, and a Physician to the sick. Let Thy blessing be upon our friends, kindred and families. Be our Guide this day and forever through Jesus Christ in whose blessed form of prayer I conclude my weak petitions - Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy Name &c.

TUESDAY EVENING. . . Most gracious God and heavenly Father, we cannot cease, but must cry unto Thee for mercy, because my sins cry against me for justice. How shall I address myself unto Thee, I must with the publican stand and admire at Thy great goodness, tender mercy, and long suffering towards me, in that Thou hast kept me the past day from being consumed and brought to nought. O Lord, what is man, or the son of man, that Thou regardest him; the more days pass over my head, the more sins and iniquities I heap up against Thee. If I should cast up the account of my good deeds done this day, how few and small would they be; but if I should reckon my misdeeds, surely they would be many and great. O, blessed Father, let Thy son's blood wash me from all impurities, and cleanse me from the stains of sin that are upon me. Give me grace to lay hold upon His merits; that they may be my reconciliations and atonement unto Thee, - That I may know my sins are forgiven by His death and passion. Embrace me in the arms of Thy mercy; vouchsafe to receive me unto the bosom of Thy love, shadow me with Thy wings, that I may safely rest under Thy protection this night; and so into Thy hands I commend myself, both soul and body, in the Name of Thy son, Jesus Christ, beseeching Thee, when this life shall end, I may take my everlasting rest with Thee in Thy heavenly kingdom. Bless all in authority over us, be merciful to all those afflicted with Thy cross or calamity, bless all my friends, forgive my enemies and accept my thanksgiving this evening for all the mercies and favors afforded me; hear and graciously answer these my requests, and whatever else Thou see'st needful grant us, for the sake of Jesus Christ in whose blessed Name and Words I continue to pray, Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy Name &c.

WEDNESDAY MORNING. . . Almighty and eternal Lord God, the great Creator of heaven and earth, and the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; look down from heaven, in pity and compassion upon me Thy servant, who humbly prostrate myself before Thee, sensible of Thy mercy and my own misery; there is an infinite distance between Thy glorious majesty and me, Thy poor creature, the work of Thy hand, between Thy infinite power, and my weakness, Thy wisdom, and my folly, Thy eternal Being, and my mortal frame, but, O Lord, I have set myself at a greater distance from Thee by my sin and wickedness, and humbly acknowledge the corruption of my nature and the many rebellions of my life.

I have sinned against heaven and before Thee, in thought, word & deed; I have contemned Thy majesty and holy laws. I have likewise sinned by omitting what I ought not. I have rebelled against light, despised Thy mercies and judgements, and broken my vows and promises; I have neglected the means of Grace, and opportunities of becoming better; my iniquities are multiplied, and my sins are very great. I confess them, O Lord, with shame and sorrow, destitution and loathing, and desire to be vile in Thine.

I humbly beseech Thee to be merciful to me in the free pardon of my sins, for the sake of Thy dear Son, my only Saviour, Jesus Christ, who came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance; be pleased to renew my nature and write Thy laws upon my heart, and help me to live, righteously, soberly and godly in this evil world; make me humble, meek, patient and contented, and work in me the grace of Thy Holy Spirit.

Prepare me for death and judgement, and let the thoughts thereof awaken me to a greater care and study to approve myself unto Thee in well doing.

Bless our rulers in church & state. Help all in affliction or adversity - give them patience and a sanctified use of their affliction, and in Thy good time, deliverance from them; forgive my enemies, take me unto Thy protection this day, keep me in perfect peace, which I ask in the Name and for the sake of Jesus. Amen.

WEDNESDAY EVENING... Holy and eternal Lord God who art the King of heaven, and the watchman of Israel, that never slumberest or sleepest, what shall we render unto Thee for all Thy benefits; because Thou hast inclined Thine ears unto me, therefore will I call on Thee as long as I live, from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same let Thy Name be praised.

Among the infinite riches of Thy mercy towards me, I desire to render thanks & praise for Thy merciful preservation of me this day, as well as all the days of my life; and for the many other blessings & mercies spiritual & temporal which Thou hast bestowed on me, contrary to my deserving.

All these Thy mercies call on me to be thankful and my infirmities & wants call for a continuance of Thy tender mercies; cleanse my soul, O Lord, I beseech Thee, from whatever is offensive to Thee, and hurtful to me, and give me what is convenient for me.

Watch over me this night, and give me comfortable and sweet sleep to fit me for the service of the day following. Let my soul watch for the coming of the Lord Jesus; let my bed put me in mind of my grave, and my rising from there of my last resurrection; O heavenly Father, so frame this heart of mine, that I may ever delight to live according to Thy will and command, in holiness and righteousness before Thee all the days of my life.

Let me remember, O Lord, the time will come when the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall arise and stand before the judgement seat, and give an account of whatever they have done in the body, and let me so prepare my soul, that I may do it with joy and not with grief.

Bless the rulers and people of this and forget not those who are under any affliction or oppression. Let Thy favor be extended to all my relations, friends, and all others who I ought to remember in my prayer; and hear me, I beseech Thee, for the sake of my dear redeemer in whose most holy Words, I farther pray, Our Father, &c.

THURSDAY MORNING... Most gracious Lord God, whose dwelling is in the highest heavens, and yet beholdest the lowly and humble upon the earth, I blush and am ashamed to lift up my eyes to Thy dwelling place, because I have sinned against Thee; look down, I beseech Thee upon me Thy unworthy servant who prostrate myself at the footstool of Thy mercy, confessing my own guiltiness, and begging pardon for my sins; what couldst Thou have done Lord more for me, or what could I have done more against Thee? Thou didst send my Thy Son to take our nature...

In November of 1753, at the age of 21, George Washington was commissioned by Governor Dinwiddie of Virginia to bear the official dispatches to the French commander St. Pierre. As he was leaving home to begin what would become a life long service for his country, he recorded the parting words of his mother, Mrs. Mary Washington:

Remember that God only is our sure trust. To Him, I commend you... My son, neglect not the duty of secret prayer.

In 1754, Colonel George Washington built Fort Necessity on Great Meadows, after a successful attack on the French in May. While encamped at Great Meadows, he received a letter from his brother Lawrence's father-in-law, Mr. Fairfax:

I will not doubt your having public prayers in the camp, especially when the Indian families are your guests, that they, seeing your plain manner of worship, may have their curiosity excited to be informed why we do not use the ceremonies of the French, which being well explained to their understandings, will more and more dispose them to receive our baptism, and unite in strict bonds of cordial friendship.

On June 10, 1754, Colonel George Washington wrote to Governor Dinwiddie:

We have been six days without flour, and there is none upon the road for our relief that we know of, though I have by repeated expresses given him timely notice. We have not provisions of any sort enough in camp to serve us two days. Once before we should have been four days without provisions, if Providence had not sent a trader from Ohio to our relief, for whose flour I was obliged to give twenty-one shillings and eight-pence per pound.

In April of 1755, General Braddock arrived and promoted Washington to a higher command. His mother, Mary Washington, was concerned about his safety during the French and Indian War, but George reassured her, reminding her of her earlier prayers for him and the care that God has given him in the past:

The God to whom you commended me, madam, when I set out upon a more perilous errand, defended me from all harm, and I trust He will do so now. Do not you?

The account of George Washington at the Battle at the Monongahela was included in student textbooks in America until 1934. During the French and Indian War, George Washington fought alongside British General Edward Braddock. On July 9, 1755, the British were on the way to Fort Duquesne, when the French surprised them in an ambush attack.

The British, who were not accustomed to fighting unless in an open field, were being annihilated. Washington rode back and forth across the battle delivering General Braddock's orders. As the battle raged, every other officer on horseback, except Washington, was shot down. General Braddock was mortally wounded, at which point the troops fled in confusion. On Sunday night, July 13, 1754, General Braddock died and Washington, under cover of night, read the funeral service over him by the light of a torch.

After the battle, on July 18, 1755, Washington wrote from Fort Cumberland to his brother, John A. Washington:

As I have heard, since my arrival at this place, a circumstantial account of my death and dying speech, I take this early opportunity of contradicting the first, and of assuring you, that I have not as yet composed the latter. But by the All-Powerful Dispensations of Providence, I have been protected beyond all human probability or expectation; for I had four bullets through my coat, and two horses shot under me, yet escaped unhurt, although death was leveling my companions on every side of me!

Fifteen years later, Washington and Dr. Craik, a close friend of his from his youth, were traveling through those same woods near the Ohio river and Great Kanawha river. They were met by an old Indian chief, who addressed Washington through an interpreter:

I am a chief and ruler over my tribes. My influence extends to the waters of the great lakes and to the far blue mountains.

I have traveled a long and weary path that I might see the young warrior of the great battle. It was on the day when the white man's blood mixed with the streams of our forests that I first beheld this Chief.

I called to my young men and said, mark yon tall and daring warrior? He is not of the red-coat tribe - he hath an Indian's wisdom, and his warriors fight as we do - himself alone exposed.

Quick, let your aim be certain, and he dies. Our rifles were leveled, rifles which, but for you, knew not how to miss - 'twas all in vain, a power mightier far than we, shielded you.

Seeing you were under the special guardianship of the Great Spirit, we immediately ceased to fire at you. I am old and soon shall be gathered to the great council fire of my fathers in the land of shades, but ere I go, there is something bids me speak in the voice of prophecy:

Listen! The Great Spirit protects that man [indicating Washington], and guides his destinies - he will become the chief of nations, and a people yet unborn will hail him as the founder of a mighty empire. I am come to pay homage to the man who is the particular favorite of Heaven, and who can never die in battle.

An Indian warrior who was in that battle declared:

Washington was never born to be killed by a bullet! I had seventeen fair fires at him with my rifle, and after all could not bring him to the ground!

On July 8, 1755, Mary Draper Ingels had been kidnapped from her home in Draper Meadows, Virginia by a band of Shawnee Indians. In her biography she recorded her escape in mid-winter and her nearly one thousand mile trek back home. At one point during her captivity, she overheard a meeting that the Shawnee had with some Frenchmen. They described in detail the British defeat in the battle of Monongahela at Duquesne, and how the Indian Chief Red Hawk claimed to have shot Washington eleven times, but did not succeed in killing him.

On February 2, 1756, in a letter to Governor Dinwiddie, Colonel Washington wrote from Alexandria, Virginia:

I have always, so far as was in my power, endeavored to discourage gambling in camp, and always shall while I have the honor to preside there.

On April 18, 1756, in a letter to Governor Dinwiddie, Colonel George Washington wrote from Winchester, Virginia:

It gave me infinite concern to find in yours by Governor Innes that any representations should inflame the Assembly against the Virginia regiment, or give cause to suspect the morality and good behaviour of the officers. . . .

I have, both by threats and persuasive means, endeavored to discountenance gambling, drinking, swearing, and irregularities of every kind; while I have, on the other hand, practised every artifice to inspire a laudable emulation in the officers for the service of their country, and to encourage the soldiers in the unerring exercise of their duty.

In June of 1756, Colonel George Washington issued the following order while at Fort Cumberland:

Colonel Washington has observed that the men of regiment are very profane and reprobate. He takes this opportunity to inform them of his great displeasure at such practices, and assures them, that, if they do not leave them off, they shall be severely punished. The officers are desired, if they hear any man swear, or make use of an oath or execration, to order the offender twenty-five lashes immediately, without a court-martial. For the second offense, he will be more severely punished.

In 1756, Colonel George Washington issued the order:

Any soldier found drunk shall receive one hundred lashes without benefit of court-martial.

About a year after General Braddock's defeat, Colonel Washington wrote to Governor Dinwiddie from Winchester, Virginia:

With this small company of irregulars, with whom order, regularity, circumspection, and vigilance were matters of derision and contempt, we set out, and by the protection of Providence, reached Augusta Court House in seven days without meeting the enemy; otherwise we must have fallen a sacrifice through the indiscretion of these whooping, hallooing, gentlemen soldiers.

On September 23, 1756, Colonel Washington wrote to Governor Dinwiddie from Mount Vernon:

The want of a chaplain, I humbly conceive, reflects dishonor on the regiment, as all other officers are allowed. The gentlemen of the corps are sensible of this, and propose to support one at their private expense. But I think it would have a more graceful appearance were he appointed as others are.

On November 9, 1756, Colonel Washington wrote to Governor Dinwiddie:

As to a chaplain, if the government will grant a subsistence, we can readily get a person of merit to accept the place, without giving the commissary any trouble on the point.

On November 24, 1756, Colonel Washington wrote to Governor Dinwiddie:

When I spoke of a chaplain, it was in answer to yours. I had no person in view, though many have offered; and I only said if the country would provide subsistence, we could procure a chaplain, without thinking there was offense in expression.

On April 17, 1758, after Governor Dinwiddie was recalled, Colonel Washington wrote from Fort Loudoun to the President of the Council:

The last Assembly, in their Supply Bill, provided for a chaplain to our regiment. On this subject I had often without any success applied to Governor Dinwiddie. I now flatter myself, that your honor will be pleased to appoint a sober, serious man for this duty. Common decency, Sir, in a camp calls for the services of a divine, which ought not to be dispensed with, although the world should be so uncharitable as to think us void of religion, and incapable of good instructions.

On July 20, 1758, in a letter to his fiancée, Martha Dandridge Custis, Colonel George Washington wrote from Fort Cumberland:

We have begun our march for the Ohio. A courier is starting for Williamsburg, and I embrace the opportunity to send a few lines to one whose life is now inseparable from mine. Since that happy hour when we made our pledges to each other, my thoughts have been continually going to you as to another Self. That an All-Powerful Providence may keep us both in safety is the prayer of your ever faithful and ever affectionate Friend.

On January 6, 1759, George Washington was married to Martha Dandridge Custis by Rev. David Mossom, rector of Saint Peter's Episcopal Church, New Kent County, Virginia. After having settled at Mount Vernon, George Washington became one of the twelve vestrymen in the Truro Parish, which included the Pohick Church, the Falls Church, and the Alexandria Church. The old vestry book of Pohick Church contained the entry:

At a Vestry held for Truro Parish, October 25, 1762, ordered, that George Washington, Esq. be chosen and appointed one of the Vestry-men of this Parish, in the room of William Peake, Gent. deceased.

On February 15, 1763, the Fairfax County Court recorded:

George Washington, Esq. took the oath according to Law, repeated and subscribed the Test and subscribed to the Doctrine and Discipline of the Church of England in order to qualify him to act as a Vestryman of Truro Parish.

In his diary, George Washington recorded his attendance at numerous Church and Vestry meetings:

On June 19, 1773, George Washington returned from Williamsburg to find his 16-year-old stepdaughter, Martha "Miss Patsey" Custis, dying. She was the daughter of Mrs. Martha Dandridge Custis Washington by her first marriage to Daniel Parke Custis, who had died when the girl was young. George Washington, being the only father Martha "Miss Patsey" Custis knew, knelt by her bed and prayed, only to have her die shortly thereafter. He wrote:

The sweet, innocent girl entered into a more happy and peaceful abode than she had met in the afflicted path she had hitherto trod.

On June 1, 1774, Wednesday, the same day the British blockade of the Boston Harbor was to begin, the Colonies called for a Day of Fasting and Prayer "... to seek divine direction and aid." George Washington's diary entry that day was:

Went to church and fasted all day.

In 1774, as the situation with England became more unbearable, George Washington's wife, Martha Dandridge Custis Washington (1731-1802), wrote to a kinswoman:

Yes, I foresee consequences - dark days, domestic happiness suspended, social enjoyments abandoned, and eternal separation on earth possible, but my mind is made up, my heart is in the cause. George is right; he is always right. God has promised to protect the righteous, and I will trust Him.

When informed that the British fired at the men of Lexington on April 19, 1775, George Washington replied:

I grieve for the death of my countrymen; but rejoice that the British are still determined to keep God on our side.

In June of 1775, the situation in Boston grew more serious, as encounters between British troops and Colonial militia became more frequent. Following an exchange fought on one of the islands in Boston Harbor, Amos Farnsworth, a farmer turned militiaman, entered in his diary:

About fifteen of us squatted down in a ditch in the marsh and stood our ground. And there came a company of regulars on the other side of the river...and we had hot fire, until the regulars retreated.

But notwithstanding the bullets flew very thick, there was not a man of us killed. Surely God has a favor toward us...Thanks be unto God that so little hurt was done us, when the balls sang like bees round our heads.

On June 17, 1775, three thousand British troops, under General William Howe's command, charged from Bunker Hill to attack the colonial soldiers on Breed's Hill, led by Colonel William Prescott. Amos Farnsworth, a corporal in the Massachusetts Militia, made this entry in his diary immediately after the Battle of Bunker Hill:

We within the entrenchment...having fired away all ammunition and having no reinforcements...were overpowered by numbers and obliged to leave...I did not leave the entrenchment until the enemy got in. I then retreated ten or fifteen rods.

Then I received a wound in my right arm, the ball going through a little below my elbow, breaking the little shellbone. Another ball struck my back, taking a piece of skin about as big as a penny.

But I got to Cambridge that night...Oh the goodness of God in preserving my life, although they fell on my right and on my left! O may this act of deliverance of thine, O God, lead me never to distrust thee; but may I ever trust in thee and put confidence in no arm of flesh!

On June 18, 1775, General George Washington sent a letter from Philadelphia to his wife, Martha, to tell her of his appointment as Commander in Chief of the Continental Army:

My Dearest:...It has been determined in Congress, that the whole army raised for the defence of the American cause shall be put under my care, and that it is necessary for me to proceed immediately to Boston to take up command of it.

You may believe me, my dear Patsy, when I assure you, in the most solemn manner that, so far from seeking this appointment, I have used every endeavor in my power to avoid it....

But as it has been a kind of Destiny, that has thrown me upon this service, I shall hope that my undertaking it is designed to answer some good purpose....

I shall rely, therefore, confidently on that Providence which has heretofore preserved and been bountiful to me, not doubting but that I shall return safely to you in the fall.

On June 23, 1775, following the Battle of Bunker Hill, General George Washington wrote to his wife as he was leaving Philadelphia to take command of the army:

My Dearest: As I am within a few minutes of leaving this city, I could not think of departing from it without dropping you a line, especially as I do not know whether it may be in my power to write you again till I get to the camp at Boston.

I go fully trusting in Providence, which has been more bountiful to me than I deserve and in full confidence of a happy meeting with you sometime in the Fall.

I have no time to add more as I am surrounded with company to take leave of me. I retain an unalterable affection for you which neither time or distance can change.

My best love to Jack and Nelly and regards for the rest of the family; Conclude me with the utmost truth and sincerity, Your entire...

On July 4, 1775, in his General Orders as Commander in Chief of the Continental Army, General George Washington gave the order from his Headquarters at Cambridge:

It is required and expected that exact discipline be observed, and due Subordination prevail thro' the whole Army, as a Failure in these most essential points must necessarily produce Hazard, Disorder and Confusion; and end in shameful disappointment and disgrace.

The General most earnestly requires, and expects due observance of those articles of war, established by the Government of the army, which forbid profane cursing, swearing and drunkenness;

And in like manner requires and expects, of all Officers, and Soldiers, not engaged on actual duty, a punctual attendance of Divine Services, to implore the blessings of Heaven upon the means used for our safety and defense.

William Emerson noticed an immediate compliance with Washington's new orders regulating profanity, swearing and drunkenness in the army on July 4, 1775:

There is great overturning in the camp, as to order and regularity. New lords, new laws. The Generals Washington and [his adjutant, Charles] Lee are upon the lines every day. New orders from His Excellency are read to the respective regiments every morning after prayers.

On July 13, 1775, Governor Jonathan Trumbull wrote from Lebanon, Connecticut, to General George Washington, who had recently been placed in command of the Continental Army:

The Honorable Congress have proclaimed a Fast to be observed by the inhabitants of all the English Colonies on this continent, to stand before the Lord in one day, with public humiliation, fasting, and prayer, to deplore our many sins, to offer up our joint supplications to God, for forgiveness, and for his merciful interposition for us in this day of unnatural darkness and distress.

They have, with one united voice, appointed you to the high station you possess. The Supreme Director of all events hath caused a wonderful union of hearts and counsels to subsist among us. Now therefore, be strong and very courageous.

May the God of the armies of Israel shower down the blessings of his Divine Providence on you, give you wisdom and fortitude, cover your head in the day of battle and danger, add success, convince our enemies of their mistaken measures, and that all their attempts to deprive these Colonies of their inestimable constitutional rights and liberties are injurious and vain.

On July 20, 1775, General Washington issued the order:

The General orders this day to be religiously observed by the Forces under his Command, exactly in manner directed by the Continental Congress. It is therefore strictly enjoined on all Officers and Soldiers to attend Divine Service; And it is expected that all those who go to worship do take their Arms, Ammunition and Accoutrements, and are prepared for immediate action, if called upon.

The Navy cruisers commissioned by General Washington during the Revolutionary War flew as their ensign a white flag with a green pine tree, and above it the inscription:

An Appeal to Heaven.

On September 6, 1775, in writing to the inhabitants of the island of Bermuda from his camp at Cambridge, 3 miles from Boston, General Washington expressed:

The Wise Disposer of Events has hitherto smiled upon our virtuous Efforts....

Be assured, that in this case, the whole power and execution of my influence will be made with the Honble. Continental Congress, that your Island may not only be supplied with provisions, but experience every other mark of affection and friendship.

On September 8, 1775, from the camp at Cambridge, General Washington sent a circular to the major and brigadier-generals:

The success of such an enterprise depends, I well know, upon the All-Wise Disposer of events, and it is not within the reach of human wisdom to foretell the issue.

On September 14, 1775, from his headquarters at Cambridge, Massachusetts, General Washington sent the order to Colonel

Benedict Arnold prior to his campaign against Quebec:

As the contempt of the religion of a country by ridiculing any of its ceremonies, or affronting its ministers or votaries, has ever been deeply resented, you are to be particularly careful to restrain every officer and soldier from such imprudence and folly, and to punish every instance of it.

On the other hand, as far as lies in your power, you are to protect and support the free exercise of the religion of the country, and the undisturbed enjoyment of the rights of conscience in religious matters, with your utmost influence and authority.

On the same day, in a personal letter to Colonel Benedict Arnold, September 14, 1775, General George Washington enlarged:

I also give it in charge to you to avoid all disrespect of the religion of the country, and its ceremonies.

Prudence, policy, and a true Christian spirit will lead us to look with compassion upon their errors without insulting them.

While we are contending for our own liberty, we should be very cautious not to violate the rights of conscience of others, ever considering that God alone is the Judge of the hearts of men, and to Him only in this case they are answerable.

Before Colonel Benedict Arnold left Cambridge for Canada, General Washington prepared a handbill to be distributed to the inhabitants of Canada, in which he stated:

The Colonies, confiding in the Justice of their Cause, and the purity of their intentions, have reluctantly appealed to that Being in whose hands are all Human Events: He has hitherto smiled upon their virtuous Efforts, The Hand of Tyranny has been arrested in its Ravages, and the British Arms, which have shone with so much Splendor in every part of the Globe, are now tarnished with disgrace and disappointment. . . .

I have detached Colonel Arnold into your Country, with a part of the Army under my command. I have enjoined upon him, and I am certain that he will consider himself, and act as in the Country of his Patrons and best Friends. . . .

The cause of America and of Liberty is the cause of every virtuous American Citizen whatever may be his Religion or his descent.

On October 2, 1775, General George Washington issued the order:

Any officer, non-commissioned officer, or soldier who shall hereafter be detected playing at toss-up, pitch, and hustle, or any other games of chance, in or near the camp or village bordering on the encampments, shall without delay be confined and punished for disobedience of orders. The General does not mean by the above to discourage sports of exercise or recreation, he only means to discountenance and punish gaming.

On Sunday, November 26, 1775, General Washington wrote from his headquarters at Cambridge to the superintendent of his plantation at Mount Vernon, Lund Washington:

Let the hospitality of the house, with respect to the poor, be kept up. Let no one go hungry away. If any of this kind of people should be in want of corn, supply their necessities, provided it does not encourage them in idleness, and I have no objection to your giving my money in charity to the amount of forty or fifty pounds a year when you think it well bestowed.

What I mean by having no objection is that it is my desire that it should be done. You are to consider that neither myself nor wife is now in the way to do these good offices. In all other respects I recommend it to you, and have no doubt of your observing the greatest economy and frugality; as I suppose you know that I do not get a farthing for my services here, more than my expenses. It becomes necessary, therefore, for me to be saving at home.

On December 31, 1775, George and Martha Washington attended Christ Church in Cambridge, Massachusetts, where Colonel William Palfrey offered a prayer of a form different from that commonly used for the King:

O Lord, our Heavenly Father, We beseech Thee to look down with mercy upon his Majesty, George, the Third. Open his eyes and enlighten his understanding that he may pursue the true interest of the people over whom Thou in Thy Providence hast placed him.

Be with Thy servant, the Commander-in-Chief of the American forces. Afford him Thy presence in all undertakings; strengthen him that he may vanquish and overcome all his enemies. . . . Amen.

On Sunday, January 14, 1776, General Washington wrote from Cambridge to Joseph Reed:

The reflection on my situation, and that of this army, produce many an unhappy hour when all around me are wrapped in sleep. Few people know the predicament we are in on a thousand accounts; fewer still believe, if any disaster happens to these lines, from what cause it flows.

I have often thought how much happier I should have been, if, instead of accepting the command under such circumstances, I had taken my musket on my shoulder and entered the ranks, or, if I could have justified the measure to posterity and my own conscience, have retired to the back country and lived in a wigwam.

If I shall be able to rise superior to these and many other difficulties which might be enumerated, I shall most religiously believe that the Finger of Providence is in it, to blind the eyes of our enemies; for surely if we get well through this month, it must be for want of their knowing the disadvantages we labor under.

On February 26, 1776, General Washington issued the orders:

All officers, non-commissioned officers, and soldiers are positively forbid playing at cards and other games of chance. At this time of public distress men may find enough to do in the service of their God and their country, without abandoning themselves to vice and immorality.

On March 6, 1776, from his headquarters at Cambridge, General Washington issued the command for a Day of Fasting, Prayer and Humiliation:

Thursday, the 7th instant, being set apart by the honorable Legislature of this Province as a day of fasting, prayer and humiliation, "to implore the Lord and Giver of all victory to pardon our manifold sins and wickedness, and that it would please Him to bless the Continental army with His divine favor and protection," all officers and soldiers are strictly enjoined to pay all due reverence and attention on that day to the sacred duties at the Lord of hosts for His mercies already received, and for those blessings which our holiness and uprightness of life can alone encourage us to hope through His mercy obtain.

By incredible means, fifty cannons were moved from Fort Ticonderoga to a position overlooking Boston. An instance of divine intervention resulted in a victory over the British, who had surrounded Boston for a year and a half, without loss of life either side. On March 17, 1776, General Washington replied to an address from the General Assembly of Massachusetts regarding the recent evacuation of General Howe and the British troops from Boston:

And it being effected without the blood of our soldiers and fellow-citizens must be ascribed to the Interposition of that Providence which has manifestly appeared on our behalf through the whole of this important struggle, as well as the measures pursued for bringing about the happy event.

May that Being who is powerful to save, and in whose hands is the fate of nations, look down with an eye of tender pity; and compassion upon the whole of the United Colonies; may He continue to smile upon their counsels and arms, and crown them with success, whilst employed in the cause of virtue and mankind.

May this distressed colony and its capital, and every part of this wide extended continent, through His Divine favor, be restored to more than their former lustre and once happy state, and have peace, liberty, and safety secured upon a solid, permanent and lasting foundation.

Following the withdrawal of the British troops from Boston, General Washington requested that a thanksgiving service be held. On April 9, 1776, the Pennsylvania Evening Post, Philadelphia, gave the account:

Thursday [March 28] the Lecture, which was established, and has been observed from the first settlement of Boston, without interruption, until within these few months past, was opened by the Reverend Doctor Eliot. His Excellency General Washington, the other General Officers and their suites, having been previously invited, met in the Council Chamber, from whence, preceded by the Sheriff with his Wand, attended by the members of the Council, who had the smallpox, the Committee of the House of Representatives, the Selectmen, the Clergy, and many other Gentlemen, they repaired to the old Brick Meeting House, where an excellent and well adapted discourse was delivered from those words in the XXXIII chapter of Isaiah, and 20th verse. After divine service was ended his Excellency, attended and accompanied as before, returned to the Council Chamber...

On March 31, 1776, General George Washington wrote to his brother, John Augustine Washington, from Cambridge, regarding the evacuation of the British from Boston:

Upon their discovery of the works next morning, great preparations were made for attacking them; but not being ready before the afternoon, and the weather getting very tempestuous, much blood was saved, and a very important blow, to one side or the other, was prevented. That this most remarkable Interposition of Providence is for some wise purpose, I have not a doubt.

On May 15, 1776, General George Washington issued the order:

The Continental Congress having ordered Friday the 17th instant to be observed as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer, humbly to supplicate the mercy of Almighty God, that it would please Him to pardon all our manifold sins and transgressions, and to prosper the arms of the United Colonies, and finally establish the peace and freedom of America upon a solid and lasting foundation; the General commands all officers and soldiers to pay strict obedience to the orders of the Continental Congress; that, by their unfeigned and pious observance of their religious duties, they may incline the Lord and Giver of victory to prosper our arms.

On May 31, 1776, in a letter written from Philadelphia to John Augustine Washington, General Washington stated:

We expect a very bloody Summer of it at New York and Canada, as it is there I expect the grand efforts of the Enemy will be aim'd; and I am sorry to say that we are not, either in Men, or Arms, prepared for it; however, it is to be hoped, that if our cause is just, as I do most religiously believe it to be, the same Providence which has in many instances appear'd for us, will still go on to afford its aid.

On July 2, 1776, from his Head Quarters in New York, General Washington issued his General Orders:

The time is now near at hand which must probably determine whether Americans are to be freemen or slaves; whether they are to have any property they can call their own; whether their houses and farms are to be pillaged and destroyed, and themselves consigned to a state of wretchedness from which no human efforts will deliver them.

The fate of unborn millions will now depend, under God, on the courage and conduct of this army. Our cruel and unrelenting enemy leaves us no choice but a brave resistance, or the most abject submission. We have, therefore to resolve to conquer or die. Our own country's honor calls upon us for a vigorous and manly exertion, and if we now shamefully fail, we shall become infamous to the whole world.

Let us rely upon the goodness of the cause, and the aid of the Supreme Being in whose hands victory is, to animate and encourage us to great and noble actions.

On July 9, 1776, upon receiving a copy of the Declaration of Independence from the Continental Congress, General George Washington issued the orders from his headquarters in New York authorizing the Continental Army to appoint and pay chaplains in every regiment :

The Hon. Continental Congress having been pleased to allow a Chaplain to each Regiment, with the pay of Thirty-three Dollars and one third pr month -

The Colonels or commanding officers of each regiment are directed to procure Chaplains accordingly; persons of good Characters and exemplary lives -

To see that all inferior officers and soldiers pay them a suitable respect and attend carefully upon religious exercises.

The blessing and protection of Heaven are at all times necessary but especially so in times of public distress and danger -

The General hopes and trusts, that every officer and man, will endeavour so to live, and act, as becomes a Christian Soldier, defending the dearest Rights and Liberties of his country.

The Hon. Continental Congress, impelled by the dictates of duty, policy and necessity, having been pleased to dissolve the Connection which subsisted between this Country, and Great Britain, and to declare the United Colonies of North America, free and independent States:

The several brigades are to be drawn up this evening on their respective Parades at six O' Clock, when the Declaration of Congress, shewing the grounds and reasons of this measure, is to be read with an audible voice.

The General hopes this important event will serve as a fresh incentive to every officer, and soldier, to act with Fidelity and Courage, as knowing that now the peace and safety of his Country depends (under God) solely on the success of our arms.

On August 3, 1776, General Washington issued the orders:

Parole Uxbri dge. Countersign Virgini a.

That the Troops may have an opportunity of attending public worship, as well as take some rest after the great fatigue they have come through; The General in future excuses them from fatigue duty on Sundays (except at the Ship Yards, or special occasions until further orders.

The General is sorry to be informed that the foolish, and wicked practice, of profane cursing and swearing (a Vice heretofore little known in an American Army) is growing into fashion; he hopes the officers will, by example, as well as influence, endeavour to check it, and that both they, and the men will reflect, that we can have little hopes of the blessing of Heaven on our Arms, if we insult it by our impiety, and folly; added to this, it is a vice so mean and low, without any temptation, that every man of sense, and character, detests and despises it.

On August 8, 1776, General Washington communicated to the Officers and Soldiers of the Pennsylvania Association:

If we make Freedom our choice, we must obtain it, by the Blessing of Heaven on our united and vigorous efforts...I trust that Providence will smile upon our Efforts, and establish us once more, the Inhabitants of a free and happy Country.

In August of 1776, in response to General Washington's desperate plea for reinforcements, Governor Jonathan Trumbull called for nine more regiments of volunteers:

In this day of calamity, to trust altogether to the justice of our cause, without our utmost exertion, would be tempting Providence...March on! - This shall be your warrant: Play the man for God, and for the cities of our God. May the Lord of Hosts, the God of the armies of Israel, be your Captain, your Leader, your Conductor, and Saviour.

On August 27, 1776, British General Howe had trapped General Washington and his 8,000 troops on Brooklyn Heights, Long Island, intending to advance the next morning to crush them. In a desperate move, Washington gathered every vessel, from fishing boats to row boats, and spent all night ferrying his army across the East River. When the morning came, there was still a large number of his troops dangerously exposed to the British, but in a most unusual change in weather, the fog did not lift from the river. It stayed thick, covering Washington's retreat until the entire army had evacuated and escaped! Never again did the British have such a rare chance of winning the war. Major Ben Tallmadge, who was Washington's Chief of Intelligence, wrote of that morning:

As the dawn of the next day approached, those of us who remained in the trenches became very anxious for our own safety, and when the dawn appeared there were several regiments still on duty. At this time a very dense fog began to rise [off the river], and it seemed to settle in a peculiar manner over both encampments. I recollect this peculiar providential occurrence perfectly well, and so very dense was the atmosphere that I could scarcely discern a man at six yards distance...We tarried until the sun had risen, but the fog remained as dense as ever.

In the first six months of the Revolution, the Continental Army was driven out of New York, across New Jersey and into Pennsylvania. The troops dwindled from an estimated 17,000 down to 2,000, and half of them were ready to quit. In a desperate and courageous act, General George Washington crossed the Delaware River on Christmas Day night, December 25, 1776, and gave a surprise attack on the Hessian troops at Trenton, who were most likely off their guard due to the Christmas holiday the day before. Washington captured nearly a thousand Hessian troops.

Washington's small force dodged General Cornwallis' 8,000 man British army until they were camped across from one another near Princeton, New Jersey. The night before the attack, Washington left his campfires burning and quietly withdrew his troops, marching them all night to the other side of the British camp. At daybreak, January 3, 1777, Washington attacked, capturing three regiments of British troops. Enthusiasm swept America, and as Ezra Stiles, president of Yale College, later stated:

In our lowest and most dangerous state, in 1776 and 1777, we sustained ourselves against the British Army of sixty thousand troops, commanded by... the ablest generals Britain could procure throughout Europe, with a naval force of twenty-two thousand seamen in above eighty men-of-war.

Who but a Washington, inspired by Heaven, could have conceived the surprise move upon the enemy at Princeton - that Christmas eve when Washington and his army crossed the Delaware?...

The United States are under peculiar obligations to become a holy people unto the Lord our God.

These two victories within the ten days, December 25, 1776, to January 3, 1777, were called "the most brilliant in the world's history" by Frederick the Great of Prussia. They helped convince France to eventually join the Revolution on the side of the Colonies and resulted in the British treating the Continental Army with caution, giving Washington much needed time to build his ranks.

On February 14, 1777, from Morristown, General Washington wrote to an unidentified correspondent:

Is a neutral character in one of the United States, which has by her Representatives, solemnly engaged to support the Cause, a justifiable one? If it is, may it not be extended to corporate bodies; to the State at large, and to the inevitable destruction of the opposition; which under Providence, depends upon a firm union of the whole, and the spirited exertions of all its Constituent parts?

On May 26, 1777, in a circular to the brigadier-generals, General Washington wrote:

Let vice and immorality of every kind be discouraged as much as possible in your brigade; and, as a chaplain is allowed to each regiment, see that the men regularly attend divine worship. Gaming of every kind is expressly forbidden, as being the foundation of evil, and the cause on many a brave and gallant officer's ruin. Games of exercise for amusement may not only be permitted but encouraged.

On July 4, 1777, from Morristown, New Jersey, General Washington wrote to General Armstrong:

The [British troops'] evacuation of Jersey at this time is a peculiar mark of Providence, as the inhabitants have an opportunity of securing their harvests of hay and grain.

On October 7, 1777, due the many necessary army maneuvers, General Washington issued the order:

The situation of the army frequently not admitting of the regular performance of divine services on Sundays, the chaplains of the army are forthwith to meet together and agree on some method of performing it at other times, which method they will make known to the Commander-in-Chief.

On October 18, 1777, in communicating the capitulation of British General Burgoyne's army at Saratoga, General Washington wrote to his brother John Augustine Washington:

I most devoutly congratulate my country, and every well-wisher to the cause, on this signal stroke of Providence.

On Sunday, October 19, 1777, in a letter to Major-General Putnam, General Washington wrote:

The defeat of General Burgoyne is a most important event, and such as must afford the highest satisfaction to every well-affected American. Should Providence be pleased to crown our arms in the course of the campaign with one more fortunate stroke, I think we shall have no great cause for anxiety respecting the future designs of Britain. I trust all will be well in His good time....

I am exceedingly sorry for the death of Mrs Putman, and sympathize with you upon the occasion. Remembering that all must die, and that she had lived to an honorable age, I hope you will bear the misfortune with that fortitude and complacency of mind that become a man and a Christian.

On October 27, 1777, in a letter to Landon Carter of Sabine Hall, Richmond, Virginia, General Washington wrote:

I have this instant received an account of the prisoners taken by the northern army (including Tories in arms against us) in the course of the campaign. This singular instance of Providence, and of our fortune under it, exhibits a striking proof of the advantages which result from unanimity and a spirited conduct in the militia....

I flatter myself that a superintending Providence is ordering everything for the best, and that, in due time, all will end well.

On December 17, 1777, the Continental troops arrived at Valley Forge. In a General Order, Washington informed his troops of the recent decision in Congress:

Tomorrow being the day set apart by the Honorable Congress for public Thanksgiving and Praise: and duty calling us devoutly to express our grateful acknowledgements to God for the manifold blessings he has granted us.

The General directs that the army remain in its present quarters, and that the Chaplains perform divine service with their several Corps and brigades; and earnestly exhorts, all officers and soldiers, whose absence is not indispensably necessary, to attend with reverence the solemnities of the day.

In the freezing winter of 1777, General George Washington was burdened with the lack of supplies for his troops camped at Valley Forge, and the overwhelming superiority of the British forces. Soldiers died at the rate of twelve per day, with many not even having blankets or shoes. The Commander in Chief himself, records the desperate state in a letter he wrote from Valley Forge to John Banister:

No history, now extant, can furnish an instance of an Army's suffering such uncommon hardships as ours has done and bearing them with the same patience and fortitude.

To see men without clothes to cover their nakedness, without blankets to lay on, without shoes, by which their marches might be traced by the blood from their feet, and almost as often without provisions as with; marching through frost and snow, and at Christmas taking up their winter quarters within a day's march of the enemy, without a house or hut to cover them till they could be built and submitting without a murmur, is a mark of patience and obedience which in my opinion can scarce be paralleled.

A Committee from Congress reported "feet and legs froze till they became black, and it was often necessary to amputate them." An incident during this crisis was recorded by Isaac Potts, whom General Washington was temporarily residing with:

In 1777 while the American army lay at Valley Forge, a good old Quaker by the name of Potts had occasion to pass through a thick woods near headquarters. As he traversed the dark brown forest, he heard, at a distance before him, a voice which as he advanced became more fervid and interested.

Approaching with slowness and circumspection, whom should he behold in a dark bower, apparently formed for the purpose, but the Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United Colonies on his knees in the act of devotion to the Ruler of the Universe!

At the moment when Friend Potts, concealed by the trees, came up, Washington was interceding for his beloved country. With tones of gratitude that labored for adequate expression he adored that exuberant goodness which, from the depth of obscurity, had exalted him to the head of a great nation, and that nation fighting at fearful odds for all the world holds dear....

Soon as the General had finished his devotions and had retired, Friend Potts returned to his house, and threw himself into a chair by the side of his wife. "Heigh! Isaac!" said she with tenderness, "thee seems agitated; what's the matter?"

"Indeed, my dear" quoth he, "if I appear agitated 'tis no more than what I am. I have seen this day what I shall never forget. Till now I have thought that a Christian and a soldier were characters incompatible; but if George Washington be not a man of God, I am mistaken, and still more shall I be disappointed if God does not through him perform some great thing for this country."

Henry Melchior Muhlenberg, pastor of the Lutheran church near Valley Forge and one of the founders of the Lutheran Church in America, noted concerning General Washington:

I heard a fine example today, namely, that His Excellency General Washington rode around among his army yesterday and admonished each and every one to fear God, to put away the wickedness that has set in and become so general, and to practice the Christian virtues. From all appearances, this gentleman does not belong to the so-called world of society, for he respects God's Word, believes in the atonement through Christ, and bears himself in humility and gentleness. Therefore, the Lord God has also singularly, yea, marvelously, preserved him from harm in the midst of countless perils, ambuscades, fatigues, etc., and has hitherto graciously held him in His hand as a chosen vessel.

Henry Melchior Muhlenberg's son, John Peter Gabriel Muhlenberg, at the age of 30, was a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses and a pastor. In 1775, he preached a message on Ecclesiastes 3:1, "For everything there is a season, and a time for every matter under heaven," and closed his message by saying:

In the language of the Holy Writ, there is a time for all things. There is a time to preach and a time to fight. And now is the time to fight.

John Peter Muhlenberg then threw off his clerical robes to reveal the uniform of an officer in the Continental Army. That afternoon, at the head of 300 men, he marched off to join General Washington's troops. He became Colonel of the 8th Virginia Regiment and served until the end of the war, being promoted to the rank of Major-General.

John Peter Muhlenberg became the Vice-President of Pennsylvania, 1785; a member of the Pennsylvania Constitutional Convention, 1790; a U. S. Representative from Pennsylvania; and a U. S. Senator, 1801. In 1889, Pennsylvania chose his statue to represent their State in the Statuary Hall at Washington, D. C.

Prussian General Baron Friedrich Wilhelm Ludolf Gerhard Augustin von Steuben (1730-1794) worked with the Continental Army at Valley Forge, drilling them continually until they could, with precision, deliver a volley of gunfire every 15 seconds. An article appeared in the Pennsylvania Packet, a Philadelphia newspaper, during that fateful winter:

Our attention is now drawn to one point: the enemy grows weaker every day, and we are growing stronger. Our work is almost done, and with the blessing of heaven, and the valor of our worthy General, we shall soon drive these plunderers out of our country!

On Sunday, March 1, 1778, in orders issued from the Head Quarters at Valley Forge, General Washington stated:

Thank Heaven! Our country abounds with provision and prudent management we need not apprehend want for any length of time.

On March 10, 1778, as recorded in The Writings of George Washington (March 1-May 31, 1778, 11:83-84, published by the U.S. Government Printing Office, 1934), George Washington issued the order:

At a General Court Marshall whereof Colo. Tupper was President (10th March 1778) Lieutt. Enslin of Colo. Malcom's Regiment tried for attempting to commit sodomy, with John Monhort a soldier; Secondly, For Perjury in swearing to false Accounts, found guilty of the charges exhibited against him, being breaches of 5th. Article 18th. Section of the Articles of War and do sentence him to be dismiss'd the service with Infamy. His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief approves the sentence and with Abhorrence and Detestation of such Infamous Crimes orders Liett. Enslin to be drummed out of Camp tomorrow morning by all the Drummers and Fifers in the Army never to return; The Drummers and Fifers to attend on the Grand parade at Guard mounting for that Purpose.

On April 12, 1778, from his headquarters at Valley Forge, General Washington issued the order:

The Honorable Congress having thought proper to recommend to the United States of America to set apart Wednesday, the 22nd inst., to be observed as a day of Fasting, Humiliation and Prayer, that at one time, and with one voice, the righteous dispensations of Providence may be acknowledged, and His goodness and mercy towards our arms supplicated and implored:

The General directs that the day shall be most religiously observed in the Army; that no work shall be done thereon, and that the several chaplains do prepare discourses suitable to the occasion.

On May 2, 1778, General George Washington issued these orders to his troops at Valley Forge:

The Commander-in-Chief directs that Divine service be performed every Sunday at 11 o'clock, in each Brigade which has a Chaplain. Those Brigades which have none will attend the places of worship nearest to them.

It is expected that officers of all ranks will, by their attendance, set an example for their men.

While we are zealously performing the duties of good citizens and soldiers, we certainly ought not to be inattentive to the higher duties of religion.

To the distinguished character of Patriot, it should be our highest Glory to laud the more distinguished Character of Christian.

The signal instances of Providential goodness which we have experienced and which have now almost crowned our labors with complete success demand from us in a peculiar manner the warmest returns of gratitude and piety to the Supreme Author of all good.

On May 5, 1778, upon receiving news that France had joined the War on the side of the Colonies, General Washington issued the order from his headquarters at Valley Forge:

It having pleased the Almighty Ruler of the Universe propitiously to defend the cause of the United

American States, and finally by raising us up a powerful friend among the Princes of the earth, to establish our Liberty and Independence upon a lasting foundation; it becomes us to set apart a day for gratefully acknowledging the Divine Goodness, and celebrating the event, which we owe to His benign interposition.

The several brigades are to be assembled at nine o'clock to-morrow morning, when their Chaplains will communicate the intelligence contained in the Postscript of the Gazette of 22nd inst., and offer up a thanksgiving, and deliver a discourse suitable to the occasion.

On May 30, 1778, from his headquarters at Valley Forge, General Washington wrote to Landon Carter:

My friends, therefore, may believe me sincerely in my professions of attachment to them, whilst Providence has a just claim to my humble and grateful thanks for its protection and direction of me through the many difficult and intricate scenes which this contest has produced; and for its constant interposition in our behalf, when the clouds were heaviest and seemed ready to burst upon us.

To paint the distresses and perilous situation of this army in the course of last winter, for want of clothes, provisions, and almost every other necessary essential to the well-being, I may say existence, of an army, would require more time and an abler pen than mine; nor, since our prospects have so miraculously brightened, shall I attempt it, or even bear it in remembrance, further than as a memento of what is due to the Great Author of all the care and good that have been extended in relieving us in difficulties.

On July 4, 1778, written from Brunswick, New Jersey, General Washington commented to his brother John Augustine Washington:

General Lee having the command of the Van of the Army, consisting of fully 5000 chosen men, was ordered to begin the attack next morning so soon as the enemy began their march, to be supported by me. But strange to tell! When he came up with the enemy, a retreat commenced; whether by his order, or from other causes, is now the subject of inquiry, and consequently improper to be descanted on, as he is in arrest, and a Court Martial sitting for trial of him.

A retreat however was the fact, be the causes as they may; and the disorder arising from it would have proved fatal to the Army had not that Bountiful Providence which has never failed us in the hour of distress, enabled me to form a regiment or two (of those that were retreating) in the face of the enemy, and under their fire, by which means a stand was made long enough (the place through which the enemy were pursuing being narrow) to form the Troops that were advancing, upon an advantageous piece of ground in the rear; hence our affairs took a favourable turn, and being pursued, we drove the enemy back....

As the Post waits I shall only add my love to my sister and the family, and strong assurances of being with the sincerest regard and love, your most affectionate brother.

On August 20, 1778, from White Plains, New York, General George Washington wrote to Brigadier General Thomas Nelson of Virginia:

It is not a little pleasing, nor less wonderful to contemplate, that after two years...undergoing the strangest vicissitudes that perhaps ever attended any one contest since the creation, both armies are brought back to the very point that they set out from and, that which was the offending party in the beginning is now reduced to the use of the spade and pick axe for defense. The Hand of Providence has been so conspicuous in all this (the course of the war) that he must be worse than an infidel that lacks faith, and more wicked that has not gratitude to acknowledge his obligations; but it will be time enough for me to turn Preacher when my present appointment ceases, and therefore, I shall add no more on the doctrine of providence.

[Profuse instances of "Providential" intervention are documented in The Light and the Glory by Peter Marshall and David Manuel, (Old Tappan, New Jersey: Fleming H. Revell Company, 1977); and in The American Covenant - The Untold Story by Marshall Foster and Mary-Elaine Swanson, (Roseburg, OR: Foundation for Christian Self-Government, 1981; Thousand Oaks, CA: The Mayflower Institute, 1983, 1992.)

On October 20, 1778, while at Fredricksberg, General George Washington wrote:

Purity of Morals being the only sure foundation of publick happiness in any Country and highly conducive to order, subordination and success in an Army, it will be well worthy the Emulation of Officers of every rank and Class to encourage it both by the Influence of Example and the penalties of Authority.

It is painful to see many shameful Instances of Riot and Licentiousness among us...A regard to decency should conspire, with a Sense of Morality to banish a vice productive of neither Advantage or Pleasure.

On May 12, 1779, General George Washington was visited at his Middle Brook military encampment by the Chiefs of the Delaware Indian tribe. They had brought three youths to be trained in the American schools. Washington assured them:

Brothers: I am glad you have brought three of the Children of your principal Chiefs to be educated with us. I am sure Congress will open the Arms of love to them, and will look upon them as their own Children, and will have them educated accordingly.

This is a great mark of your confidence and of your desire to preserve the friendship between the Two Nations to the end of time, and to become One people with your Brethren of the United States...

You do well to wish to learn our arts and ways of life, and above all, the religion of Jesus Christ. These will make you a greater and happier people than you are. Congress will do everything they can to assist you in this wise intention; and to tie the knot of friendship and union so fast, that nothing shall ever be able to loose it....

And I pray God He may make your Nation wise and strong.

In June of 1779, near his headquarters on the Hudson River, General George Washington's private prayer was recorded:

And now, Almighty Father, if it is Thy holy will that we shall obtain a place and name among the nations of the earth, grant that we may be enabled to show our gratitude for Thy goodness by our endeavors to fear and obey Thee.

Bless us with Thy wisdom in our counsels, success in battle, and let all our victories be tempered with humanity. Endow, also, our enemies with enlightened minds, that they become sensible of their injustice, and willing to restore our liberty and peace.

Grant the petition of Thy servant, for the sake of Him whom Thou hast called Thy beloved Son; nevertheless, not my will, but Thine be done.

On April 6, 1780, in his General Orders from the Head Quarters in Morristown, General Washington instructed all troops to observe the Proclamation of a Day of Fasting, Humiliation and Prayer issued by Congress:

The Honorable Congress having been pleased by their Proclamation of the 11th of last month to appoint Wednesday the 22nd instant to be set apart and observed as a day of Fasting, Humiliation and Prayer for certain purposes therein mentioned, and recommended that there should be no labor or recreations on that day;

The same is to be observed accordingly thro' out the Army and the different Chaplains will prepare discourses suited to the several objects enjoined by the said Proclamation.

In June of 1780, Hessian General Wilhelm von Knyphausen, with 5,000 troops, crossed over to New Jersey from Staten Island. Encountering unexpected resistance at the little village of Springfield, they were driven back, but not before they shot the wife of Reverend James Caldwell, a mother of nine, and burned their home to the ground.

Two weeks later they repeated their attempt to advance, aided by British General Clinton's troops, and they again met resistance. The patriots in General Nathaniel Greene's regiment were courageously firing from behind the church fence when they suddenly ran out of paper wadding, used to hold the gunpowder in place in their muskets.

Chaplain James Caldwell quickly ran past the British fire, entered the Presbyterian church and collected all the copies he could carry of Isaac Watts' Psalms, Hymns, and Spiritual Songs, 1707. Distributing them to the thankful troops, he exclaimed, "Now put Watts into 'em, boys! Give 'em Watts!" The Americans held their ground, and by the next day the enemy had withdrawn.

On Monday, September 25, 1780, almost by accident, the plot of Benedict Arnold, Commander of West Point, to betray the Continental Army into the hands of the British was discovered. In response to the miraculous deliverance thereof, General George Washington issued the following circular to his troops:

September 26, 1780, Tuesday.

Treason of the blackest dye was yesterday discovered! General Arnold who commanded at Westpoint, lost to every sentiment of honor, of public and private obligation, was about to deliver up that important Post into the hands of the enemy. Such an event must have given the American cause a deadly wound if not fatal stab. Happily the treason had been timely discovered to prevent the fatal misfortune. The providential train of circumstances which led to it affords the most convincing proof that the Liberties of America are the object of divine Protection.

On January 1, 1781, circumstances were desperate for the Continental Army. The Pennsylvania line troops, being paid with worthless paper currency, revolted. Short enlistments threatened the discipline of the ranks. On January 5, 1781, from the Head Quarters at New Windsor, General Washington wrote a circular letter to the New England States:

At what point this defection will stop, or how extensive it may prove God only knows... How long they will continue so cannot be ascertained, as they labor under some pressing hardships, with the Troops who have revolted... I give it decidedly as my opinion, that it is vain to think an Army can be kept together much longer, under such a variety of suffering as ours has experienced.

In a bold move, on January 17, 1781, George Washington's southern army, led by General George Morgan, defeated the entire detachment of British Colonel Tarleton's troops at Cowpens. Lord Cornwallis was infuriated and immediately began pursuing the American troops. He decided to wait the night at the Catawba River, which the American troops had crossed just two hours earlier, but to his distress, a storm began during the night, causing the river to be impassable for days.

On February 3, Lord Cornwallis nearly overtook the American troops again at the Yadkin River, arriving just as the American troops were getting out on the far side. But before his troops could cross, a sudden torrential rain caused the river to flood over its banks, preventing the British from crossing.

On February 13, only a few hours ahead of the British, the American troops crossed the Dan River into Virginia. When the British arrived, again, the river had risen, stopping the British pursuit. British Commander in Chief Henry Clinton wrote, explaining the incident:

Here the royal army was again stopped by a sudden rise of the waters, which had only just fallen (almost miraculously) to let the enemy over, who could not else have eluded Lord Cornwallis' grasp, so close was he upon their rear.

On March 9, 1781, from Newport, Rhode Island, General Washington wrote to William Gordon:

We have, as you very justly observe, abundant reasons to thank Providence for its many favorable interpositions in our behalf. It has at times been my only dependence, for all other resources seemed to have failed us.

On March 26, 1781, General Washington wrote to Major-General Armstrong:

Our affairs are brought to a perilous crisis, that the Hand of Providence, I trust, may be more conspicuous in our deliverance. The many remarkable interpositions of the Divine government in the hours of our deepest distress and darkness, have been too luminous to suffer me to doubt the happy issue of the present contest.

On Friday, October 19, 1781, the British troops under Lord Cornwallis surrendered at Yorktown. The following day, General George Washington called for a service to render thanksgiving to God:

In order to diffuse the general Joy through every Breast the General orders that those men belonging to the Army who may now be in confinement shall be pardoned released and join their respective corps.

Divine Service is to be performed tomorrow in the several Brigades or Divisions.

The Commander-in-Chief earnestly recommends that the troops not on duty should universally attend with that seriousness of deportment and gratitude of heart which the recognition of such reiterated and astonishing Interposition of Providence demands of us.

On November 5, 1781, John Parke Custis, George Washington's step-son and aide-de-camp during the siege of Yorktown, died of a violent case of campfever at the home of his uncle, Colonel Bassett, in Eltham, Virginia. He had been born to Daniel Parke and Martha Dandridge Custis, shortly before Daniel Parke Custis' death. George Washington, who never had children of his own, raised John Parke Custis and his sister, Martha "Miss Patsey" Custis, after he married Martha Dandridge Custis in 1759. Martha "Miss Patsey" Custis, had died eight years earlier, at the age of 16-years-old. When John Parke Custis' young widow remarried, George and Martha Washington adopted the two small children, Eleanor Parke "Nellie" Custis and George Washington Parke Custis, as their own. George Washington Parke Custis (1781-1857), was 19-years-old when George Washington died, and lived to be 77 years old. Growing up at Mount Vernon with the Washingtons, he is considered one of the most reliable authorities on George Washington's private life, publishing his work, Recollections and Private Memoirs of Washington, in 1820. He built a mansion, which stands on the site of the present Arlington National Cemetery, and in 1831, his daughter, Mary Ann Randolph Custis, married a young West Point graduate by the name of Robert E. Lee.

On November 15, 1781, General George Washington wrote from Mount Vernon to the President of the Continental Congress, Thomas McKean:

Sir, I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your favor of the 31st ultimo, covering the resolution of Congress of the 29th, and a proclamation for a day of public prayer and thanksgiving. . . .

I take a particular pleasure in acknowledging that the interposing Hand of Heaven, in the various instances of our extensive Preparation for this Operation [Yorktown], has been most conspicuous and remarkable.

American Quotations.txt

On January 31, 1782, from Philadelphia, General Washington composed a "Circular to the States," addressed to Meshech Weare, President of New Hampshire:

Although we cannot, by the best concerted plans, absolutely command success; although the race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong; yet, without presumptuously waiting for miracles to be wrought in our favor, it is our indispensable duty, with the deepest gratitude to Heaven for the past, and humble confidence in its smiles on our future operations, to make use of all the means in our power for our defense and security.

On May 16, 1782, from his headquarters at Newburgh, New York, General Washington issued the order:

The name of every soldier shall be struck off who addicts himself to drunkenness, or injuries his constitution by intemperance.

On February 6, 1783, writing from Newburgh to Major General Nathanael Greene, General Washington expressed:

Historiographers should be hardy enough to fill the page of history with the advantages that have been gained with unequal numbers (on the part of America) in the course of this contest... for it will not be believed that such a force as Great Britain has employed for eight years in this country could be baffled in their plan of subjugating it by numbers infinitely less, composed of men oftentimes half starved; always in rags, without pay, and experiencing, at times, every species of distress which human nature is capable of undergoing.

On Saturday, February 15, 1783, from his encampment at Newburg, New York, General Washington issued the order:

The New Building being so far finished as to admit the troops to attend public worship therein, after tomorrow it is directed that divine service should be performed there every Sunday by the several chaplains of the New Windsor Cantonment in rotation.

On March 22, 1783, from Newburg, New York, as recorded in the Orderly Book, General Washington directed:

In justice to the zeal and ability of the Chaplains, as well as to his own feelings, the Commander-in-Chief thinks it a duty to declare that the regularity and decorum with which Divine Service is performed every Sunday, will reflect great credit on the army in general, tend to improve the morals, and the same time increase the happiness of the soldiery, and must afford the most pure, rational entertainments for every serious and well-disposed mind.

On March 31, 1783, General Washington wrote to Major General Nathanael Greene:

It remains only for the States to be wise, and to establish their independence on that basis of inviolable efficacious union, and firm confederation, which may prevent their being made the sport of European policy; May Heaven give them wisdom to adopt the measures still necessary for this important purpose.

On Friday, April 18, 1783, General Washington issued the order:

The Commander in Chief orders the Cessation of Hostilities between the United States of America and the King of Great Britain to be publicly proclaimed tomorrow at 12 o'clock at the New building; and that the proclamation, which will be communicated herewith, be read tomorrow evening at the head of every regiment and corps of the army. After which the Chaplains with the several Brigades will render thanks to Almighty God for all his mercies, particularly for His overruling the wrath of man to His own glory, and causing the rage of war to cease amongst the nations.

On May 2, 1783, in a very lengthy communication addressed to Alexander Hamilton, General Washington detailed his plans for the organization of America's military. He listed Chaplains as the first staff officers in the charts drawn up for The Establishment and Disposition of four Regts. of Infantry Men including Officers; and Establishment for one Regiment of Artillery. He recommended each regiment be assigned a Chaplain.

On June 11, 1783, General Washington replied in a letter to the Reverend John Rodgers, who had proposed that Bibles be given to the soldiers serving in the war:

Your proposition respecting Mr. Aitken's Bibles would have been particularly noticed by me, had it been suggested in Season; but the late Resolution of Congress for discharging part of the Army...it is now too late to make the Attempt.

It would have pleased me if Congress should have made such an important present to the brave fellows who have done so much for the Security of their Country's Rights and Establishment.

On June 14, 1783, at the conclusion of the Revolutionary War, General George Washington sent a farewell dispatch, entitled "Circular Letter Addressed to the Governors of all the States on Disbanding the Army," from his headquarters in Newburgh, New York, to all thirteen Governors of the newly freed states. In it he stated:

I am now preparing to resign...But before I carry this resolution into effect, I think it a duty incumbent on me, to make this my last official communication, to congratulate you on the glorious events which Heaven has been pleased to produce in our favor....

We shall have equal occasion to felicitate ourselves on the lot which Providence has assigned us, whether we view it in a natural, a political or moral point of light....

The Citizens of America are from this period to be considered as the actors of a most conspicuous theatre, which seems to be particularly designed by Providence for the display of human greatness and felicity.

Here they are not only surrounded with everything, which can contribute to the completion of private and domestic enjoyment, but Heaven has crowned all its other blessing, by giving a fairer opportunity for political happiness, than any other nation has ever been favored with....

The free cultivation of letters, the unbounded extension of commerce, the progressive refinement of manners, the growing liberality of sentiment, and, above all, the pure and benign light of Revelation, have had a meliorating influence on mankind and increased the blessings of society....

According to the system of policy the States shall adopt at this moment, they will stand or fall; and by their confirmation or lapse, it is yet to be decided, whether the Revolution must ultimately be considered as a blessing or a curse...not to the present age alone, for with our fate will the destiny of unborn Millions be involved....

It remains, then, to be my final and only request, that your Excellency will communicate these sentiments to your Legislature at their next meeting, and that they may be considered as the legacy of one who has ardently wished, on all occasions, to be useful to his country, and who, even in the shade of retirement, will not fail to implore the Divine benediction upon it.

I now make it my earnest prayer that God would have you, and the State over which you preside, in His holy protection; that He would incline the hearts of the citizens...to entertain a brotherly affection and love for one another, for their fellow citizens of the United States at large, and particularly for their brethren who have served in the field; and finally, that He would most graciously be pleased to dispose us all to do justice, to love mercy, and to demean ourselves with that charity, humility, and pacific temper of mind, which were the characteristics of the Divine Author of our blessed religion, and without an humble imitation of whose example in these things, we can never hope to be a happy nation.

Washington's Prayer for the United States of America appears on a plaque in St. Paul's Chapel in New York City and at Pohick Church, Fairfax County, Virginia, where Washington was a vestryman, 1762-84:

Almighty God; We make our earnest prayer that Thou wilt keep the United States in Thy Holy protection; and Thou wilt incline the hearts of the Citizens to cultivate a spirit of subordination and obedience to Government; and entertain a brotherly affection and love for one another and for their fellow Citizens of the United States at large, and particularly for their brethren who have served in the Field.

And finally that Thou wilt most graciously be pleased to dispose us all to do justice, to love mercy, and to demean ourselves with that Charity, humility, and pacific temper of mind which were the Characteristics of the Divine Author of our blessed

Religion, and without a humble imitation of whose example in these things we can never hope to be a happy nation.

Grant our supplication, we beseech Thee, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

On July 8, 1783, from his headquarters at Newburgh, General Washington wrote to the Reverend William Gordon:

To say nothing of the invisible workings of Providence, which has conducted us through difficulties where no human foresight could point the way; it will appear evident to a close examiner, that there has been a concatenation of causes to produce this event; which in all probability at no time, or under any circumstances, will combine again.

On August 26, 1783, in addressing Congress in session at Princeton, New Jersey, General Washington expressed:

Notwithstanding Congress seems to estimate the value of my life beyond any services I have been able to render the United States, yet I must be permitted to consider the wisdom and unanimity of our national councils, the firmness of our citizens, and the patience and bravery of our troops, who have produced so happy a termination of the war, as the most conspicuous effect of the Divine interposition, and the surest presage of our future happiness. . . .

Perhaps, sir, no occasion may offer more suitable than the present to express my humble thanks to God, and my grateful acknowledgements to my country, for the great and uniform support I have received in every vicissitude and fortune, and for the many distinguished honors which Congress has been pleased to confer upon me in the course of the war.

On November 27, 1783, General Washington wrote to the ministers, elders, deacons, and members of the Reformed German Congregation of New York:

Gentlemen. . . . Disposed, at every suitable opportunity to acknowledge publicly our infinite obligations to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe for rescuing our country from the brink of destruction;

I cannot fail at this time to ascribe all the honor of our late success to the same glorious Being. And if my humble exertions have been made in any degree subservient to the execution of the Divine purposes, a contemplation of the benediction of Heaven on our righteous Cause, the approbation of my virtuous Countrymen, and the testimony of my own Conscience, will be a sufficient reward and augment my felicity beyond anything which the world can bestow.

The establishment of Civil and Religious Liberty was the Motive which induced me to the Field; the object is attained, and it now remains to be my earnest wish and prayer, that the Citizens of the United States would make a wise and virtuous use of the blessings, placed before them; and that the Reformed German Congregation in New York may not only be conspicuous for their religious character, but exemplary, in support of our inestimable acquisitions, as their reverend Minister has been in the attainment of them.

Expressing his desire to retire, General George Washington commented near the close of his term in service:

I anticipate with pleasure the day, and that I trust not far off, when I shall quit the busy scenes of a military employment and retire to the more tranquil walks of domestic life.

In that, or whatever other situation Providence may dispose my future days, the remembrance of the many friendships and connections I have had the happiness to contract with the gentlemen of the army, will be one of my most grateful reflections.

Under this contemplation, and impressed with the sentiments of benevolence and regard, I commend you, my dear sir, my other friends, and with them the interest and happiness of our dear country, to the keeping and protection of Almighty God.

On November 2, 1783, from Rock Hill, near Princeton, General George Washington issued his Farewell Orders to the Armies of the United States:

It only remains for the Comdr in Chief to address himself once more, and that for the time, to the Armies of the U. States...and to bid them an affectionate, a long farewell...

Before the Comdr in Chief takes his final leave of those he holds most dear, he wishes to indulge himself a few moments in calling to mind a slight review of the past....

The singular interpositions of Providence in our feeble condition were such, as could scarcely escape the attention of the most unobserving; while the unparalleled perseverance of the Armies of the U. States, through almost every possible suffering and discouragement for the space of eight long years, was little short of a standing miracle....

To conclude these his last public Orders, to take his ultimate leave in a short time of the military character, and to bid a final adieu to the Armies he has so long had the honor to Command, he can only again offer in their behalf his recommendations to their grateful country, and his prayers to the God of Armies.

May ample justice be done then here, and may the choicest of Heaven's favours, both here and thereafter, attend those who, under Divine auspices, have secured innumerable blessings for others; with these wishes, and his benediction, the Commander in Chief is about to retire from Service...

On December 4, 1783, General Washington bade farewell to his troops gathered at Fraunces Tavern, New York City. On December 23, 1783, from the Maryland Capitol at Annapolis, General Washington wrote to Baron Steuben:

This is the last letter I shall write while I continue in the service of my country. The hour of my resignation is fixed at 12 today, after which I shall become a private citizen on the banks of the Potomac.

the Maryland Capitol at Annapolis, General George Washington stated:

Happy in the confirmation of our independence and sovereignty, and pleased with the opportunity offered the United States of becoming a respectable nation, I resign with satisfaction the appointment I accepted with diffidence, a diffidence in my abilities to accomplish so arduous a task, which however, was superseded by a confidence in the rectitude of our cause, the support of the supreme power of the Union, and the patronage of Heaven.

The successful termination of the war has verified the most sanguine expectations; and my gratitude for the Interposition of Providence, and the assistance I have received from my countrymen, increases with every review of the momentous contest....

I consider it an indispensable duty to close this last solemn act of my Official life by commending the Interest of our dearest Country to the protection of Almighty God, and those who have the superintendence of them, to his Holy keeping.

In 1783, Benjamin Franklin, as an ambassador of the United States, was at a dinner of foreign dignitaries in Versailles, France. The minister of Great Britain proposed a toast to King George III, likening him to the sun. The French minister, in like kind, proposed a toast to King Louis XVI, comparing him with the moon. Benjamin Franklin stood up and toasted:

George Washington, Commander of the American armies, who, like Joshua of old, commanded the sun and the moon to stand still, and they obeyed him.

On February 20, 1784, from Mount Vernon, George Washington wrote to Major General Knox:

I feel now, however, as I conceive a wearied traveler must do who, after treading many a painful step with a heavy burden on his shoulders, is eased of the latter, having reached the haven to which all the former were directed; and from his housetop is looking back, and tracing with an eager eye the meanders by which he escaped the quicksands and mires which lay in his way; into which none but the all-powerful Guide and Dispenser of human events could have prevented his falling.

On February 8, 1785, George Washington wrote from Mount Vernon to the President of the Continental Congress:

Toward the latter part of the year 1783, I was honored with a letter from the Countess of Huntington, briefly reciting her benevolent intention of spreading Christianity among the Tribes of Indians inhabiting our Western Territory; and expressing a desire of my advice and assistance to carry this charitable design into execution.

I wrote her Ladyship... that I would give every aid in my power, consistent with the ease and tranquility, to which I meant to devote the remainder of my life, to carry her plan into effect....

Her Ladyship has spoken so feelingly and sensibly, on the religious and benevolent purposes of the plan, that no language of which I am possessed, can add ought to enforce her observations.

On June 25, 1785, George Washington was finally able to return the correspondence of Marquis de Lafayette, who had sent several letters to Washington at Mount Vernon in the previous months:

My Dear Marquis, I have to acknowledge and thank you for your several favors of the 9th. of February, the 19th. of March and 16th. of April, with their enclosures; all of which (the last only yesterday) have been received since I had the honor to address you in February.

I stand before you as a culprit: but to repent and be forgiven are the precepts of Heaven: I do the former, do you practice the latter, and it will be participation of a divine attribute. Yet I am not barren of excuses for this seeming inattention; frequent absences from home, a round of company when at it, and the pressure of many matters, might be urged as apologies for my long silence....

I now congratulate you, and my heart does it more effectually than my pen, on your safe arrival in Paris, from your voyage to this Country...

On Sunday, October 2, 1785, George Washington entered in his diary:

Went with Fanny Bassett, Burwell Bassett, Doctor Stuart, G. A. Washington, Mr. Shaw & Nelly Custis to the Pohick Church; to hear a Mr. Thompson preach, who returned home with us to dinner, where I found Reverend Mr. Jones [David Jones, Chester County, Pennsylvania], formerly a chaplain in one of the Pennsylvania Regiments.

On October 3, 1785, George Washington wrote from Mount Vernon to George Mason:

No man's sentiments are more opposed to any kind of restraint upon religious principles than mine are.

On April 12, 1786, George Washington wrote from Mount Vernon to Robert Morris:

I hope it will not be conceived from these observations, that it is my wish to hold the unhappy people, who are the subject of this letter, in slavery. I can only say that there is not a man living who wishes more sincerely than I do, to see a plan adopted for the abolition of it; but there is only one proper and effectual mode by which it can be accomplished, and that is by Legislative authority.

On May 10, 1786, George Washington wrote from Mount Vernon to Marquis de Lafayette:

Your late purchase of an estate in the colony of Cayenne, with a view of emancipating the slaves on it, is a generous and noble proof of your humanity. Would to God a like spirit would diffuse itself generally into the minds of the people of this country.

On September 9, 1786, from Mount Vernon, George Washington wrote to John F. Mercer:

I never mean, unless some particular circumstances should compel it, to possess another slave by purchase, it being among my first wishes to see some plan adopted, by which slavery in this country may be abolished by law.

On Sunday, October 15, 1786, George Washington entered in his diary:

Accompanied by Major Washington, his wife - Mr. Lear and the two children Nelly and Washington Custis - went to Pohick Church and returned to dinner.

On November 18, 1786, George Washington wrote from Mount Vernon to James Madison:

It gives me the most sensible pleasure to hear that the acts of the present session are marked with wisdom, justice and liberality.... Would to God every State would let these be the leading features of their constituent characters.

On Saturday, March 3, 1787, George Washington entered in his diary while at Mount Vernon:

The Rev. Mr. Weems and ye Doctor Craik who came here yesterday in the afternoon left about noon for Port Tobacco [Maryland].

On May 14, 1787, the Constitutional Convention met at the State House (Independence Hall) for the purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation and formulating the Constitution. On May 25, 1787, George Washington, who had been unanimously elected as president of the Convention, rose and admonished the delegates:

If to please the people, we offer what we ourselves disapprove, how can we afterward defend our work? Let us raise a standard to which the wise and the honest can repair; the event is in the Hand of God!

On Saturday, May 26, 1787, George Washington entered in his diary:

Went to the Romish Church to high mass.

On Sunday, June 17, 1787, George Washington entered in his diary:

Went to [Christ] Church - heard Bishop White preach, and see him ordain two gentlemen Deacons.

On July 30, 1787, George Washington instructed Joseph Rakestraw of Philadelphia to place a dove of peace on his weathervane at Mount Vernon:

I should like to have a bird (in place of the Vane) with an olive branch in its mouth.

American Quotations.txt

On August 15, 1787, in a letter from Philadelphia to the Marquis de Lafayette, George Washington wrote:

I am not less ardent in my wish that you may succeed in your plan of toleration in religious matters. Being no bigot myself to any mode of worship, I am disposed to indulge the professors of Christianity in the church with that road to Heaven which to them shall seem the most direct, plainest and easiest, and the least liable to exception.

On Sunday, October 28, 1787, George Washington entered in his diary:

Went to Pohick Church - Mr. Lear and Washington Custis in the carriage with me.

On Sunday, April 13, 1788, George Washington entered in his diary:

Went to church at Alexandria, accompanied by Col. Humphrey, Mr. Lear and Washington Custis.

On May 28, 1788, George Washington wrote from Mount Vernon to Marquis de Lafayette:

A few short weeks will determine the political fate of America... I will confess to you sincerely, my dear Marquis; it will be so much beyond any thing we had a right to imagine or expect eighteen months ago, that it will demonstrate as visibly the Finger of Providence, as any possible event in the course of human affairs can ever designate it.

On Sunday, June 15, 1788, while visiting his mother in Fredericksburg, George Washington attended church. The people of the area, anxious to observe him, crowded into the small church until it seemed the floor would give way. George Washington entered in his diary:

On Sunday we went to church - the congregation being alarmed (without cause) and supposing the gallery at the north end was about to fall, were thrown into the utmost confusion; and in the precipitate retreat to the doors many got hurt.

On June 29, 1788, George Washington sent a letter to General Benjamin Lincoln, his deputy in the War, who had accepted British General Cornwallis' sword at the surrender at Yorktown:

No Country upon Earth ever had it more in its power to attain these blessings than United America. Wondrously strange then, and much to be regretted indeed would it be, were we to neglect the means and depart from the road which Providence has pointed us to, so plainly; I cannot believe it will ever come to pass.

The Great Governor of the Universe has led us too long and too far on the road to happiness and glory to forsake us in the midst of it...

We may, now and then, get bewildered; but I hope and trust that there is good sense and virtue enough

On July 20, 1788, George Washington wrote from Mount Vernon to Jonathan Trumbull, the former British Governor of Connecticut who had become loyal to the cause of American Independence:

Your friend Colonel Humphreys informs me, from the wonderful revolution of sentiment in favor of federal measures, and the marvelous change for the better in the elections of the State, that he shall begin to suspect that miracles have not ceased. Indeed, for myself, since so much liberality has been displayed in the construction and adoption of proposed general government, I am almost disposed to be of the same opinion.

Or at least we may, with a kind of pious and grateful exultation, trace the Finger of Providence through those dark and mysterious events which first induced the States to appoint a general Convention, and then led them one after another, by such steps as were best calculated to effect the object into an adoption of the system recommended by that general Convention; thereby in all human probability laying a lasting foundation for tranquillity and happiness, when we had but too much reason to fear that confusion and misery were coming rapidly upon us.

That the same Good Providence may still continue to protect us, and prevent us from dashing the cup of national felicity, just as it has been lifted to our lips, is the earnest prayer of, my dear sir, your faithful friend, etc., etc.

On July 31, 1788, from Mount Vernon, George Washington wrote to James McHenry:

I earnestly pray that the Omnipotent Being, who has not deserted the cause of America in the hour of its extremest hazard, may never yield so fair a heritage of freedom a prey to anarchy or despotism.

On August 28, 1788, George Washington wrote from Mount Vernon to Benjamin Lincoln:

I trust in that Providence, which has saved us in six troubles yea seven, to rescue us again from any imminent, though unseen, dangers. Nothing, however, on our part ought to be left undone... Heaven is my witness, that an inextinguishable desire [for] the felicity of my country may be promoted is my only motive in making these observations.

On August 31, 1788, George Washington wrote from Mount Vernon to Thomas Jefferson:

Though the peril is not past entirely; thank God! the prospect is somewhat brightening.

On September 22, 1788, from Mount Vernon, George Washington wrote to Henry Lee in Congress, who had urged him to accept the presidency:

Nor will you conceive me to be solicitous for reputation. Though I prize as I ought the good opinion of my fellow citizens, yet, if I know myself, I would not seek to retain popularity at the expense of one social duty or moral virtue.

While doing what my conscience informed me was right, as it respected my God, my country, and myself, I could despise all the party clamor and unjust censure which might be expected from some whose personal enmity might be occasioned by their hostility to the government.

On Sunday, October 26, 1788, George Washington entered in his diary:

Went to Pohick Church and returned home to dinner.

On October 26, 1788, George Washington wrote from Mount Vernon to Benjamin Lincoln:

I would willingly pass over in silence that part of your letter, in which you mention the persons who are Candidates for the two first Offices in the Executive, if I did not fear the omission might seem to betray a want of confidence....

Every personal consideration conspires to rivet me (if I may use the expression) to retirement. At my time of life, and under my circumstances, nothing in this world can ever draw me from it, unless it be a conviction that the partiality of my Countrymen had made my services absolutely necessary, joined to a fear that my refusal might induce a belief that I preferred the conservation of my own reputation and private ease, to the good of my Country.

After all, if I should conceive myself in a manner constrained to accept, I call Heaven to witness, that this very act would be the greatest sacrifice of my personal feeling and wishes that ever I have been called upon to make.

At the start of the Revolutionary War, George Washington had moved his mother into the village of Fredericksburg for safety. She remained there for the entire duration of the War. In October of 1781, when informed of British General Cornwallis' surrender, Mary Washington lifted her hands toward heaven in gratitude and exclaimed:

Thank God! War will now be ended, and peace, independence and happiness bless our country!

On Tuesday, April 14, 1789, George Washington received notification of his election as President of the United States. His final farewell to his mother was recorded by his adopted son, George Washington Parke Custis:

An affected scene ensued. The son feelingly remarked the ravages which a torturing disease (cancer) had made upon the aged frame of the mother, and addressed her with these words:

"The people, madam, have been pleased, with the most flattering unanimity, to elect me to the Chief magistracy of these United States, but before I can assume the functions of my office, I have come to bid you an affectionate farewell. So soon as the weight of public business, which must necessarily attend the outset of a new government, can be disposed of, I shall hasten to Virginia, and," (here the matron interrupted him with -)

"And you will see me no more; my great age, and the disease which is fast approaching my vitals, warn me that I shall not be long in this world; I trust in God that I may be somewhat prepared for the better. But go, George, fulfill the high destinies which Heaven appears to have intended for you; go, my son, and may that Heaven's and a mother's blessing be with you always."

Less than 4 months later, on August 25, 1789, Mrs. Mary Washington died at 82 years of age. President George Washington wrote a letter to his only sister, Mrs. Betty Lewis, in Fredericksburg, Virginia:

Awful and affecting as the death of a parent is, there is consolation in knowing that Heaven has spared ours to an age beyond which few attain, and favored her with the full enjoyment of her mental faculties, and as much bodily strength as usually fall to the lot of fourscore.

Under these considerations, and the hope that she is translated to a happier place, it is the duty of her relatives to yield due submission to the decrees of the Creator. When I was last at Fredericksburg I took a final leave of my mother, never expecting to see her more.

On April 16, 1789, the mayor of Alexandria, Virginia, spoke at a dinner in Washington's honor. In reply, George Washington gave a statement of commitment to the mayor, corporation and citizens of Alexandria before leaving for his Inauguration in New York:

Gentlemen: Although I ought not to conceal, yet I cannot describe, the painful emotions which I felt in being called upon to determine whether I would accept or refuse the Presidency of the United States....

All that remains for me is to commit myself and you to the care of that beneficent Being who, on a former occasion, happily brought us together after a long and distressing separation. Perhaps the same Gracious Providence will again indulge me.

But words fail me. Unutterable sentiments must be left to more expressive silence, while from an aching heart, I bid you my affectionate friends and neighbors farewell.

On April 20, 1789, in addressing the mayor, recorder, aldermen and Common Council of the City of Philadelphia, George Washington stated:

When I contemplate the interposition of Providence, as it was manifested in guiding us through the Revolution, in preparing us for the reception of a general government, and in conciliating the good will of the people of America towards one another after its adoption, I feel myself oppressed and almost overwhelmed with a sense of the divine munificence. I feel that nothing is due to my personal agency in all these complicated and wonderful events, except what can simply be attributed to the exertions of an honest zeal for the good of my country.

If I have distressing apprehensions, that I shall not be able to justify the too exalted expectations of my countrymen, I am supported under the pressure of such uneasy reflections by a confidence that the most Gracious Being, who has hitherto watched over the interests and averted the perils of the United States, will never suffer so fair an inheritance to become a prey to anarchy, despotism, or any other species of oppression.

A week prior to Washington's Inauguration, April 23, 1789, the schedule of events for that special day was published in the newspaper, Daily Advertiser:

On the morning of the day on which our illustrious President will be invested with his office, the bells will ring at nine o'clock, when the people may go up and in a solemn manner commit the new Government, with its important train of consequences, to the holy protection and blessings of the Most High. An early hour is prudently fixed for this peculiar act of devotion, and it is designed wholly for prayer.

On April 27, 1789, the Senate, and two days later the House, passed a resolution in Congress giving instructions with regard to the Inauguration of George Washington as the first President of the United States:

Resolved, That after the oath shall have been administered to the President, he, attended by the Vice President, and the members of the Senate, and House of Representatives, proceed to St. Paul's Chapel, to hear divine service, to be performed by the Chaplain of Congress already appointed.

The Annals of Congress give a record of the events on April 30, 1789, following President George Washington's Inauguration:

The President, the Vice President, the Senate, and House of Representatives, &c., then proceeded to St. Paul's Chapel, where divine service was performed by the Chaplains of Congress.

George Washington took the oath of office, Thursday, April 30, 1789, on the balcony of Federal Hall, in New York City, with his hand upon an open Bible. In addition to the Presidential Oath of Office, as prescribed in the Constitution, Washington added a phrase which, though not mandatory, has been used by every President since:

So help me, God.

Following the ringing of church bells, explosion of artillery and deafening applause, President George Washington proceeded to Federal Hall, at Wall and Nassau Streets, to deliver his Inaugural Address to both Houses of Congress.

It would be peculiarly improper to omit, in this first official act, my fervent supplications to that Almighty Being who rules over the universe, who presides in the councils of nations and whose providential aids can supply every human defect, that His benediction may consecrate to the liberties and happiness of the people of the United States a Government instituted by themselves for these essential purposes; and may enable every instrument employed in its administration to execute with success, the functions allotted to his charge.

In tendering this homage to the Great Author of every public and private good, I assure myself that it expresses your sentiments not less than my own; nor those of my fellow-citizens at large, less than either. No people can be bound to acknowledge and adore the Invisible Hand which conducts the affairs of men more than the people of the United States.

Every step by which they have advanced to the character of an independent nation seems to have been distinguished by some token of providential agency; and in the important revolution just accomplished in the system of their United government, the tranquil deliberations and voluntary consent of so many distinct communities, from which the event has resulted can not be compared with the means by which most governments have been established, without some return of pious gratitude, along with an humble anticipation of the future blessings which the past seem to presage.

These reflections, arising out of the present crisis, have forced themselves too strongly on my mind to be suppressed. You will join with me I trust in thinking, that there are none under the influence of which the proceedings of a new and free Government can more auspiciously commence. . . .

The foundations of our national policy will be laid in the pure and immutable principles of private morality, and the preeminence of free government be exemplified by all the attributes which can win the affections of its citizens and command the respect of the world.

I dwell on this prospect with every satisfaction which an ardent love for my country can inspire, since there is no truth more thoroughly established than that there exists in the economy and course of nature, an indissoluble union between virtue and happiness. . . .

We ought to be no less persuaded that the propitious smiles of Heaven can never be expected on a nation that disregards the eternal rules of order and right which Heaven itself has ordained; and since the preservation of the sacred fire of liberty and the destiny of the republican model of government are justly considered as deeply, perhaps finally, staked of the experiment intrusted to the hands of the American people. . . .

I shall take my present leave; but not without resorting once more to the Benign Parent of the Human Race, in humble supplication that, since He has been pleased to favor the American people with opportunities for deliberating in perfect tranquillity, and dispositions for deciding with unparalleled unanimity on a form of government for the security of their union and the advancement of their happiness, so His divine blessings may be equally conspicuous in the enlarged views, the temperate consultations and the wise measures on which the success of this Government must depend.

The University of Virginia, in its Washington Papers Project, has the manuscript fragments of President George Washington's discarded First Inaugural Address, dated April of 1789:

If there should be a single citizen of the United States, to whom the tenor of my life is so little known, that he could imagine me capable of being so smitten with the allurements of sensual gratification, the frivolities of ceremony or the baubles of ambition, as to be induced from such motives to accept a public appointment: I shall only lament his imperfect acquaintance with my heart, and leave him until another retirement (should Heaven spare my life for a little space) shall work a conviction of his error....

It will be recollected, that the Divine Providence hath not seen fit, that my blood should be transmitted or my name perpetuated by the endearing, though sometimes seducing channel of immediate offspring. I have no child for whom I could wish to make provision - no family to build in greatness upon my country's ruin....

If we had a secret resource of a nature unknown to our enemy, it was in the unconquerable resolution of our Citizens, the conscious rectitude of our cause, and a confident trust that we should not be forsaken by Heaven....

Such exertions of your talents will render your situations truly dignified and cannot fail of being acceptable in the sight of the Divinity....

If the blessings of Heaven showered thick around us should be spilled on the ground or converted to curses, through the fault of those for whom they were intended, it would not be the first instance of folly or perverseness in short-sighted mortals. The Blessed Religion revealed in the Word of God will remain an eternal and awful monument to prove that the best Institutions may be abused by human depravity; and that they may even, in some instances be made subservient to the vilest purposes....

I feel the consolatory joys of futurity in contemplating the immense deserts, yet untrodden by the foot of man, soon to become fair as the garden of God, soon to be animated by the activity of multitudes & soon to be made vocal with the praises of the Most High. Can it be imagined that so many peculiar advantages, of soil & of climate, for agriculture & for navigation were lavished in vain - or that this Continent was not created and reserved so long undiscovered as a Theatre, for those glorious displays of Divine Munificence, the salutary consequences of which shall flow to another Hemisphere & extend through the interminable series of ages? Should not our Souls exult in the prospect?...

After a consciousness that all is right within and an humble hope of approbation in Heaven - nothing can, assuredly, be so grateful to a virtuous man as the good opinion of his fellow citizens....

I most earnestly supplicate that Almighty God, to whose holy keeping I commend my dearest country, will never suffer so fair an inheritance to become a prey.

On May 5, 1789, the U. S. House of Representatives delivered the following address to President George Washington:

The Representatives of the People of the United States present their congratulations on the event by which your fellow-citizens have attested the pre-eminence of your merit. You have long held the first place in their esteem....

We feel with you the strongest obligations to adore the Invisible Hand which has led the American People through so many difficulties, to cherish a conscious responsibility for the destiny of republican liberty; and to seek the only sure means of preserving and recommending the precious deposit in a system of legislation founded on the principles of an honest policy....

All that remains is, that we join in our fervent supplications for the blessings of Heaven on our country, and that we add our own for the choicest of these blessings on the most beloved of her citizens.

On Friday, May 8, 1789, President George Washington replied to the U. S. House of Representatives:

Your very affectionate address produces emotions which I know not how to express....

For all beyond, I rely on the wisdom and patriotism of those with whom I am to co-operate, and a continuance of the blessings of Heaven on our beloved country.

On May 7, 1789, the U. S. Senate delivered the following address to President George Washington and Vice-President John Adams:

We, the Senate of the United States, return you our sincere thanks for your excellent speech delivered to both Houses of Congress....

When we contemplate the coincidence of circumstances and wonderful combination of causes which gradually prepared the people of this country for independence; when we contemplate the rise, progress, and termination of the late war, which gave them a name among the nations of the earth, we are with you unavoidably led to acknowledge and adore the Great Arbiter of the universe, by whom empires rise and fall. A review of the many signal instances of divine interposition in favor of this country, claims our most pious gratitude; and permit us, sir, to observe, that, among the great events which have led to the formation and establishment of a Federal Government, we esteem your acceptance of the office of the President as one of the most propitious and important....

We feel, sir, the force and acknowledge the justness of the observation that the foundation of our national policy should be laid in private morality. If individuals be not influenced by moral standards, it is vain to look for public virtue....

We commend you, sir, to the protection of Almighty God, earnestly beseeching him long to preserve a life so valuable and dear to the People of the United States, and that your administration may be prosperous to the nation and glorious to yourself.

On Monday, May 18, 1789, President George Washington replied to the U. S. Senate:

I thank you for your address, in which the most affectionate sentiments are expressed....

I now feel myself inexpressibly happy in a belief that Heaven, which has done so much for our infant nation, will not withdraw its Providential influence before our political felicity shall have been completed, and in a conviction that the Senate will at times co-operate in every measure which may tend to promote the welfare of this confederated Republic.

Thus supported by a firm trust in the Great Arbiter of the Universe, aided by the collected wisdom of the Union, and imploring the divine benediction on our joint exertions in the service of our country, I readily engage with you in the arduous but pleasing task of attempting to make a nation happy.

President Washington, either in writing or in person, addressed nearly all the churches in America: Episcopal, Congregational, Presbyterian, Society of Friends (Quaker), United Baptist, German Lutheran, German Reformed, Dutch Protestant, Dutch Reformed, Methodist, Swedenborgian, United Brethren (Moravian), Roman Catholic, and Hebrew. He attended not only the Episcopal Church, to which he was a member, but also the Presbyterian, Dutch Reformed, Lutheran and German Reformed Churches. To a gathering of Episcopalians, Washington declared:

That Government alone can be approved by Heaven, which promotes peace and secures protection to its Citizens in every thing that is dear and interesting to them....

On May 10, 1789, in addressing the General Committee representing the United Baptist Churches of Virginia, President Washington stated:

Gentlemen - I request that you will accept my best acknowledgments for your congratulations on my appointment to the first office in the nation. The kind manner in which you mention my past conduct equally claims the expression of my gratitude.

After we had, by the smiles of Heaven on our exertions, obtained the object for which we contended, I retired at the conclusion of the war, with an idea that my country would have no farther occasion for my services, and with the intention of never entering again into public life. But when the exigence of my country seemed to require me once more to engage in public affairs, an honest conviction of duty superseded my former resolution, and became my apology for deviating from the happy plan which I had adopted.

If I could have entertained the slightest apprehension that the Constitution framed by the Convention, where I had the honor to preside, might possibly endanger the religious rights of any ecclesiastical Society, certainly I would never have placed my signature to it;

if I could now conceive that the general Government might ever be so administered as to render liberty of conscience insecure, I beg you will be persuaded that no one would be more zealous than myself to establish effectual barriers against the horrors of spiritual tyranny, and every species of religious persecution; for you doubtless remember I have often expressed my sentiments, that any man, conducting himself as a good citizen, and being accountable to God alone for his religious opinions, ought to be protected in worshipping the Deity according to the dictates of his own conscience.

While I recollect with satisfaction that the religious society of which you are members, have been, throughout America, uniformly, and almost unanimously, the firm friends to civil liberty, and the preserving promoters of our glorious revolution; I cannot hesitate to believe that they will be the faithful supporters of a free, yet efficient general government. Under this pleasing reflection I rejoice to assure them that they may rely on my best wishes and endeavors to advance their prosperity.

Be assured, Gentlemen, that I entertain a proper sense of your fervent supplications to God for my temporal and eternal happiness.

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Churches in the United States, on May 26, 1789, wrote to President Washington:

We derive a presage even more flattering from the piety of your character. Public virtue is the most certain means of public felicity, and religion is the surest basis of virtue. We therefore esteem it a peculiar happiness to behold in our Chief Magistrate, a steady, uniform, avowed friend of the Christian religion; who has commenced his administration in rational and exalted sentiments of piety; and who, in his private conduct, adorns the doctrines of the gospel of Christ; and on the most public and solemn occasions, devoutly acknowledges the government of Divine Providence.

In May of 1789, President George Washington replied to the General Assembly of Presbyterian Churches in The United States:

Gentlemen: I receive with great sensibility the testimonial given by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, of the lively and unfeigned pleasure experienced by them on my appointment to the first office of the nation.

Although it will be my endeavor to avoid being elated by the too favorable opinion which your kindness for me may have induced you to express of the importance of my former conduct and the effect of my future services, yet, conscious of the disinterestedness of my motives, it is not necessary for me to conceal the satisfaction I have felt upon finding that my compliance with the call of my country and my dependence on the assistance of Heaven to support me in my arduous undertakings have, so far as I can learn, met the universal approbation of my countrymen.

While I reiterate the professions of my dependence upon Heaven as the source of all public and private blessings; I will observe that the general prevalence of piety, philanthropy, honesty, industry, and economy seems, in the ordinary course of human affairs, particularly necessary for advancing and conforming the happiness of our country.

While all men within our territories are protected in worshipping the Deity according to the dictates of their consciences; it is rationally to be expected from them in return, that they will be emulous of evincing the sanctity of their professions by the innocence of their lives and the beneficence of their actions; for no man who is profligate in his morals, or a bad member of the civil community, can possibly be a true Christian, or a credit to his own religious society.

I desire you to accept my acknowledgements for your laudable endeavors to render men sober, honest, and good citizens, and the obedient subjects of a lawful government, as well as for your prayers to Almighty God for His blessings on our common country, and the humble instrument which He has been pleased to make use of in the administration of its government.

On May 29, 1789, in a letter to the Methodist Episcopal Bishop of New York, President Washington wrote:

I return to you individually, and through you, to your society collectively in the United States, my thanks for the demonstrations of affection and the expressions of joy, offered in their behalf, on my late appointment.

It shall still be my endeavor to manifest by overt acts the purity of my inclinations for promoting the happiness of mankind, as well as the sincerity of my desires to contribute whatever may be in my power towards the preservation of the civil and religious liberties of the American people.

In pursuing this line of conduct, I hope, by the assistance of Divine Providence, not altogether to disappoint the confidence which you have been pleased to repose in me.

It always affords me satisfaction when I find a concurrence in sentiment and practice between all conscientious men in acknowledgements of homage to the great Governor of the Universe, and in professions of support to a just civil government.

After mentioning that I trust the people of every denomination, who demean themselves as good citizens, will have every occasion to be convinced that I shall always strive to prove a faithful and impartial patron of genuine, vital religion, I must assure you in particular, that I take in the kindest part the promise you make of presenting your prayers at the throne of grace for me, and that I likewise implore the divine benediction on yourselves and your religious community.

Soon after his inauguration, President Washington was seized with an illness which progressively grew worse. Enduring patiently for almost six weeks before the sickness subsided, he spoke with his physician, Dr. Samuel Bard:

Do not flatter me with vain hopes; I am not afraid to die, and therefore can bear the worst....Whether tonight, or twenty years hence, makes no difference; I know that I am in the Hands of a Good Providence.

In July of 1789, in writing to the Directors of the Society of the United Brethren for Propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, President Washington replied:

Gentlemen: I received with satisfaction the congratulations of your society, and of the Brethren's congregations in the United States of America. For you may be persuaded that the approbations and good wishes of such a peaceable and virtuous community cannot be indifferent to me.

You will also be pleased to accept my thanks for the treatise you presented, ("An account of the manner in which the Protestant Church of the Unitas Fratrum, or United Brethren, preach the Gospel and carry on their mission among the Heathen,") and be assured of my patronage in your laudable undertakings.

In proportion as the general government of the United States shall acquire strength by duration, it is probable they may have it in their power to extend a salutary influence to the aborigines in the extremities of their territory. In the meantime it will be a desirable thing, for the protection of the Union, to co-operate, as far as the circumstances may conveniently admit, with the disinterested endeavors of your Society to civilize and Christianize the Savages of the Wilderness.

Under these impressions, I pray Almighty God to have you always in His Holy keeping.

In response to the August 19, 1789, letter from the General Convention of Bishops, Clergy and Laity of the Protestant Episcopal Church of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia and North Carolina, President Washington replied:

Gentlemen: I sincerely thank you for your affectionate congratulations on my election to the chief magistracy of the United States. . . .

On this occasion it would ill become me to conceal the joy I have felt in perceiving the fraternal affection, which appears to increase every day among friends of genuine religion.

It affords edifying prospects, indeed, to see Christians of different denominations dwell together in more charity, and conduct themselves in respect to each other with a more Christian-like spirit than every they have done in any former age, or in any other nation.

I receive with the greater satisfaction your congratulations on the establishment of the new constitution of government, because I believe its mild yet efficient operations will tend to remove every remaining apprehension of those with whose opinions it may not entirely coincide, as well as to confirm the hopes of its numerous friends; and because the moderation, patriotism, and wisdom of the present federal Legislature seem to promise the restoration of order and our ancient virtues, the extension of genuine religion, and the consequent advancement of our respectability abroad, and of our substantial happiness at home.

I request, most reverend and respected Gentlemen, that you will accept my cordial thanks for your devout supplications to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe in behalf of me. May you, and the people whom you represent, be the happy subjects of the divine benedictions both here and hereafter.

On October 3, 1789, from the city of New York, President George Washington issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving:

Whereas it is the duty of all nations to acknowledge the Providence of Almighty God, to obey His will, to be grateful for his benefits, and humbly to implore His protection and favor; and

Whereas both Houses of Congress have by their joint Committee requested me "to recommend to the People of the United States a day of public thanksgiving and prayer to be observed by acknowledging with grateful hearts the many signal favors of Almighty God, especially by affording them an opportunity peaceably to establish a form of government for their safety and happiness;"

Now, therefore, I do recommend and assign Thursday, the twenty-sixth day of November next, to be devoted by the People of these United States to the service of that great and glorious Being, who is the beneficent Author of all the good that was, that is, or that will be;

That we may then all unite in rendering unto Him our sincere and humble thanks, for His kind care and protection of the People of this country previous to their becoming a Nation; for the signal and manifold mercies, and the favorable interpositions of His Providence, which we experienced in the course and conclusion of the late war; for the great degree of tranquillity, union, and plenty, which we have since enjoyed, for the peaceable and rational manner in which we have been enabled to establish constitutions of government for our safety and happiness, and particularly the national one now lately instituted, for the civil and religious liberty with which we are blessed, and the means we have of acquiring and diffusing useful knowledge; and in general for all the great and various favors which He hath been pleased to confer upon us.

And also that we may then unite in most humbly offering our prayers and supplications to the great Lord and Ruler of Nations, and beseech Him to pardon our national and other transgressions, to enable us all, whether in public or private stations, to perform our several and relative duties properly and punctually; to render our national government a blessing to all the People, by constantly being a government of wise, just and constitutional laws, discreetly and faithfully executed and obeyed; to protect and guide all Sovereigns and Nations (especially such as have shown kindness unto us) and to bless them with good government, peace, and concord; to promote the knowledge and practice of true religion and virtue, and the increase of science among them and Us; and generally to grant unto all Mankind such a degree of temporal prosperity as He alone knows to be best.

Given under my hand, at the city of New York, the 3rd of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine.
Go Washington.

On Sunday, October 4, 1789, while in New York, President
Washington entered in his diary:

Went to St. Paul's Chapel in forenoon.

On October 9, 1789, President George Washington wrote to the Synod of the Dutch Reformed Churches in North America, expressing:

While just government protects all in their religious rights, true religion affords to government its surest support.

On Sunday, October 18, 1789, while in New Haven, Connecticut, President Washington entered in his diary:

Went in the forenoon to the Episcopal Church, and in the afternoon to one of the Congregational Meeting-Houses.

In October of 1789, President Washington addressed the Quakers at their yearly meeting for Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, and the western part of Virginia and Maryland, stating:

Government being, among other purposes, instituted to protect the persons and consciences of men from oppression, it certainly is the duty of rulers, not only to abstain from it themselves, but according to their stations, to prevent it in others.

The liberty enjoyed by the People of these States of worshipping Almighty God agreeable to their consciences is not only among the choicest of their blessings, but also of their rights.

While men perform their social duties faithfully, they do all that society or the state can with propriety demand or expect; and remain responsible only to their Maker for the religion, or modes of faith, which they may prefer or profess.

Your principles and conduct are well known to me; and it is doing the people called Quakers no more than justice to say, (except their declining to share with others the burden of the common defense) there is no denomination among us, who are more exemplary and useful citizens.

On Sunday, October 25, 1789, while in Boston, Massachusetts, President George Washington entered in his diary:

Attended Divine Service at the Episcopal Church, whereof Doctor Samuel Parker is the Incumbent, in the forenoon, and the Congregational Church of Mr. Thatcher [Reverend Peter Thatcher] in the afternoon.

On October 28, 1789, President Washington wrote to the ministers and elders of the Massachusetts and New Hampshire churches of the First Presbytery of the Eastward, Newburyport:

I am persuaded that the path of true piety is so plain as to require but little political direction. To this consideration we ought to ascribe the absence of any regulation, respecting religion, from the Magna-Carta of our country. To the guidance of the ministers of the gospel this important object is, perhaps, more properly committed.

It will be your care to instruct the ignorant, and to reclaim the devious. And in the progress of morality and science, to which our Government will give every furtherance, we may confidently expect the advancement of true religion, and the completion of our happiness.

On Sunday, November 1, 1789, while in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, President Washington entered in his diary:

I went in the forenoon to the Episcopal Church, under the incumbency of a Mr. Ogden; in the afternoon to one of the Presbyterian or Congregational Churches, in which a Mr. Buckminster [Reverend Joseph Buckminster] preached.

On Sunday, November 8, 1789, while in Connecticut, President Washington entered in his diary:

It being contrary to law and disagreeable to the People of this State to travel on the Sabbath Day - and my horses, after passing through such intolerable roads, wanting to rest, I stayed at Perkins' tavern (which, by the by, is not a good one) all day - and a meeting-house being within a few rods of the door, I attended morning and evening service, and heard very lame discourses from a Mr. Pond [Reverend Enoch Pond].

On Sunday, November 15, 1789, while in New York, President Washington entered in his diary:

Went to St. Paul's Chapel in the forenoon.

On Sunday, November 22, 1789, while in New York, President Washington entered in his diary:

Went to St. Paul's Chapel in the forenoon - heard a charity sermon for the benefit of the Orphan's School of this city.

On Thursday, November 26, 1789, while in New York, President Washington entered in his diary:

Being the day appointed for a thanksgiving, I went to St. Paul's Chapel, though it was most inclement and stormy - but few people at church.

On January 8, 1790, in his First Annual Message to Congress, President Washington stated:

In resuming your consultations for the general good, you cannot but derive encouragement from the reflection that the measures of the last Session have been as satisfactory to your Constituents, as the novelty and difficulty of the work allowed you to hope.

Still further to realize their expectations and to secure the blessings which a Gracious Providence has placed with in our reach, will, in the course of the present important Session, call for the cool and deliberate exertion of your patriotism, firmness and wisdom.

Among the many interesting objects which will engage your attention that of providing for the common defense will merit particular regard. To be prepared for War is the most effectual means of preserving peace....

Knowledge is, in every country, the surest basis of public happiness.... to discriminate the spirit of liberty from that of licentiousness - cherishing the first, avoiding the last.

On Sunday, January 10, 1790, while in New York, President Washington entered in his diary:

Went to St. Paul's Chapel in the forenoon.

On January 11, 1790, the U. S. Senate addressed President Washington:

Every exertion on our part shall be made to realize and secure to our country those blessings which a gracious Providence has placed within her reach. We are persuaded that one of the most effectual means of preserving peace is to be prepared for war.

On January 12, 1790, the U. S. House of Representatives addressed President Washington:

Nothing can be more gratifying to the Representatives of a free people than the reflection that their labors are rewarded by the approbation of their fellow-citizens. Under this impression we shall make every exertion to realize their expectations, and to secure to them those blessings which Providence has placed within their reach.

In January of 1790, President George Washington wrote to the Hebrew Congregations of Philadelphia, Newport, Charlestown and Richmond:

The liberal sentiment towards each other which marks every political and religious denomination of men in this country stands unrivalled in the history of nations....

The power and goodness of the Almighty were strongly manifested in the events of our late glorious revolution and His kind interpositions in our behalf has been no less visible in the establishment on our present equal government.

In war He directed the sword and in peace He has ruled in our councils. My agency in both has been guided by the best intentions, and a sense of the duty which I owe my country....

May the same temporal and eternal blessings which you implore for me, rest upon your congregations.

On March 15, 1790, President George Washington wrote to the Roman Catholics of the nation:

I feel that my conduct, in war and in peace, has met with more general approbation than could reasonably have been expected and I find myself disposed to consider that fortunate circumstance, in a great degree, resulting from the able support and extraordinary candour of my fellow-citizens of all denominations. . . .

America, under the smiles of a Divine Providence, the protection of a good government, and the cultivation of manners, morals, and piety, cannot fail of attaining an uncommon degree of eminence, in literature, commerce, agriculture, improvements at home and respectability abroad. . . .

I presume that your fellow-citizens will not forget the patriotic part which you took in the accomplishment of their Revolution, and the establishment of their government; or the important assistance which they received from a nation in which the Roman Catholic faith is professed. . . .

May the members of your society in America, animated alone by the pure spirit of Christianity, and still conducting themselves as the faithful subjects of our free government, enjoy every temporal and spiritual felicity.

[Note: Article regarding St. Paul's Chapel in New York City, published in the Boston Globe on September 26, 2001, p. A12. "STILL STANDING-A chapel spared stirs talk of miracle," By David Abel, Globe Staff, NEW YORK - All around it, once-mighty buildings are either in a heap of rubble, charred black and windowless, or still smoldering, with smoke rising through giant gashes scarring their facades and wrecking their foundations. Yet somehow St. Paul's Chapel, Manhattan's oldest public building and the house of worship George Washington visited in 1789 after his inauguration at nearby Federal Hall, is intact. A block away from the World Trade Center, the small, ornate chapel doesn't even have a broken window. When the Rev. Lyndon F. Harris began traversing the maze of checkpoints set up after the Sept. 11 attack, he was certain his 235-year-old chapel would be in ruins. "My heart was beating so loudly, you could hear it in my chest," said Harris, who was nearly crushed by falling rubble when he rushed to help in the rescue operation after the first jet hit the Twin Towers. He imagined the destruction of some of the earliest relics of American history that have remained in St. Paul's over the years - the oldest known oil painting depicting the Great Seal of the United States; the 200-year-old, cut-glass chandeliers from Waterford, Ireland; and an array of monuments and tombstones depicting and commemorating some of the country's earliest heroes. Early in the morning on Sept. 12, police escorted him to the chapel, and Harris still can't believe his eyes. "It's hard to say this isn't a miracle, the fruit of some divine intervention," he said. "I think it stands as a beacon of hope and a metaphor of good standing in the face of evil." Other houses of worship were not so lucky. A few blocks away, among the mounds of twisted steel and pulverized concrete, is what remains of St. Nicholas Greek Orthodox Church. What happened to St. Nicholas has left many of St. Paul's nearly 200 congregants uneasy. "I don't know why it was us and not them," said Nancy Nind, 55, a parishioner at St. Paul's for the past three decades. "I think our fate means we have a mission to do something." Part of that mission, she said, is to help out as much as possible with the rescue operation. In addition to serving as a depot for air filters, medical supplies, and bottled water, the chapel's pews over the past two weeks have been beds for droves of police officers, firefighters, and soldiers taking a break from shifts often lasting as long as 20 hours. Hundreds of rescue workers have been fed in the chapel. "It's amazing how peaceful this place can be, given how much is going on around it," said David Capellini, a police officer who had walked by St. Paul's for years without entering. "This church will always mean something to me, especially now that I know its history." He took solace in a prayer by Washington, etched in bronze a few feet away. It begins: "Almighty God we make our earnest prayer that thou wilt keep the United States in thy holy protection." In a speech before thousands of New Yorkers at a prayer service on Sunday at Yankee Stadium, Mayor Rudolph Giuliani described the unblemished brownstones and Ionic pillars of St. Paul's as the "miracle of September 11." "The presence of that chapel, standing defiant and serene amid the ruins, sends an eloquent message about the strength and resilience of the people of New York City and the people of America," he said. That's also how Roy Henry, the church's 68-year-old head of security, felt when he first returned to St. Paul's after running for his life from the chapel during the attack. Chunks of steel, a blizzard of paper, and assorted rubble were scattered all around the chapel. Ash several inches thick coated the Georgian masonry and drifted through an open window, dusting much of the sanctuary inside. But everything was intact. "Just look around," Henry said. "If this isn't a miracle, I don't know what is."]

On Wednesday, March 24, 1790, President Washington, accompanied by Mrs. Washington and their two adopted children, attended the consecration of the new Trinity Episcopal Church in New York. The ceremony was officiated by Bishop Samuel Provoost (1742-1815), who was acclaimed for having taken a bold stand for American independence during the Revolution. On Sunday, April 11, 1790, President Washington entered in his diary:

Went to Trinity Church in the forenoon, and wrote several private letters in the afternoon.

On Sunday, April 25, 1790, while in New York, President Washington entered in his diary:

Went to Trinity Church, and wrote letters home after dinner.

On Sunday, May 2, 1790, while in New York, President Washington entered in his diary:

Went to Trinity Church in the forenoon - written letters on private business in the afternoon.

On Sunday, June 27, 1790, while in New York, President Washington entered in his diary:

Went to Trinity Church in the forenoon - and employed myself in writing business in the afternoon.

On Sunday, July 4, 1790, while in New York, President Washington entered in his diary:

Went to Trinity Church in the forenoon. This day being the Anniversary of the Declaration of Independency the celebration of it was put off until to-morrow.

On Monday, July 5, 1790, while in New York, President Washington entered in his diary:

About one o'clock a sensible oration was delivered in St. Paul's Chapel by Rev. Brockholst Livingston, on the occasion of the day.

On August 17, 1790, in an address to the Hebrew Congregation in Newport, Rhode Island, President Washington stated:

It is now no more that toleration is spoken of as if it were the indulgence of one class of people that another enjoyed the exercise of their inherent natural rights, for, happily, the Government of the United States, which gives to bigotry no sanction, to persecution no assistance, requires only that they who live under its protection should demean themselves as good citizens in giving it on all occasions their effectual support....

May the children of the stock of Abraham who dwell in this land continue to merit and enjoy the good will of the other inhabitants - while every one shall sit in safety under his own vine and fig tree and there shall be none to make him afraid.

May the Father of all mercies scatter light, and not darkness, upon our paths, and make us all in our several vocations useful here, and in His own due time and way everlastingly happy.

In writing to the Hebrew Congregations of the city of Savannah, Georgia, President George Washington stated:

Happily the people of the United States have in many instances exhibited examples worthy of imitation, the salutary influence of which will doubtless extend much farther if gratefully enjoying those blessings of peace which (under the favor of Heaven) have been attained by fortitude in war, they shall conduct themselves with reverence to the Deity and charity toward their fellow-creatures

May the same wonder-working Deity, who long since delivering the Hebrews from their Egyptian Oppressors planted them in the promised land - whose Providential Agency has lately been conspicuous in establishing these United States as an independent Nation - still continue to water them with the dews of Heaven and to make the inhabitants of every denomination participate in the temporal and spiritual blessings of that people whose God is Jehovah.

On December 11, 1790, the U. S. House of Representatives addressed President Washington:

American Quotations.txt

The blessings resulting from the smiles of Heaven on our agriculture, the rise of public credit, with the further advantages promised by it, and the fertility of resources which are found so little burdensome to the community, fully authorize our mutual congratulations on the present occasion.

On December 29, 1790, from Philadelphia, President Washington wrote to the Chiefs and Counselors of the Seneca Nation:

You have said in your Speech "That the game is going away from among you, and that you thought it the design of the Great Spirit that you should till the ground, but before you speak upon this subject, you want to know whether the United States meant to leave you any land to till?"

You now know that all the lands secured to you by the Treaty of Fort Stanwix, excepting such parts as you may since have fairly sold are yours, and that only your own acts can convey them away; speak therefore your wishes on the subject of tilling the ground. The United States will be happy to afford you every assistance in the only business which will add to your numbers and happiness.

While serving his Presidential term in New York, President Washington sent instructions to one of the overseers of his estate:

I shall not close this letter without exhorting you to refrain from spirituous liquors; they will prove your ruin if you do not. Consider how little a drunken man differs from a beast; the latter is not endowed with reason, the former deprives himself of it; and when that is the case, acts like a brute, annoying and disturbing every one around him; nor is this all, nor, as it respects himself, the worst of it.

By degrees it renders a person feeble, and not only unable to serve others but to help himself; and being an act of his own, he falls from a state of usefulness into contempt, and at length suffers, if not perishes, in penury and want.

Don't let this be your case. Show yourself more of a man and a Christian than to yield to so intolerable a vice, which cannot, I am certain (to the greatest lover of liquor), give more pleasure to sip in the poison (for it is no better) than the consequence of it in bad behavior at the moment, and the more serious evils produced by it afterwards, must give pain.

I am your Friend, George Washington.

On July 3, 1791, while in Lancaster, Pennsylvania, President Washington entered in his diary:

There being no Episcopal minister present in this place, I went to hear morning service performed in the Dutch Reformed Church - which, being in that language not a word of which I understood, I was in no danger of becoming a proselyte to its religion by the eloquence of the preacher.

On July 28, 1791, from Philadelphia, President Washington wrote to Marquis de Lafayette:

I assure you I have often contemplated, with great anxiety, the danger to which you are personally exposed....

To a philanthropic mind the happiness of 24 millions of people cannot be indifferent; and by an American, whose country in the hour of distress received such liberal aid from the French, the disorders and incertitude of that Nation are to be particularly lamented.

We must, however, place a confidence in that Providence who rules great events, trusting that out of confusion He will produce order, and, notwithstanding the dark clouds which may threaten at present, that right will ultimately be established....

On the 6 of this month I returned from a tour through the southern States, which had employed me for more than three months. In the course of this journey I have been highly gratified in observing the flourishing state of the Country, and the good dispositions of the people.

Industry and economy have become very fashionable in these parts, which were formerly noted for the opposite qualities, and the labours of man are assisted by the Blessings of Providence.

On September 8, 1791, President Washington wrote to General and Mrs. Knox on the death of their son, who had been named for him:

He that gave, you know, has the right to take away. His ways are wise - they are inscrutable - and irresistible.

On September 19, 1791, just prior to the French Revolution, King Louis XVI sent a note to President Washington and the U. S. Congress:

Very Dear Great Friends and Allies:

We make it our duty to inform you that we have accepted the constitution which has been presented to us in the name of the nation, and according to which France will be henceforth governed.

We do not doubt that you take an interest in an event so important to our Kingdom and to us, and it is with real pleasure we take this occasion to renew to you assurances of the sincere friendship we bear you. Whereupon we pray God to have you, very dear great friends and allies, in His just and holy keeping.

Written at Paris the 19th of September, 1791.

Your good friend and ally, LOUIS.
Montmorin.

On Tuesday, October 25, 1791, in his Third Annual Message to Congress, President George Washington stated:

Numerous as are the Providential blessings which demand our grateful acknowledgements, the abundance with which another year has again rewarded the industry of the husbandman is too important to escape recollection....

A system corresponding with the mild principles of religion and philanthropy toward an unenlightened race of men, whose happiness materially depends on the conduct of the United States, would be as honorable to the national character as conformable to the dictates of sound policy....

The establishment of competent magazines and arsenals and the fortifications of such places as are peculiarly important and vulnerable naturally present themselves to consideration. The safety of the United States under divine protection ought to rest on the basis of systematic and solid arrangements, exposed as little as possible to the hazards of fortuitous circumstances.

On October 27, 1791, the U. S. House of Representatives addressed President Washington:

In receiving your address at the opening of the present session the House of Representatives have taken an ample share in the feelings inspired by the actual prosperity and flattering prospects of our country, and whilst with becoming gratitude to Heaven we ascribe this happiness to the true source from which it flows, we behold with an animating pleasure the degree in which the Constitution and Laws of the United States have been instrumental in dispensing it.

On October 28, 1791, the U. S. Senate addressed President Washington:

The Senate of the United States have received with the highest satisfaction the assurances of public prosperity contained in your speech to both Houses. The multiplied blessings of Providence have not escaped our notice or failed to excite our gratitude.

On March 11, 1792, from Philadelphia, President Washington wrote to John Armstrong:

I am sure that never was a people who had more reason to acknowledge a Divine interposition in their affairs than those of the United States; and I should be pained to believe that they have forgotten that Agency, which was so often manifested during our Revolution, or that they failed to consider the omnipotence of that God who is alone able to protect them.

On May 20, 1792, from Mount Vernon, President Washington wrote to James Madison:

I take my leave of them as a public man; and in bidding them adieu (retaining no other concern than such as will arise from fervent wishes for the prosperity of my Country) I take the liberty at my departure from civil, as I formerly did at my military exit, to invoke a continuation of the Blessings of Providence upon it.

On June 10, 1792, from Philadelphia, President Washington wrote to Marquis de Lafayette:

And to the Care of that Providence, whose interposition and protection we have so often experienced, do I cheerfully commit you and your nation, trusting that He will bring order out of confusion, and finally place things upon the ground on which they ought to stand.

On Sunday, August 26, 1792, from Mount Vernon, President Washington wrote to Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury:

How unfortunate would it be if a fabric so goodly, erected under so many Providential circumstances, and in its first stages, have acquired such respectability, should from diversity of sentiments...be harrowing our vitals in such a manner as to have brought us to the verge of dissolution.

On Sunday, August 26, 1792, from Mount Vernon, President Washington replied to Edmund Randolph's encouragement for him to accept re-election:

But as the All-wise Disposer of events has hitherto watched over our steps, I trust that, in the important one I may soon be called upon to take, He will mark the course so plainly that I cannot mistake the way.

On October 20, 1792, from Philadelphia, President Washington wrote to Sir Edward Newenham:

Of all the animosities which have existed among mankind, those which are caused by a difference of sentiments in religion appear to be the most inveterate and distressing, and ought most to be deprecated. I was in hopes that the enlightened and liberal policy which has marked the present age would at least have reconciled Christians of every denomination so far that we should never again see their religious disputes carried to such a pitch as to endanger the peace of society.

On Tuesday, November 6, 1792, in his Fourth Annual Message to Congress, President George Washington stated:

Various temporary laws will expire during the present session. Among these, that which regulates trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes will merit particular notice.

The result of your common deliberations hitherto, will, I trust, be productive of solid and durable advantages to our constituents; such as, by conciliating more and more their ultimate suffrage, will tend to strengthen and confirm their attachment to that Constitution of Government, upon which, under Divine Providence, materially depend their union, their safety, and their happiness.

On November 12, 1792, in a reply to the U.S. House of Representatives, President George Washington stated:

This is new proof of that enlightened solicitude for the establishment and confirmation of public order which, embracing a zealous regard for the principles of true liberty, has guided the deliberations of the House of Representatives, a perseverance in which can alone secure, under the Divine Blessing, the real and permanent felicity of our common country.

On January 27, 1793, to the congregation of the New Church in Baltimore, President Washington wrote:

We have abundant reason to rejoice that in this Land the light of truth and reason has triumphed over the power of bigotry and superstition, and that every person may here worship God according to the dictates of his own heart.

In this enlightened Age and in this Land of equal liberty it is our boast that a man's religious tenets will not forfeit the protection of the laws nor deprive him of the right of attaining and holding the highest offices that are known in the United States.

On Monday, March 4, 1793, in his Second Inaugural Address, after ending the Presidential oath of office with the phrase he added, "So help me God," President George Washington stated:

I am again called upon by the voice of my country to execute the functions of its Chief Magistrate. When the occasion proper for it shall arrive, I shall endeavor to express the high sense I entertain of this distinguished honor, and of the confidence which has been reposed in me by the people of the united America.

Previous to the execution of any official act of the President the Constitution requires an oath of office. This oath I am now about to take and in your presence: That if it shall be found during my administration of the Government I have in any instance violated willingly or knowingly the injunctions thereof, I may (besides incurring constitutional punishment) be subject to the upbraidings of all who are now witness of the present solemn ceremony.

On December 3, 1793, in his Fifth Annual Address to Congress, President George Washington stated:

I humbly implore that Being on whose will the fate of nations depends to crown with success our mutual endeavors for the general happiness.

On December 6, 1793, the U. S. House of Representatives addressed President Washington:

We join with you in imploring that Being on whose will the fate of nations depends to crown with success our mutual endeavors.

On December 7, 1793, in a reply to the U. S. House of Representatives, President George Washington stated:

With every reason, then, it may be expected that your deliberations, under Divine Blessing, will be matured to the honor and happiness of the United States.

On December 31, 1793, President Washington wrote to William

White, Bishop of Pennsylvania, following an epidemic of yellow fever:

It has been my intention ever since my return to the city, to contribute my mite towards the relief of the most needy inhabitants of it...for the use of the fatherless children and widows, made so by the late calamity...to render the little I can, without ostention or mention of my name.

On February 24, 1794, President Washington wrote to the Rev. James Muir, pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Alexandria, Virginia, regarding his annual contribution towards the support of the Orphan School:

I have received your letter of the 12th instant, and will direct my manager, Mr. Pearce, to pay my annual donation for the education of orphan children, or the children of indigent parents, who are unable to be at the expense themselves.

On Sunday, May 25, 1794, from Philadelphia, President Washington wrote to his estate manager, Mr. William Pearce, regarding to news of a drought:

At disappointments and losses which are the effects of Providential acts, I never repine; because I am sure the All-wise Disposer of events knows better than we do what is best for us, or what we deserve.

On September 25, 1794, in a Proclamation made during the Whiskey Rebellion in western Pennsylvania, President George Washington stated:

Resolved, in perfect reliance on that gracious Providence which so signally displays its goodness towards this country to reduce the refractory to a due subordination to the law...

To call to mind that, as the people of the United States have been permitted, under Divine favor, in perfect freedom, after solemn deliberation, and in an enlightened age, to elect their own government, so will their gratitude for this inestimable blessing be best distinguished by firm exertions to maintain the Constitution and the laws.

On October 5, 1794, while in Carlisle, Pennsylvania in connection with the Whiskey Rebellion, President Washington entered in his diary;

Went to the Presbyterian Meeting and heard Doctor Davidson preach a political sermon, recommendatory of order and good government; and the excellence of that of the United States.

On November 19, 1794, following the Whiskey Rebellion, President Washington stated in his Sixth Annual Address to Congress:

Fellow Citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives;

We call to mind the gracious indulgence of Heaven, by which the American People became a nation; when we survey the general prosperity of our country, and look forward to the riches, power, and happiness, to which it seems destined....

Let us unite, therefore, in imploring the Supreme Ruler of Nations, to spread His holy protection over these United States, to turn the machinations of the wicked to the confirming of our constitution; to enable us at times to...put invasion to flight; to perpetuate to our country that prosperity, which His goodness has already conferred, and to verify the anticipation of this government being a safe guard to human rights.

On November 28, 1794, the U. S. House of Representatives addressed President George Washington:

In nothing can we more cordially unite with you than in imploring the Supreme Ruler of Nations to multiply His blessings on these United States.

On January 1, 1795, President George Washington issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Public Thanksgiving and Prayer:

When we review the calamities which afflict so many other nations, the present condition of the United States affords much matter of consolation and satisfaction. Our exemptions hitherto from foreign war, and increasing prospect of the continuance of that exemption, the great degree of internal tranquility we have enjoyed...the happy course of our public affairs in general, the unexampled prosperity of all classes of our citizens, are circumstances which peculiarly mark our situation with indications of the Divine Beneficence towards us.

In such a state of things, it is in an especial manner our duty as a people, with devout reverence and affectionate gratitude, to acknowledge our many and great obligations to Almighty God, and to implore Him to continue and confirm the blessings we experience.

Deeply penetrated with this sentiment, I, George Washington, President of the United States, do recommend to all religious societies and denominations, and to all persons whomsoever within the United States, to set apart and observe Thursday, the 19th day of February next, as a day of public thanksgiving and prayer, and on that day to meet together and render sincere and hearty thanks to the great Ruler of nations for the manifold and signal mercies which distinguish our lot as a nation; particularly for the possession of constitutions of government which unite and, by their union, establish liberty with order; for the preservation of our peace, foreign and domestic; for the reasonable control which has been given to a spirit of disorder...and generally for the prosperous condition of our affairs, public and private, and at the same time humbly and fervently beseech the kind Author of these blessings graciously to prolong them to us; to imprint on our hearts a deep and solemn sense of our obligations to Him for them; to teach us rightly to estimate their immense value; to preserve us from the arrogance of prosperity, and from hazarding the advantages we enjoy by delusive pursuits, to dispose us to merit the continuance of His favours by not abusing them, by our gratitude for them, and by a corresponding conduct as citizens and as men to render this country more and more a safe and propitious asylum for the unfortunate of other countries; to extend among us true and useful knowledge; to diffuse and establish habits of sobriety, order, and morality and piety, and finally to impart all the blessings we possess or ask for ourselves to the whole family of mankind.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand.

Done at the city of Philadelphia the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five and of the independence of the United States of America the nineteenth.

(signed) George Washington.

On Tuesday, December 8, 1795, in his Seventh Annual Message to Congress, President Washington stated:

I trust I do not deceive myself while I indulge the persuasion that I have never met you at any period when, more than at present, the situation of our public affairs has afforded just cause for mutual congratulation, and for inviting you to join with me in profound gratitude to the Author of All Good, for the numerous and extraordinary blessings we enjoy. . . .

Every part of the Union displays indications of rapid and various improvement; and, with burdens so light as scarcely to be perceived; with resources fully adequate to our present exigencies; with governments founded on the genuine principles of rational liberty; and with mild and wholesome laws; is it too much to say, that our country exhibits a spectacle of national happiness, never surpassed, if ever before equalled?

Placed in a situation every way so auspicious, motives of commanding force impel us, with sincere acknowledgement to Heaven, and pure love to our country, to unite our efforts to preserve, prolong, and improve, our immense advantages.

On December 11, 1795, the U. S. Senate, led by Vice-President John Adams, addressed President Washington:

Circumstances thus every way auspicious demand our gratitude and sincere acknowledgements to Almighty God.

On December 12, 1795, in a reply to the U. S. Senate, President George Washington stated:

I derive peculiar satisfaction from your concurrence with me in the expressions of gratitude to Almighty God, which a review of the auspicious circumstances that distinguish our happy country have excited.

On December 16, 1795, the U. S. House of Representatives addressed President Washington:

As the Representatives of the people of the United States, we can not but participate in the strongest sensibility to every blessing which they enjoy, and cheerfully join with you in profound gratitude to the Author of All Good for the numerous and extraordinary blessings which He has conferred on our favored country.

On December 17, 1795, in a reply to the U.S. House of Representatives, President George Washington stated:

The sentiments we have mutually expressed of profound gratitude to the source of those numerous blessings, the Author of All Good, are pledges of our obligations to unite our sincere and zealous endeavors, as the instruments of Divine Providence, to preserve and perpetuate them.

On January 1, 1796, President George Washington answered a letter from P.A. Adet, the minister plenipotentiary of the French Republic:

In delivering to you these sentiments I express not my own feelings only, but those of my fellow-citizens, in relation to the commencement, the progress, and the issue of the French Revolution, and they will cordially join with me in purest wishes to the Supreme Being that the citizens of our sister Republic, our magnanimous allies, may soon enjoy in peace that liberty which they have purchased at so great a price, and all the happiness which liberty can bestow.

On May 15, 1796, from Philadelphia, President Washington wrote to the Emperor of Germany:

I take the liberty of writing this private letter to your Majesty. . . . I retain a strong and cordial sense of the services rendered to them by the Marquis De La Fayette; and my friendship for him has been constant and sincere. . . .

Permit me only to submit to your Majesty's consideration, whether his long imprisonment, and the confiscation of his estate, and the indigence and dispersion of his family, and the painful anxieties incident to all these circumstances, do not form an assemblage of sufferings, which recommend him to the mediation of Humanity?

Allow me, Sir! on this occasion to be its organ; and to entreat that he may be permitted to come to this country on such conditions and under such restrictions, as your Majesty may think it expedient to prescribe. . . .

May the Almighty and Merciful Sovereign of the Universe keep your Majesty under His protection and guidance.

On August 29, 1796, from the city of Philadelphia, President Washington dictated a "Talk" to the Cherokee Nation:

Beloved Cherokees, The wise men of the United States meet together once a year, to consider what will be for the good of all their people. . . . I have thought that a meeting of your wise men once or twice a year would be alike useful to you. . . . I now send my best wishes to the Cherokees, and pray the Great Spirit to preserve them.

On September 19, 1796, in his Farewell Address, President George Washington said:

Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to the grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that Heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence; that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual; that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained - that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue....

The name of AMERICAN, which belongs to you, in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of Patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same Religion, Manners, Habits, and political Principles....

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, Religion and Morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of Patriotism, who should labor to subvert these great Pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of Men and Citizens.

The mere Politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked where is the security for prosperity, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths, which are the instruments of investigation in the Courts of Justice?

And let us with caution indulge the supposition, that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

'Tis substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule indeed extends with more or less force to every species of Free Government. Who that is a sincere friend to it, can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?...

Observe good faith and justice towards all Nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and Morality enjoin this conduct; and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it?... Can it be, that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a Nation with its virtue?...

Though, in reviewing the incidents of my Administration, I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend.

I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the Mansions of rest.

Of note are other passages from Washington's Farewell Address, delivered September 19, 1796:

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties.... One of the expedients of Party to acquire influence, within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other Districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations.

And of fatal tendency... to put, in the place of the delegated will of the Nation, the will of a party; - often a small but artful and enterprising minority.... They are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men will be enabled to subvert the Power of the People and to usurp for the themselves the reins of Government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion....

One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the Constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system, and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown.... It is indeed little else than a name, where the Government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction....

I have already intimated to you the danger of Parties in the State.... Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of Party, generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its roots in the strongest passions of the human Mind. It exists under different shapes in all Governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but, in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness and is truly their worst enemy....

Domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissention, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism.

But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries, which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an Individual... [who] turns this disposition to the purposes of his own elevation, on the ruins of Public Liberty....

Ill founded jealousies and false alarms, kindles the animosity of one part against another, foment occasionally riot and insurrection. - It opens the doors to foreign influence and corruption, which find a facilitated access to the Government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country, are subjected to the policy and will of another....

It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free Country should inspire caution in those entrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective Constitutional spheres; avoiding in the exercise of the Powers of one department to encroach upon another.

The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power, and proneness to abuse it, which predominates the human heart is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position.

The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power; by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the Guardian of the Public Weal against invasions by the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern; some of them in our country and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to instituted them.

If in the opinion of the People, the distribution or modification of the Constitutional powers be in any way particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield....

Avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions in time of Peace to discharge the Debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear....

In the execution of such a plan nothing is more essential than that permanent... attachments for other [countries] should be excluded.... The Nation, which indulges towards another... an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave.... It makes the... Nation subservient to projects of hostility instigated by pride, ambition and other sinister and pernicious motives.

A passionate attachment of one Nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favourite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exist, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and Wars of the latter, without adequate inducement or justification: It leads also to concessions to the favorite Nation of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the Nation making the concessions; by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill-will, and a disposition to retaliate, in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld:

And it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens... facility to betray, or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity: gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent Patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public Councils! Such attachments of a small or weak, towards a great and powerful Nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, (I conjure you to believe me fellow citizens) the jealousy of a free people to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of Republican Government.

Real Patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

The Great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign Nations, is in extending our commercial relations to have with them as little political connection as possible....

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none....Hence therefore it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties....Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European Ambition, Rivalship, Interest, Humour or Caprice?

'Tis our true policy to steer clear of permanent Alliances with any portion of the foreign world....(I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy)....

Taking care always to keep ourselves, by suitable establishments, on a respectably defensive posture....'Tis folly in one Nation to look for disinterested favors from another...it must pay with a portion of its Independence for whatever it may accept....

There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favours from Nation to Nation. 'Tis an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard....

In offering to you, my Countrymen these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression, I could wish...to warn against the mischiefs of foreign Intrigue.

On November 28, 1796, from Philadelphia, President Washington wrote to his adopted son, George Washington Parke Custis:

The assurances you give me of applying diligently to your studies, and fulfilling those obligations which are enjoined by your Creator and due to His creatures, are highly pleasing and satisfactory to me. I rejoice in it on two accounts; first, as it is the sure means of laying the foundation of your own happiness, and rendering you, if it should please God to spare your life, a useful member of society hereafter; and secondly, that I may, if I live to enjoy the pleasure, reflect that I have been, in some degree, instrumental in affecting these purposes.

On Wednesday, December 7, 1796, in his Eighth Annual Address to Congress, President Washington stated:

In recurring to the internal situation of our country, since I had last the pleasure to address you, I find ample reason for a renewed expression of that gratitude to the Ruler of the Universe, which a continued series of prosperity has so often and so justly called forth. . . .

A reinforcement of the existing provisions for discharging our public debt was mentioned in my address at the opening of the last session. Some preliminary steps were taken towards it, the maturing of which will, no doubt, engage your zealous attention during the present. I will only add, that it will afford me a heartfelt satisfaction to concur in such further measures as will ascertain to country the prospect of a speedy extinguishment of the debt. Posterity may have cause to regret, if, from any motive, intervals of tranquillity are left unimproved for accelerating this valuable end. . . .

The situation in which I now stand, for the last time, in the midst of the Representatives of the People of the United States, naturally recalls the period when the administration of the present form of government commenced; and I cannot omit the occasion, to congratulate you and my country, on the success of the experiment; nor to repeat my fervent supplications to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, and Sovereign Arbiter of Nations, that his Providential care may still be extended to the United States; that the virtue and happiness of the People, may be preserved; and that the Government, which they have instituted, for the protection of their liberties, may be perpetual.

On December 10, 1796, the U. S. Senate, led by Vice-President John Adams, addressed President Washington:

We thank you, sir, for your faithful and detailed exposure of the existing situation of our country, and we sincerely join in sentiments of gratitude to an overruling Providence for the distinguished share of public prosperity and private happiness which the people of the United States so peculiarly enjoy.

On December 15, 1796, the U. S. House Representatives addressed President Washington:

To exalt our minds to a more fervent and grateful sense of piety toward Almighty God for the beneficence of His providence, by which its administration has been hitherto so remarkably distinguished. . . .

May your own virtues and a nation's prayers obtain the happiest sunshine for the decline of your days and the choicest of future blessings.

On December 16, 1796, in a reply to the U.S. House of Representatives, President Washington stated:

The virtue and wisdom of my successors, joined with the patriotism and intelligence of the citizens who compose the other branches of Government, I firmly trust will lead them to the adoption of measures which, by the beneficence of Providence, will give stability to our system of government, add to its success, and secure to ourselves and to posterity that liberty which is to all of us so dear.

On December 19, 1796, from Philadelphia, President George Washington wrote to his adopted son, George Washington Parke Custis:

But as you are well acquainted with my sentiments on this subject, and you know how anxious all your friends are to see you enter upon the grand theatre of life, with the advantages of a finished education, a highly cultivated mind, and a proper sense of your duties to God and man, I shall only add one sentiment more before I close this letter (which, as I have others to write, will hardly be in time for the mail), and that is, to pay due respect and obedience to your tutors, and affectionate reverence to the president of the college, whose character merits your highest regards.

On March 2, 1797, in a letter to the rector, church wardens and vestrymen of the United Episcopal Churches of Christ and St. Peter's of Philadelphia, George Washington wrote:

Believing that Government alone can be approved by Heaven, which promotes peace and secures protection to its Citizens in every thing that is dear and interesting to them, it has been the great object of my administration to insure those invaluable ends.

On March 3, 1797, from Philadelphia, George Washington wrote to Jonathan Trumbull:

I can never believe that Providence, which has guided us so long, and through such a labyrinth, will withdraw its protection at this Crisis.

Soon following his retirement from the presidency, Washington received a letter from Episcopal Bishop William White, Rev. Ashabel Green, D.D., and twenty-three other clergymen of Philadelphia, thanking him for the nearly 50 years of public service he rendered to his country. In his response, March 3, 1797, George Washington made the statement:

Believing, as I do, that Religion and Morality are the essential pillars of civil society, I view, with unspeakable pleasure, that harmony and brotherly love which characterizes the Clergy of different denominations, as well in this, as in other parts of the United States; exhibiting to the world a new and interesting spectacle, at once the pride of our country and the surest basis of Universal Harmony.

That your labors for the good of mankind may be crowned with success, that your temporal employments may be commensurate with your merits, and that the future reward of good and faithful servants may be yours, I shall not cease to supplicate the Divine Author of life and felicity.

On March 27, 1798, George Washington wrote to secretary of War, Henry Knox:

Cruel must these reports be, if unfounded; and if well founded, what punishment can be too great for the Actors in so diabolical a Drama?

The period is big with events, but what will it produce is beyond the reach of human ken. On this, as upon all other occasions, I hope the best.

It has always been my belief that Providence has not led us so far in the path of Independence of one nation, to throw us into the Arms of another.

And that the machinations of those, who are attempting it, will sooner or later recoil upon their own Heads. Heaven grant it may soon happen upon all those whose conduct deserve it.

On July 13, 1798, when war with France appeared imminent, and the country clamored "Millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute," George Washington accepted President John Adams appointment as Commander in Chief of the Armies of the United States:

Satisfied, therefore, that you have sincerely wished and endeavored to avert war, and exhausted, to the last drop, the cup of reconciliation, we can, with pure hearts, appeal to Heaven for the justice of our cause; and may confidently trust the final result to that kind Providence who has, heretofore, and so often, signally favored the people of these United States.

Thinking in this manner, and feeling how incumbent it is upon every person, of every description, to contribute at all times to his country's welfare, and especially in a moment like the present, when everything we hold dear and sacred is so seriously threatened, I have finally determined to accept the commission of Commander in Chief of the Armies of the United States.

In a letter to Rev. G.W. Snyder, 1798, George Washington stated he was not:

Presiding over the English Lodges in this country... [having not been in a lodge] more than once or twice within the last thirty years.

On Sunday, September 30, 1798, George Washington entered in his diary:

Went to Church in Alexandria.

On May 30, 1799, just a few months before he died, George Washington wrote to Reverend William White of Christ Church, Philadelphia:

American Quotations.txt

Rev. Dear Sir, The Sermon on the duty of civil obedience as required in Scripture, which you had the goodness to send me, came safe a Post or two ago; and for which I pray you to accept my grateful acknowledgements. The hurry in which it found me engaged, in a matter that pressed, has not allowed me time to give it a perusal yet; but I anticipate the pleasure of the edification I shall find when it is in my power to do it. With every respectful wish, in which Mrs. Washington unites, for yourself and the young ladies of your family, I am with great esteem and regard, Dear Sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

George Washington.

The Reverend Mr. Mason Locke Weems, mentioned in Washington's diary as a guest in his home, March 3, 1787, was the pastor of Pohick Church, where Washington's family worshipped. In 1796, the Reverend Mr. Weems gave a copy of his book The Immortal Mentor: or Man's Unerring Guide to a Healthy, Wealthy, and Happy Life, in which Washington wrote:

RECOMMENDATION BY GEORGE WASHINGTON

Mount Vernon, July 3, 1799

Rev. Sir,

For your kind compliment, "The Immortal Mentor," I beg you to accept my best thanks. I have perused it with singular satisfaction; and hesitate not to say that it is, in my opinion at least, an invaluable compilation. I cannot but hope that a book whose contents do such credit to its title, will meet a very generous patronage. Should that patronage equal my wishes, you will have no reason to regret that you ever printed the Immortal Mentor. With respect I am, Rev. Sir, Your most obedient, humble servant, George Washington.

On August 17, 1799, in a letter to his nephew Robert Lewis, George Washington wrote:

To sell the overplus I cannot because I am prejudiced against this kind of traffic in the human species; to hire them out is almost as bad, because they cannot be disposed of in families to any advantage, and to divide families I have an aversion.

George Washington stated:

The aggregate happiness of society, which is best promoted by the practise of a virtuous policy, is, or ought to be, the end of all government.

The sentiments we have mutually expressed of profound gratitude to the Source of those numerous blessings - the Author of All Good obligations to unite our sincere and zealous endeavours, as the instruments of Divine Providence, to preserve and perpetuate them.

Providence has heretofore taken us up when all other means and hope seemed to be departing from us, in this I will confide.

It is impossible to account for the creation of the universe, without the agency of a Supreme Being. It is impossible to govern the universe without the aid of a Supreme Being. It is impossible to reason without arriving at a Supreme Being.

Religion is as necessary to reason, as reason is to religion. The one cannot exist without the other. A reasoning being would lose his reason, in attempting to account for the great phenomena of nature, had he not a Supreme Being to refer to.

George Washington is attributed as having stated:

It is impossible to rightly govern the world without God and the Bible.

The blessed Religion revealed in the Word of God will remain an eternal and awful monument to prove that the best Institutions may be abused by human depravity; and that they may even, in some instances, be made subservient to the vilest of purposes.

On Sunday, September 22, 1799, in a letter to Colonel Burgess Ball, George Washington wrote:

Your letter of the 16th inst. has been received, informing me of the death of my brother [Charles].

The death of relations always produces awful and affecting emotions under whatever circumstances it may happen. That my brother has been long expected; and his latter days, so uncomfortable to himself, must have prepared all around him for the stroke, though painful in effect.

I was the first, and am, now, the last of my father's children, by the second marriage, who remain.

When I shall be called upon to follow them is known only to the Giver of Life. When the summons comes I shall endeavor to obey it with a good grace.

In his Last Will and Testament, George Washington stated:

In the Name of God, Amen...

All my debts, of which there are but few, and none of magnitude, are to be punctually and speedily paid...

To my dearly beloved wife, Martha Washington, I give and bequeath the use, profit, and benefit of my whole estate, real and personal, for the term of her natural life....

Upon the decease of my wife it is my will and desire that all slaves whom I hold in my own right shall receive their freedom....

And to my mulatto man, William, (calling himself William Lee), I give immediate freedom, or, if he should prefer it (on account of the accidents which have befallen him, and which have rendered him incapable of walking, or of any active employment), to remain in the situation he now is, it shall be optional in him to do so: In either case, however, I allow him an annuity of thirty dollars during his natural life, which shall be independent of the victuals and clothes he has been accustomed to receive, if he choose the last alternative; but in full with his freedom if he prefers the first: - and this I give him, as a testimony of my sense of his attachment to me, and for his faithful services during the Revolutionary War.

On Saturday, December 14, 1799, at about five o'clock in the afternoon, George Washington spoke to Dr. Craik from his bed:

Doctor, I die hard, but I am not afraid to go.

Followed by his statements:

I am dying, gentlemen, but, thank God, I am not afraid to die.

I should have been glad, had it pleased God, to die a little easier, but I doubt not it is for my good.

On Saturday, December 14, 1799, at about ten o'clock in the evening, George Washington spoke from his bed to Tobias Lear, his secretary:

I am just going. Have me decently buried; and do not let my body be put into the vault in less than three days after I am dead. Do you understand me?...Tis well.

On December 14, 1799, at about eleven o'clock in the evening, George Washington spoke his last words, as recorded by his secretary Tobias Lear:

Father of mercies, take me unto thyself.

On December 29, 1799, in a memorial service for Washington, the minister of the New South Church in Boston, Reverend John Thorton Kirkland, stated:

The virtues of our departed friend were crowned by piety. He is known to have been habitually devout. To Christian institutions he gave the countenance of his example; and no one could express, more fully, his sense of the Providence of God, and the dependence of man.

John Marshall, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, who had previously fought with Washington in the Revolutionary War and served with him at Valley Forge, said of Washington:

Without making ostentatious professions of religion, he was a sincere believer in the Christian faith, and a truly devout man.

William White gives evidence of Washington's personal life in his Washington's Writing:

It seems proper to subjoin to this letter what was told to me by Mr. Robert Lewis, at Fredericksburg, in the year 1827. Being a nephew of Washington, and his private secretary during the first part of his presidency, Mr. Lewis lived with him on terms of intimacy, and had the best opportunity for observing his habits.

Mr. Lewis said that he had accidentally witnessed his private devotions in his library both morning and evening; that on those occasions he had seen him in a kneeling posture with a Bible open before him, and that he believed such to have been his daily practice.

Jared Sparks, a historian and professor of history at Harvard, was known for his studies of George Washington. He analyzed Washington's character and gave this summary:

A Christian in faith and practice, he was habitually devout. His reverence for religion is seen in his example, his public communications and his private writings. He uniformly ascribed his success as to the beneficent agency of the Supreme Being.

President James Madison stated:

Washington was constant in the observance of worship, according to the received forms of the Episcopal Church.

Washington's Bible was donated by his adopted son, George Washington Parke Custis, to the Pohick Church, Truro Parish, where Washington served as a vestryman, October 25, 1762 to February 23, 1784. The dedication stated:

Presented to Truro Parish for the use of Pohick Church, July 11, 1802. With the request that should said church cease to be appropriated to Divine worship which God forbid, and for the honor of Christianity, it is hoped will never take place. In such case I desire that the vestry will preserve this Bible as a testimony of regard from the subscriber after a residence of 19 years in the Parish.

George Washington Parke Custis.

Being in communion with the Anglican Church, serving for over twenty years as a vestryman (trustee), and on at least three different occasions serving as churchwarden, Washington would have regularly repeated the Apostle's Creed, which begins:

I believe in God, the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ, His only Son, our Lord.

Washington's tomb is engraved:

I am the Resurrection and the Life; sayeth the Lord. He that believeth in Me, though he were dead yet shall he live. And whosoever liveth and believeth in Me shall never die. (John 11: 25-26)

The inscription at Mount Vernon describes Washington as:

The hero, the patriot, the Christian.
The father of nations, the friend of mankind,
Who, when he had won all, renounced all, and sought in the bosom of his family and of nature, retirement, and in hope of religion, immortality.

The Washington Monument, in Washington, D.C., stands over 555 feet high. Engraved on the metal cap are the words:

American Quotations.txt

Praise be to God.

Along the stairway on the inside of the monument the following verses are carved on the tribute blocks:

SUFFER THE LITTLE CHILDREN TO COME UNTO ME AND FORBID THEM NOT; FOR SUCH IS THE KINGDOM OF GOD. (Luke 18:16)

TRAIN UP A CHILD IN THE WAY HE SHOULD GO AND WHEN HE IS OLD, HE WILL NOT DEPART FROM IT.
(Proverbs 22:6)

SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES. (John 5:39; Acts 17:11)

HOLINESS UNTO THE LORD. (Exodus 28:36; 39:30; Zechariah 14:20)

IN GOD WE TRUST

GOD AND OUR NATIVE LAND

MAY HEAVEN TO THIS UNION CONTINUE ITS BENEFICENCE.

Haydn, Franz Joseph (March 31, 1732-May 31, 1809), was an Austrian musical composer. He was considered the first master of the symphony, setting an example which Mozart and Beethoven later followed. He developed the string choir which has become the backbone of the modern orchestra. His works include 104 symphonies, 83 quartets, 42 sonatas, 24 concertos, 14 operas, 8 oratorios as well as the Austrian national anthem. His musical scores were replete with such phrases as "In nomine Domini," "Soli Deo Gloria," or "Laus Deo." Franz Joseph Haydn declared:

When I think of my God, my heart dances within me for joy, and then my music has to dance, too.

When asked by Emperor Franz which of his oratorios he preferred, he replied:

"The Creation!...because in The Creation angels speak, and their talk is of God....I was never so pious as during the time that I worked on The Creation. Daily I fell on my knees, and begged God to vouchsafe to me strength for the fortunate outcome of the work."

Haydn's last public appearance was on March 27, 1808, when the Society of Amateurs in Vienna, Austria, performed The Creation oratorio. When the performance produced a thunderous applause by the audience, Haydn pointed up and exclaimed:

It came from above!

Dickinson, John (November 8, 1732-February 14, 1808), was a signer of the United States Constitution. He was a member of the Continental Congress, 1774-76, and wrote the first draft of The Articles of Confederation, 1776. He served as the President of the Supreme Executive Council of Pennsylvania, in addition to being an accomplished lawyer, planter and state legislator. In 1773, he founded Dickinson College in Carlisle, Pennsylvania, and was known for giving generously to the Friends (Quakers) in Philadelphia for their educational pursuits.

John Dickinson wrote persuasive letters regarding the authority of Scripture and the soundness of Christian evidences. He campaigned for the ratification of the Constitution by writing a series of letters which he signed "Fabi us." These letters contributed to Delaware and Pennsylvania being the first two states to ratify the Constitution.

John Dickinson is best remembered as "The Penman of the Revolution." His pamphlets, which gained wide circulation promoting the cause of freedom, included: Petition to the King, 1771; The Declaration and Resolves of the First Continental Congress, 1774; and The Declaration of the Cause of Taking Up Arms, 1775. His most stirring pamphlets were the Letters from a Farmer in Pennsylvania, 1767-68:

But while Divine Providence, that gave me existence in a land of freedom, permits my head to think, my lips to speak, and my hand to move, I shall so highly and gratefully value the blessing received as to take care that my silence and inactivity shall not give my implied assent to my act, degrading my brethren and myself from the birthright, wherewith heaven itself "hath made us free."...

I pray GOD that he may be pleased to inspire you and your posterity, to the latest ages, with a spirit of which I have an idea, that I find a difficulty to express.

I express it in the best manner I can, I mean a spirit that shall so guide you that it will be impossible to determine whether an American's character is most distinguishable for his loyalty to his Sovereign, his duty to his mother country, his love of freedom, or his affection for his native soil....

But, above all, let us implore the protection of that infinitely good and gracious Being "by whom kings reign, and princes decree justice..." [Proverbs 8: 15]

A communication of her rights in general, and particularly of that great one, the foundation of all the rest - that their property, acquired with so much pain and hazard, should be disposed of by none but themselves - or to use the beautiful and emphatic language of the sacred scriptures "that they should sit every man under his vine, and under his fig-tree, and NONE SHOULD MAKE THEM AFRAID. . . ." [Micah 4: 4]

But whatever kind of minister he is, that attempts to innovate a single iota in the privileges of these colonies, him I hope you will undauntedly oppose; and that you will never suffer yourselves to be cheated or frightened into any unworthy obsequiousness.

On such emergencies you may surely, without presumption, believe that ALMIGHTY GOD himself will look upon your righteous contest with gracious approbation.

In 1776, in the Continental Congress, John Dickinson courageously bid farewell to the English government:

The happiness of these Colonies has been, during the whole course of this fatal controversy, our first wish; their reconciliation with Great Britain our next: ardently have we prayed for the accomplishment of both.

But if we must renounce the one or the other, we humbly trust in the mercies of the Supreme Governor of the universe that we shall not stand condemned before His throne if our choice is determined by that law of self-preservation which his Divine wisdom has seen fit to implant in the hearts of His creatures.

In 1776, less than two month prior to the signing of the Declaration of Independence, John Dickinson met with the other delegates from Pennsylvania to suggest requirements for the members of the Convention to subscribe to before being seated. One of the recommended stipulations was the attestation:

I do profess faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ his Eternal Son the true God, and in the Holy Spirit, one God blessed for evermore; and I do acknowledge the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments to be given by Divine inspiration.

John Dickinson stated:

The rights essential to happiness...we claim them from a higher source - from the King of kings and Lord of all the earth.

John Dickinson wrote in The Liberty Song, 1768:

Then join hand in hand, brave Americans all!
By uniting we stand, by dividing we fall!

Read, George (September 18, 1733-September 21, 1798), was a signer of the Declaration of Independence; a signer of the U. S. Constitution; a delegate from Delaware to the Constitutional Convention; a U. S. Senator, 1789-93; and Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Delaware.

As a youth, George Read studied at the seminary of Rev. Dr. Allison at New London. At the age of 17, he began reading law with John Moland Esq., and two years later was admitted to the bar. In 1769, he married the daughter of Reverend George Ross, who was the pastor of Immanuel Church in Newcastle for 50 years. George Read's wife was described as:

Beautiful, her manners elegant and her piety exemplary.

Known as "the Father of Delaware," George Read wrote "the first edition of her laws," and the Constitution of the State. The requirements, stated in the Delaware Constitution, necessary for holding office include:

DELAWARE 1776. Article XXII. Every person who shall be chosen a member of either house, or appointed to any office or place of trust... shall... make and subscribe the following declaration, to wit: "I, _____, do profess faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ His only Son, and in the Holy Ghost, one God, blessed for evermore; and I do acknowledge the holy scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be given by divine inspiration."

Aitken, Robert (1734-July 15, 1802), was the publisher of The Pennsylvania Magazine. On January 21, 1781, he petitioned Congress for permission to print Bibles, since there was a shortage in America due to the Revolutionary War interrupting trade with England. The Continental Congress, September 10, 1782, in response to this shortage of Bibles, approved and recommended to the people that The Holy Bible be printed by Robert Aitken of Philadelphia. This first American Bible was to be "a neat edition of the Holy Scriptures for the use of schools":

Whereupon, Resolved, That the United States in Congress assembled... recommend this edition of the Bible to the inhabitants of the United States, and hereby authorize [Robert Aitken] to publish this recommendation in the manner he shall think proper.

Boone, Daniel (November 2, 1734-September 26, 1820), was an American pioneer and hunter. He was instrumental in the founding of Kentucky. In 1755, he served with George Washington during the French and Indian War. He explored Florida, 1765, and Kentucky, 1767. In 1775, he brought the first settlers into Kentucky, founding the fort of Boonesboro. In 1778, during the Revolutionary War, he was captured by the Shawnee Indians and adopted by their chief. He was able to warn the inhabitants of Boonesboro of an impending attack by Indians who were allied with the British, enabling them to successfully resist it. Boone served as a Major in the militia, and in the Virginia legislature, 1781, 1787. Though he purchased a large amount of land in Kentucky, he began losing it in 1785, due to incorrectly prepared titles. In 1799, after having lost all his Kentucky land holding, he traveled west of St. Louis, Missouri, purchasing land from Spain. He lost this land in 1803, with the signing of the "Louisiana Purchase." In 1814, by an act of Congress, he was given back the land.

In October of 1816, Daniel Boone wrote Sarah Boone:

The religion I have is to love and fear God, believe in Jesus Christ, do all the good to my neighbor, and myself that I can, do as little harm as I can help, and trust on God's mercy for the rest.

Adams, John (October 30, 1735-July 4, 1826), was the 2nd President of the United States, 1797-1801, being the first president to live in the White House; established the Library of Congress and the Department of the Navy; Vice-President under George Washington, 1789-97; a member of the First and Second Continental Congress, 1774, 1775; a signer of the Declaration of Independence, 1776; distinguished for having personally urged Thomas Jefferson to write the Declaration, as well as for having recommended George Washington as the Commander in Chief of the Continental Army; authored the Constitution of Massachusetts in 1780; U.S. Minister to France, 1783, having signed the Treaty of Paris, along with John Jay and Benjamin Franklin, which officially ended the Revolutionary War; U.S. Minister to Great Britain, 1784-88, during which time he greatly influenced the American states to ratify the Constitution by writing a three-volume work entitled, A Defense of the Constitution of the Government of the United States; married Abigail Smith, 1764; admitted to bar 1758; and graduated from Harvard College, 1755.

On February 22, 1756, John Adams made the entry in his diary:

Suppose a nation in some distant Region should take the Bible for their only law Book, and every member should regulate his conduct by the precepts there exhibited! Every member would be obliged in conscience, to temperance, frugality, and industry; to justice, kindness, and charity towards his fellow men; and to piety, love, and reverence toward Almighty God... What a Eutopia, what a Paradise would this region be.

On March 2, 1756, John Adams made the entry in his diary:

Began this afternoon on my third quarter. The great and Almighty author of nature, who at first established those rules which regulate the world, can as easily suspend those laws whenever his providence sees sufficient reason for such suspension. This can be no objection, then, to the miracles of Jesus Christ.

Although some very thoughtful and contemplative men among the heathen attained a strong persuasion of the great principles of religion, yet the far greater number, having little time for speculation, gradually sunk into the grossest opinions and the grossest practices.

These, therefore, could not be made to embrace the true religion till their attention was roused by some astonishing and miraculous appearances. The reasoning of philosophers, having nothing surprising them, could not overcome the force of prejudice, custom, passion, and bigotry.

But when wise and virtuous men commissioned from heaven, by miracles awakened men's attention to their reasonings, the force of truth made its way with ease to their minds.

On May 1, 1756, John Adams made the entry in his diary:

The stupendous plan of operation was projected by Him who rules the universe, and a part assigned to every particle of matter, to act in this great and complicated drama. The Creator looked into the remotest futurity, and saw his great designs accomplished by this inextricable, this mysterious complication of causes.

On August 29, 1763, John Adams wrote:

We electors have an important constitutional power placed in our hands: we have a check upon two branches of the legislature...

It becomes necessary to every [citizen] then, to be in some degree a statesman; and to examine and judge for himself... the... political principles and measures. Let us examine them with a sober... Christian spirit.

In February of 1765, John Adams wrote in his notes on A Dissertation on the Canon and Feudal Law:

I always consider the settlement of America with reverence and wonder, as the opening of a grand scene and design in Providence for the illumination of the ignorant, and the emancipation of the slavish part of mankind all over the earth.

On February 9, 1772, Sunday, John Adams made the entry in his diary:

"If I would go to Hell for an eternal moment or so, I might be knighted" - Shakespeare.

By a courtier I mean one who applies himself to the passions and prejudices, the follies and vices of great men in order to obtain their smiles, esteem and patronage, and consequently their favours and preferments....

A Master requires of all who seek his favour an implicit resignation to his will and humor, and these require that he be soothed, flattered, and assisted in his vices and follies, perhaps the blackest crimes that men can commit. The first thought of this will produce in a mind... a soliloquy, something like my [Shakespearean] motto - as if he should say - The Minister of State or the Governor would promote my interest, would advance me to places of honour and profit, would raise me to titles and dignities that will be perpetuated in my family, in a word would make the fortune of me and my posterity forever, if I would but comply with his desires and become his instruments to promote his measures....

We see every day that our imaginations are so strong and our reason so weak, the charms of wealth and power are so enchanting, and the belief of future punishments so faint that men find ways to persuade themselves to believe any absurdity, to submit to any prostitution, rather than forego their wishes and desires. Their reason becomes at last an eloquent advocate on the side of their passions... bring[ing] themselves to believe that black is white, that vice is virtue, that folly is wisdom and eternity a moment....

I dread the consequences. [A master] requires of me such compliances, such horrid crimes, such a sacrifice of my honour, my conscience, my friends, my country, my God, as the Scriptures inform us must be punished with nothing less than Hell fire, eternal torment. And this is so unequal a price to pay for the honours and emoluments in the power of a minister or Governor, that I cannot prevail upon myself to think of it. The duration of future punishment terrifies me. If I could but deceive myself so far as to think eternity a moment only, I could comply and be promoted.

On July 4, 1774, from Patten's at Arundel, John Adams wrote to his wife, Abigail, the daughter of Reverend William Smith:

We went to the meeting at Wells and had the pleasure of hearing my friend upon "Be not partakers in other men's sins. Keep yourselves pure."...

We... took our horses to the meeting in the afternoon and heard the minister again upon "Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." There is great pleasure in hearing sermons so serious, so clear, so sensible and instructive as these.

On September 7, 1774, John Adams wrote to his wife, Abigail, describing the effects of the prayer which opened the first session of the Continental Congress:

When the Congress met, Mr. Cushing made a motion that it should be opened with Prayer. It was opposed by Mr. Jay of New York, and Mr. Rutledge of South Carolina because we were so divided in religious sentiments, some Episcopalians, some Quakers, some Anabaptists, some Presbyterians, and some Congregationalists, that we could not join in the same act of worship.

Mr. Samuel Adams arose and said that he was no bigot, and could hear a Prayer from any gentleman of Piety and virtue, who was at the same time a friend to his Country. He was a stranger in Philadelphia, but had heard that Mr. Duche' deserved that character and therefore he moved that Mr. Duche', an Episcopal clergyman might be desired to read Prayers to Congress tomorrow morning.

The motion was seconded, and passed in the affirmative. Mr. Randolph, our president, vailed on Mr. Duche', and received for answer, that if his health would permit, he certainly would.

Accordingly, next morning [Reverend Mr. Duche'] appeared with his clerk and in his pontificals, and read several prayers in the established form, and read the collect for the seventh day of September, which was the thirty-fifth Psalm. You must remember, this was the next morning after we heard the horrible rumor of the cannonade of Boston.

I never saw a greater effect upon an audience. It seemed as if heaven had ordained that Psalm to be read on that morning. After this, Mr. Duche', unexpectedly to every body, struck out into an extemporary prayer, which filled the bosom of every man present. I must confess, I never heard a better prayer, or one so well pronounced.

Episcopalian as he is, Dr. Cooper himself [Adams' pastor] never prayed with such fervor, such ardor, such earnestness and pathos, and in language so elegant and sublime, for America, for the Congress, for the province of Massachusetts Bay, and especially the town of Boston. It has had an excellent effect upon everybody here. I must beg you to read that Psalm.

On October 9, 1774, John Adams wrote from Philadelphia to his wife, Abigail:

This day I went to Dr. Allison's meeting in the afternoon, and heard the Dr. Francis Allison... give a good discourse upon the Lord's Supper...

I had rather go to Church. We have better sermons, better prayers, better speakers, softer, sweeter music, and genteeler company. And I must confess that the Episcopal church is quite as agreeable to my taste as the Presbyterian... I like the Congregational way best, next to that the Independent...

In 1774, in his commentary entitled, Novanglus: A History of the Dispute with America, from its Origin, in 1754, to the Present Time, John Adams wrote:

It is the duty of the clergy to accommodate their discourses to the times, to preach against such sins as are most prevalent, and recommend such virtues as are most wanted. For example, if exorbitant ambition and venality are predominant, ought they not to warn their hearers against those vices? If public spirit is much wanted, should they not inculcate this great virtue? If the rights and duties of Christian magistrates and subjects are disputed, should they not explain them, show their nature, ends, limitations, and restrictions, how much soever it may move the gall of Massachusetts.

On July 12, 1775, in a letter to his wife explaining the Continental Congress' decision to declare a Day of Public Humiliation, Fasting, and Prayer, John Adams wrote:

We have appointed a Continental fast. Millions will be upon their knees at once before their great Creator, imploring His forgiveness and blessing; His smiles on American Council and arms.

In October of 1775, in a letter to his wife, Abigail, after receiving news of her mother's death, John Adams wrote:

God almighty grant to you and to every Branch of the Family, all the Support that you want! You and I, my dear, have Reason, if ever Mortals had, to be thoughtful - to look forward beyond the transitory Scene.

In October of 1775, in a letter to his wife, Abigail, John Adams wrote:

My opinion of the Duties of Religion and Morality, comprehends a very extensive Connection with society at large, and the great Interest of the public. Does not natural Morality, and much more Christian Benevolence, make it our indispensable Duty to lay ourselves out, to serve our fellow Creatures to the Utmost of our Power, in promoting and supporting those great Political systems, and general Regulations upon which the happiness of Multitudes depends.

The Benevolence, Charity, Capacity and Industry which exerted in private Life, would make a family, a parish or a Town Happy. Employed upon larger Scale, in Support of the great Principles of Virtue and Freedom of political Regulations, might secure whole Nations and Generations from Misery, Want and Contempt. Public Virtues, and political Qualities therefore should be incessantly cherished in our Children.

In January of 1776, at the request of George Wythe of Virginia, John Adams created a plan to aid the colonies in their transition to a new form of government:

All sober inquires after truth, ancient and modern, pagan and Christian, have declared that the happiness of man, as well as his dignity, consists in virtue. . . . If there is a form of government, then, whose principle and foundation is virtue, will not every sober man acknowledge it better calculated to promote the general happiness than any other form?

Fear is the foundation of most governments; but it is so sordid and brutal a passion, and renders men in whose breasts it predominates so stupid and miserable, that Americans will not be likely to approve of any political institution which is founded on it.

Honor is truly sacred, but holds a lower rank in the scale of moral excellence than virtue. Indeed, the former is a part of the latter....

On June 21, 1776, John Adams wrote:

Statesmen, my dear Sir, may plan and speculate for liberty, but it is Religion and Morality alone, which can establish the Principles upon which Freedom can securely stand.

The only foundation of a free Constitution is pure Virtue, and if this cannot be inspired into our People in a greater Measure, than they have it now, they may change their Rulers and the forms of Government, but they will not obtain a lasting liberty.

In contemplating the effect that separation from England would mean to him personally, John Adams wrote:

If it be the pleasure of Heaven that my country shall require the poor offering of my life, the victim shall be ready, at the appointed hour of sacrifice, come when that hour may. But while I do live, let me have a country, and that a free country!

On July 1, 1776, in speaking to the delegates of the Thirteen Colonies at the Continental Congress, John Adams stated:

Before God, I believe the hour has come. My judgment approves this measure, and my whole heart is in it. All that I have, and all that I am, and all that I hope in this life, I am now ready here to stake upon it. And I leave off as I began, that live or die, survive or perish, I am for the Declaration. It is my living sentiment, and by the blessing of God it shall be my dying sentiment. Independence now, and Independence for ever!

On July 3, 1776, the day following Congress' approval of the Declaration of Independence, John Adams wrote to his wife, Abigail Adams:

It is the will of heaven that the two countries should be sundered forever. It may be the will of heaven that America shall suffer calamities still more wasting and distresses yet more dreadful. If this is to be the case, it will have this good effect, at least: it will inspire us with many virtues which we have not, and correct many errors, follies and vices, which threaten to disturb, dishonor and destroy us... The furnace of affliction produces refinements in states, as well as individuals.

You will see in a few days a Declaration setting forth the Causes, which have impell'd Us to this mighty Revolution, and the Reasons which will justify it in the Sight of God and Man.

On July 3, 1776, John Adams wrote again to his wife, Abigail Adams, reflecting on what he had shared in Congress and, with prophetic insight, declaring the importance of that day:

The second day of July, 1776, will be the most memorable epoch in the history of America. I am apt to believe that it will be celebrated by succeeding generations as the great anniversary Festival. It ought to be commemorated, as the Day of Deliverance, by solemn acts of devotion to God Almighty. It ought to be solemnized with pomp and parade, with shows, games, sports, guns, bells, bonfires and illuminations, from one end of this continent to the other, from this time forward forever.

You will think me transported with enthusiasm, but I am not. I am well aware of the toil and blood and treasure that it will cost to maintain this Declaration, and support and defend these States. Yet through all the gloom I can see the rays of ravishing light and glory. I can see that the end is worth more than all the means; that posterity will triumph in that day's transaction, even though we [may regret] it, which I trust in God we shall not.

In 1777, Dr. Benjamin Rush wrote his comments regarding John Adams:

He was a stranger to dissimulation, and appeared to be more jealous of his reputation for integrity than for talents or knowledge. He was strictly moral, and at all times respectful to religion. In speaking of the probable issue of the war he said to me in Baltimore in the winter of 1777, "We shall succeed in our struggle, provided we repent of our sins, and forsake them," and then he added, "I will see it out, or go to heaven in its ruins."

On June 2, 1778, while in Paris, John Adams made the entry in his diary:

In vain are Schools, Academies, and Universities instituted, if loose Principles and licentious habits are impressed upon Children in their earliest years. . . . The Vices and Examples of the Parents cannot be concealed from the Children. How is it possible that Children can have any just Sense of the sacred Obligations of Morality or Religion if, from their earliest Infancy, they learn their Mothers live in habitual Infidelity to their fathers, and their fathers in as constant Infidelity to their Mothers?

In 1780, in An Address of the Convention for Framing A New Constitution of Government For the State of Massachusetts-Bay to the Constituents, John Adams stated:

The debates were managed by persons of various denominations. . . . [and the] delegates did not conceive themselves to be vested with power to set up one denomination of Christians above another.

In advising his wife, Abigail, concerning their sons, John Adams wrote:

Let them revere nothing but Religion, Morality and Liberty.

On July 12, 1782, in a letter written from Holland, John Adams twice referred to politics as:

A divine science.

On September 3, 1783, John Adams, along with Benjamin Franklin and John Jay, signed the Treaty of Paris, ratified by Congress January 14, 1784, which officially ended the War with the British:

In the name of the Most Holy and Undivided Trinity. It having pleased the Divine Providence to dispose the hearts of the most serene and most potent Prince George the Third, by the Grace of God, King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, . . . and of the United States of America, to forget all past misunderstandings and differences. . . . Done at Paris, this third day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three.

On December 11, 1795, Vice-President John Adams, as President of the Senate, addressed President Washington:

Circumstances thus every way auspicious demand our gratitude and sincere acknowledgements to Almighty God.

On July 26, 1796, retorting Thomas Paine's assertions, Vice-President John Adams made the entry in his diary:

The Christian religion is, above all the Religions that ever prevailed or existed in ancient or modern times, the religion of Wisdom, Virtue, Equity, and Humanity. Let the Blackguard Paine say what he will; it is Resignation to God, it is Goodness itself to Man.

On August 14, 1796, Vice-President John Adams made the entry in his diary:

One great advantage of the Christian religion is that it brings the great principle of the law of nature and nations - Love your neighbor as yourself and do to others as you would that others should do to you, - to the knowledge, belief, and veneration of the whole people. . .

No other institution for education, no kind of political discipline, could diffuse this kind of necessary information, so universally among all ranks and descriptions of citizens. The duties and rights of the man and the citizen are thus taught from early infancy to every creature.

The sanctions of a future life are thus added to the observance of civil and political, as well as domestic and private duties. Prudence, justice, temperance, and fortitude, are thus taught to be the means and conditions of future as well as present happiness.

John Adams made the entry in his diary entry:

American Quotations.txt

[Investigation is] the proper business of mankind in this life....I am resolved not to neglect my time as I did last year. I am resolved to rise with the sun and to study the Scriptures on Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday mornings, and to study some Latin author on the other three mornings, Noons and nights. I intend to read English authors.

On December 10, 1796, Vice-President John Adams, as President of the U. S. Senate, addressed President George Washington:

We thank you, sir, for your faithful and detailed exposure of the existing situation of our country, and we sincerely join in sentiments of gratitude to an overruling Providence for the distinguished share of public prosperity and private happiness which the people of the United States so peculiarly enjoy.

On Saturday, March 4, 1797, in his Inaugural Address, given in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, President John Adams stated:

Relying, however, on the purity of their intentions, the justice of their cause, and the integrity and intelligence of the people, under an overruling Providence which had so signally protected this country from the first, the representatives of this nation, then consisting of little more than half its present number, not only broke to pieces the chains which were forging and the rod of iron that was lifted up, but frankly cut asunder the ties which had bound them, and launched into an ocean of uncertainty....

If a love of science and letters and a wish to patronize every rational effort to encourage schools, colleges, universities, academies, and every institution for propagating knowledge, virtue and religion among all classes of the people, not only for their benign influence on the happiness of life in all its stages and classes, and of society in all its forms, but as the only means of preserving our Constitution from its natural enemies, the spirit of sophistry, the spirit of party, the spirit of intrigue, the profligacy of corruption, and the pestilence of foreign influence, which is the angel of destruction to elective governments...

With humble reverence, I feel it to be my duty to add, if a veneration for the religion of a people who profess and call themselves Christians, and a fixed resolution to consider a decent respect for Christianity among the best recommendations for the public service, can enable me in any degree to comply with your wishes, it shall be my strenuous endeavor that this sagacious injunction of the two Houses shall not be without effect....

And may that Being who is supreme over all, the Patron of Order, the Fountain of Justice, and the Protector in all ages of the world of virtuous liberty, continue His blessings upon this nation and its Government and give it all possible success and duration consistent with the ends of His Providence.

On May 16, 1797, in a Special Session Message to Congress,
Page 264

President John Adams stated:

We have still abundant cause of gratitude to the Supreme Dispenser of National Blessings for general health and promising seasons, for domestic and social happiness, for the rapid progress and ample acquisitions of industry through extensive territories, for civil, political, and religious liberty....

To enable me to maintain this declaration I rely, under God, with entire confidence on the firm and enlightened support of the National Legislature and upon the virtue and patriotism of my fellow-citizens.

On May 23, 1797, the U. S. Senate, led by Vice-President Thomas Jefferson, addressed President John Adams:

And the Senate can not suffer the present occasion to pass without thus publicly and solemnly expressing their attachment to the Constitution and Government of their country; and as they hold themselves responsible to their constituents, their consciences, and their God, it is their determination by all their exertions to repel every attempt to alienate the affections of the people from the Government, so highly injurious to the honor, safety, and independence of the United States.

On May 24, 1797, in a reply to the U. S. Senate, President John Adams stated:

In a humble reliance on Divine Providence we may rest assured that while we reiterate with sincerity our endeavors to accommodate all our differences with France, the independence of our country can not be diminished, its dignity degraded, or its glory tarnished by any nation or combination of nations, whether friends or enemies.

On November 22, 1797, in his First Annual Address to Congress, President John Adams stated:

We have, nevertheless, abundant cause of gratitude to the Source of Benevolence and influence for interior tranquillity and personal security, for propitious seasons, prosperous agriculture, productive fisheries, and general improvements, and, above all, for a rational spirit of civil and religious liberty and a calm but steady determination to support our sovereignty, as well as our moral and our religious principles, against all open and secret attacks....

Nothing, in the meantime, will contribute so much to the preservation of peace and the attainment of justice as a manifestation of that energy and unanimity of which on many former occasions the people of the United States have given such memorable proofs, and the exertion of those resources for national defense which a beneficent Providence has kindly placed within their power....

Whatever may be the issue of the negotiation with France, and whether the war in Europe is or is not to continue, I hold it most certain that permanent tranquillity and order will not soon be obtained. The state of society has so long been disturbed, the sense of moral and religious obligations so much weakened, public faith and national honor have been so impaired, respect to treaties has been so diminished, and the law of nations has lost so much of its force, while pride, ambition, avarice, and violence have been so long unrestrained, there remains no reasonable ground on which to raise an expectation that a commerce without protection or defense will not be plundered.

On November 27, 1797, the U. S. Senate addressed President John Adams:

We have abundant cause of gratitude to the Great Disposer of Human Events for interior tranquillity and personal security, for propitious seasons, prosperous agriculture, productive fisheries, and general improvement, and above all, for a rational spirit of civil and religious liberty and a calm but steady determination to support our sovereignty against all open and secret attacks.

On Friday, March 23, 1798, President John Adams issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Humiliation, Fasting, and Prayer:

As the safety and prosperity of nations ultimately and essentially depend on the protection and the blessing of Almighty God, and the national acknowledgement of this truth is not only an indispensable duty which the people owe to Him, but a duty whose natural influence is favorable to the promotion of that morality and piety without which social happiness can not exist nor the blessings of a free government be enjoyed;

And as this duty, at all times incumbent, is so especially in seasons of difficulty or of danger, when existing or threatening calamities, the just judgements of God against prevalent iniquity, are a loud call to repentance and reformation;

And as the United States of America are at present placed in a hazardous and afflictive situation by the unfriendly disposition, conduct, and demands of a foreign power, evinced by repeated refusals to receive our messengers of reconciliation and peace, by depredations on our commerce, and the infliction of injuries on very many of our fellow-citizens while engaged in their lawful business on the seas - under these conditions it has appeared to me that the duty of imploring the mercy and benediction of Heaven on our country demands at this time a special attention from its inhabitants.

I have therefore thought fit to recommend, and I do hereby recommend, that Wednesday, the 9th day of May next, be observed throughout the United States as a day of solemn humiliation, fasting, and prayer;

That the citizens of these States, abstaining on that day from their customary worldly occupations, offer their devout addresses to the Father of Mercies agreeably to those forms or methods which they have severally adopted as the most suitable and becoming;

That all religious congregations do, with the deepest humility, acknowledge before God the manifold sins and transgressions with which we are justly chargeable as individuals and as a nation, beseeching Him at the same time, of His infinite grace, through the Redeemer of the World, freely to remit all our offenses, and to incline us by His Holy Spirit to that sincere repentance and reformation which may afford us reason to hope for His inestimable favor and heavenly benediction;

That our civil and religious privileges may be preserved inviolate and perpetuated to the latest generations;

That our public councils and magistrates may be especially enlightened and directed at this critical period;

That the American people may be united in those bonds of amity and mutual confidence and inspired with that vigor and fortitude by which they have in times past been so highly distinguished and by which they have obtained such invaluable advantages;

That the health of the inhabitants of our Land may be preserved, and their agriculture, commerce, fisheries, arts, and manufactures be blessed and prospered;

That the principles of genuine piety and sound morality may influence the minds and govern the lives of every description of our citizens, and that the blessings of peace, freedom, and pure religion may be speedily extended to all the nations of the earth.

And finally, I recommend that on the said day the duties of humiliation and prayer be accompanied by fervent thanksgiving to the Bestower of Every Good Gift, not only for His having hitherto protected and preserved the people of these United States in the independent enjoyment of their religious and civil freedom, but also for having prospered them in a wonderful progress of population, and for conferring on them many and great favors conducive to the happiness and prosperity of a nation.

Given under my hand and the seal of the United States of America, at Philadelphia, this 23d day of March, A. D. 1798, and of the Independence of the said States the twenty-second. John Adams.

By the President: Timothy Pickering, Secretary of State.

On October 11, 1798, President John Adams stated in a letter to the officers of the First Brigade of the Third Division of the Militia of Massachusetts:

We have no government armed with power capable of contending with human passions unbridled by morality and religion. Avarice, ambition, revenge, or gallantry, would break the strongest cords of our Constitution as a whale goes through a net. Our Constitution was made only for a moral and religious people. It is wholly inadequate to the government of any other.

On December 8, 1798, in his Second Annual Address to Congress, President John Adams stated:

While with reverence and resignation we contemplate the dispensations of Divine Providence in the alarming and destructive pestilence with which several of our cities and towns have been visited, there is cause for gratitude and mutual congratulations that the malady has disappeared and that we are again permitted to assemble in safety at the seat of Government for the discharge of our important duties....

While we think on this calamity and sympathize with the immediate sufferers, we have abundant reason to present to the Supreme Being our annual oblations of gratitude for a liberal participation in the ordinary blessings of His providence.

On December 11, 1798, the U. S. Senate addressed President John Adams:

The Senate of the United States join you in thanks to Almighty God for the removal of the late afflicting dispensations of His providence and for the patriotic spirit and general prosperity of our country.

On December 13, 1798, the U. S. House of Representatives addressed President John Adams:

While with you we recognize our abundant cause of gratitude to the Supreme Disposer of Events for the ordinary blessings of Providence, we regard as of high national importance the manifestations in our country of a magnanimous spirit of resistance to foreign domination....

Disdaining a reliance on foreign protection, wanting no foreign guaranty of our liberties, resolving to maintain our national independence against every attempt to despoil us of this inestimable treasure, we confide under Providence in the patriotism and energies of the people of these United States for defeating the hostile enterprises of any foreign power.

On Wednesday, March 6, 1799, President John Adams issued a Proclamation of a National a Day of Humiliation, Fasting, and Prayer:

As no truth is more clearly taught in the Volume of Inspiration, nor any more fully demonstrated by the experience of all ages, than that a deep sense and a due acknowledgment of the growing providence of a Supreme Being and of the accountableness of men to Him as the searcher of hearts and righteous distributor of rewards and punishments are conducive equally to the happiness and rectitude of individuals and to the well-being of communities;

As it is also most reasonable in itself that men who are made capable of social acts and relations, who owe their improvements to the social state, and who derive their enjoyments from it, should, as a society, make their acknowledgments of dependence and obligation to Him who hath endowed them with these capacities and elevated them in the scale of existence by these distinctions;

As it is likewise a plain dictate of duty and a strong sentiment of nature that in circumstances of great urgency and seasons on imminent danger earnest and particular supplications should be made to Him who is able to defend or to destroy;

As, moreover, the most precious interests of the people of the United States are still held in jeopardy by the hostile designs and insidious acts of a foreign nation, as well as by the dissemination among them of those principles, subversive to the foundations of all religious, moral, and social obligations, that have produced incalculable mischief and misery in other countries;

And as, in fine, the observance of special seasons for public religious solemnities is happily calculated to avert the evils which we ought to deprecate, and to excite to the performance of the duties which we ought to discharge, by calling and fixing the attention of the people at large to the momentous truths already recited, by affording opportunity to teach and inculcate them by animating devotion and giving to it the character of a national act:

For these reasons I have thought proper to recommend, and I hereby recommend accordingly, that Thursday, the twenty-fifth day of April next, be observed throughout the United States of America as a day of solemn humiliation, fasting, and prayer;

That the citizens on that day abstain, as far as may be, from their secular occupation, and devote the time to the sacred duties of religion, in public and in private;

That they call to mind our numerous offenses against the Most High God, confess them before Him with the sincerest penitence, implore His pardoning mercy, through the Great Mediator and Redeemer, for our past transgressions, and that through the grace of His Holy Spirit, we may be disposed and enabled to yield a more suitable obedience to His righteous requisitions in time to come;

That He would interpose to arrest the progress of that impiety and licentiousness in principle and practice so offensive to Himself and so ruinous to mankind;

That He would make us deeply sensible that "righteousness exalteth a nation but sin is a reproach to any people"[Proverbs 14: 34];

That He would turn us from our transgressions and turn His displeasure from us;

That He would withhold us from unreasonable discontent, from dissension, faction, sedition, and insurrection;

That He would preserve our country from the desolating sword;

That He would save our cities and towns from a repetition of those awful pestilential visitations under which they have lately suffered so severely, and that the health of our inhabitants generally may be precious in His sight;

That He would favor us with fruitful seasons and so bless the labors of the husbandman as that there may be food in abundance for man and beast;

That He would prosper our commerce, manufactures, and fisheries, and give success to the people in all their lawful industry and enterprise;

That He would smile on our colleges, academies, schools, and seminaries of learning, and make them nurseries of sound science, morals, and religion;

That He would bless all magistrates, from the highest to the lowest, give them the true spirit of their station, make them a terror to evil doers and a praise to them that do well;

That He would preside over the councils of the nation at this critical period, enlighten them to a just discernment of the public interest, and save them from mistake, division, and discord;

That He would make succeed our preparations for defense and bless our armaments by land and sea;

That He would put an end to the effusion of human blood and the accumulation of human misery among the contending nations of the earth by disposing them to justice, to equity, to benevolence, and to peace;

And that He would extend the blessings of knowledge, of true liberty, and of pure and undefiled religion throughout the world.

And I do also recommend that with these acts of humiliation, penitence, and prayer, fervent thanksgiving to the Author of All Good be united for the countless favors which He is still continuing to the people of the United States, and which render their condition as a nation eminently happy when compared with the lot of others. Given, etc.

On December 3, 1799, in his Third Annual Address to Congress, President John Adams stated:

The flattering prospects of abundance from the labors of the people by land and by sea; the prosperity of our extended commerce, notwithstanding interruptions occasioned by the belligerent state of a great part of the world; the return of health, industry, and trade to those cities which have lately been afflicted with disease, and the various and inestimable advantages, civil and religious, which, secured under our happy frame of government, are continued to us unimpaired, demand of the whole American people sincere thanks to a benevolent Deity for the merciful dispensations of His Providence.

On December 9, 1799, the U. S. Senate addressed President John Adams:

We devoutly join you in offering our thanks to Almighty God for the return of health to our cities and for the general prosperity of the country.

On December 9, 1799, the U. S. House of Representatives addressed President John Adams:

While the House of Representatives contemplate the flattering prospects of abundance from the labors of the people by land and by sea, the prosperity of our extended commerce notwithstanding the interruptions occasioned by the belligerent state of a great part of the world, the return of health, industry, and trade to those cities which have lately been afflicted with disease, and the various and inestimable advantages, civil and religious, which, secured under our happy frame of Government, are continued to us unimpaired, we can not fail to offer up to a benevolent Deity our sincere thanks for these the merciful dispensations of His protecting Providence. . . .

We offer up our fervent prayers to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe for the success of their embassy, and that it may be productive of peace and happiness to our common country. The uniform tenor of your conduct through a life useful to your fellow-citizens and honorable to yourself gives a sure pledge of the sincerity with which the avowed objects of the negotiations will be pursued on your part, and we earnestly pray that similar dispositions may be displayed on the part of France.

On December 10, 1799, in a reply to the U.S. House of Representatives, President John Adams stated:

We may be sure, under the smiles of Divine Providence, that we shall effectually promote and extend our national interest and happiness.

On December 19, 1799, in a message to Congress, President John Adams stated:

The letter herewith transmitted will inform you that it has pleased Divine Providence to remove from this life our excellent fellow-citizen, George Washington, by the purity of his character and a long series of services to his country rendered illustrious through the world. It remains for an affectionate and grateful people, in whose hearts he can never die, to pay suitable honors to his memory.

On December 23, 1799, the U.S. Senate addressed President John Adams:

The Senate of the United States respectfully take leave, sir, to express to you their deep regret for the loss their country sustains in the death of General George Washington. . . .

Our country mourns her father. The Almighty Disposer of Human Events has taken from us our greatest benefactor and ornament. It becomes us to submit with reverence to Him. . . .

Favored of Heaven, he departed without exhibiting the weakness of humanity. Magnanimous in death, the darkness of the grave could not obscure his brightness. Such was the man whom we deplore. Thanks to God, his glory is consummated. Washington yet lives on earth in his spotless example; his spirit is in Heaven.

On December 23, 1799, in an address to the U.S. Senate, President John Adams stated:

Among all our original associates in that memorable league of the continent in 1774, which first expressed the sovereign will of a free nation in America, he was the only one remaining in the General Government. Although with a constitution more enfeebled than his at an age when he thought it necessary to prepare for retirement, I feel myself alone bereaved of my last brother. . . . For his fellow-citizens, if their prayers could have been answered, he would have been immortal. . . . Trusting, however, in the wise and righteous dominion of Providence over the passions of men and the results of their councils and actions, as well as over their lives, nothing remains from me but humble resignation.

On January 8, 1800, in a message to Congress, President John Adams stated:

In compliance with the request in one of the resolutions of Congress of the 21st of December last, I transmitted a copy of these resolutions, by my secretary, Mr. Shaw, to Mrs. Washington, assuring her of the profound respect Congress will ever bear to her person and character, of their condolence in the late afflicting dispensation of Providence, and entreating her assent to the interment of the remains of General George Washington in the manner expressed in the first resolution. As the sentiments of that virtuous lady, not less beloved by this nation than she is at present greatly afflicted, can never be so well expressed as in her own words, I transmit to Congress her original letter.

On December 31, 1799, from Mount Vernon, Martha Washington wrote to President John Adams:

Sir: While I feel with keenest anguish the late dispensation of Divine Providence, I can not be insensible to the mournful tributes of respect and veneration which are paid to the memory of my dear deceased husband; and as his best services and most anxious wishes were always devoted to the welfare and happiness of his country, to know that they were truly appreciated and gratefully remembered affords no inconsiderable consolation.

Taught by the great example which I have so long had before me never to oppose my private wishes to the public will, I must consent to the request made by Congress, which you have had the goodness to transmit to me; and in doing this I need not, I can not, say what a sacrifice of individual feeling I make to a sense of public duty.

With grateful acknowledgments and unfeigned thanks for the personal respect and evidence of condolence expressed by Congress and yourself, I remain, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient, humble servant.
Martha Washington.

On November 1, 1800, John Adams became the first U. S. President to move into the White House. The following day he wrote a letter to his wife, a portion of which was inscribed on the mantelpiece of the State Dining Room by President Franklin D. Roosevelt:

I pray Heaven to bestow the best of blessings on this house and all that shall hereafter inhabit it. May none but honest and wise men ever rule under this roof.

On November 22, 1800, in his Fourth Annual Address to Congress, which began the first session of Congress in the new Capitol of Washington, in the District of Columbia, President John Adams stated:

It would be unbecoming the representatives of this nation to assemble for the first time in this solemn temple without looking up to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe and imploring His blessing. May this territory be the residence of virtue and happiness! In this city may that piety and virtue, that wisdom and magnanimity, that constancy and self-government, which adorned the great character whose name it bears be forever held in veneration! Here and throughout our country may simple manners, pure morals, and true religion flourish forever!

On November 25, 1800, the U. S. Senate addressed President John Adams:

Sir: Impressed with the important truth that the hearts of rulers and people are in the hand of the Almighty, the Senate of the United States most cordially join in your invocations for blessings upon the Government and people of this Union. We meet you, sir, and the other branch of the National Legislature in the city which is honored by the name of our late hero and sage, the illustrious Washington, with sensations and emotions which exceed our power of description. . . .

Great indeed would have been our gratification if his sum of earthly happiness had been completed by seeing the Government thus peaceably convened at this place; but we derive consolation from a belief that the moment in which we were destined to experience the loss we deplore was fixed by that Being whose counsels can not err, and from a hope that since in this seat of Government, which bears his name, his earthly remains will be deposited, the members of Congress, and all who inhabit the city, with these memorials before them, will retain his virtues in lively recollection, and make his patriotism, morals, and piety models for imitation.

And permit us to add, sir, that it is not among the least of our consolations that you, who have been his companion and friend from the dawning of our national existence, and trained in the same school of exertion to effect our independence, are still preserved by a gracious Providence in health and activity to exercise the functions of Chief Magistrate. . . .

And we trust that, under the protection of Divine Providence the wisdom and virtue of the citizens of the United States will deliver our national compact unimpaired to a grateful posterity.

On November 26, 1800, in an address to the U. S. Senate, President John Adams stated:

With you I deplore the death of that hero and sage who bore so honorable and efficient a part in the establishment of both. Great indeed would have been my gratification if his sum of earthly happiness had been completed by seeing the Government thus peaceably convened at this place, himself at its head; but while we submit to the decisions of Heaven, whose councils are inscrutable to us, we can not but hope that the members of Congress, the officers of Government, and all who inhabit the city or the country will retain his virtues in lively recollection and make his patriotism, morals, and piety models for imitation...

With you I trust that under the protection of Divine Providence the wisdom and virtue of our citizens will deliver our national compact unimpaired to a free, prosperous, happy, and grateful posterity. To this end it is my fervent prayer that in this city the foundations of wisdom may be always opened and the streams of eloquence forever flow.

On January 24, 1801, in a letter to George Churchman and Jacob Lindley regarding slavery, John Adams stated:

My opinion against it has always been known... Never in my life did I own a slave.

On February 16, 1809, in a letter to Judge F. A. Van der Kemp, John Adams wrote:

The Hebrews have done more to civilize men than any other nation... [God] ordered the Jews to preserve and propagate to all mankind the doctrine of a Supreme, Intelligent, Wise, Almighty Sovereign of the Universe... [which is] to be the great essential principle of morality, and consequently all civilization.

On January 21, 1810, in a letter to Dr. Benjamin Rush, John Adams wrote:

The Christian Religion, as I understand it, is the brightest of the glory and the express portrait of the eternal, self-evident, independent, benevolent, all-powerful and all-merciful Creator, Preserver and Father of the Universe, the first good, first perfect, and first fair. It will last as long as the world. Neither savage nor civilized man could ever have discovered or invented it. Ask me not then whether I am a Catholic or Protestant, Calvinist or Arminian. As far as they are Christians, I wish to be a fellow disciple of them all.

On August 28, 1811, in a letter to Dr. Benjamin Rush, John Adams wrote:

Religion and virtue are the only foundations, not only of republicanism and of all free government, but of social felicity under all governments and in all the combinations of human society.

In a letter to Mr. Warren, John Adams stated:

The Form of Government, which you admire, when its Principles are pure is admirable, indeed, it is productive of every Thing which is great and excellent among Men. But its Principles are as easily destroyed, as human Nature is corrupted... A Government is only to be supported by pure Religion or Austere Morals. Private, and public Virtue is the only Foundation of Republics.

On June 28, 1813, in a letter to Thomas Jefferson, John Adams wrote:

American Quotations.txt

The general principles, on which the Fathers achieved independence, were the only Principles in which that beautiful Assembly of young Gentlemen could Unite... And what were these general Principles? I answer, the general Principles of Christianity, in which all these Sects were United: And the general Principles of English and American Liberty, in which all those young Men United, and which had United all Parties in America, in Majorities sufficient to assert and maintain her Independence.

Now I will avow, that I then believe, and now believe, that those general Principles of Christianity, are as eternal and immutable, as the Existence and Attributes of God; and that those Principles of Liberty, are as unalterable as human Nature and our terrestrial, mundane System.

John Adams wrote to Thomas Jefferson:

Have you ever found in history, one single example of a Nation thoroughly corrupted that was afterwards restored to virtue?... And without virtue, there can be no political liberty.... Will you tell me how to prevent riches from becoming the effects of temperance and industry?

Will you tell me how to prevent luxury from producing effeminy, intoxication, extravagance, vice and folly?... I believe no effort in favour of virtue is lost.

On September 14, 1813, in a letter to Thomas Jefferson, John Adams wrote:

My adoration of the author of the Universe is too profound and too sincere. The love of God and his creation - delight, joy, triumph, exultation in my own existence - though but an atom, a molecule organic, in the Universe - these are my religion.

On December 3, 1813, in a letter to Thomas Jefferson, John Adams wrote:

Allegiance to the Creator and Governor of the Milky-Way, and the Nebulae, and benevolence to all his creatures, is my Religion.

On December 25, 1813, in a letter to Thomas Jefferson, John Adams wrote:

I have examined all religions, as well as my narrow sphere, my straightened means, and my busy life, would allow; and the result is that the Bible is the best Book in the world. It contains more philosophy than all the libraries I have seen.

In 1814, in letter number 16 of a thirty-two letter series refuting John Taylor's critical book against Adams' policies, John Adams wrote:

Religion, however, has been so universally associated with government, that it is impossible to separate them in this inquiry.

On January 13, 1815, in a letter to Judge F.A. Van der Kemp, John Adams stated:

I have searched after truth by every means and by every opportunity in my power, and with a sincerity and impartiality, for which I can appeal to God, my adored Maker.

My religion is founded on the love of God and my neighbor; in the hope of pardon for my offenses; upon contrition; upon the duty as well as the necessity of supporting with patience the inevitable evils of life; in the duty of doing no wrong, but all the good I can, to the creation, of which I am but an infinitesimal part. I believe, too, in a future state of rewards and punishments....

On June 20, 1815, John Adams wrote to Thomas Jefferson:

The question before the human race is, whether the God of nature shall govern the world by His own laws.

On August 9, 1816, in a letter to Thomas Jefferson, John Adams wrote:

Let us then wish for immortality at all hazards, and trust the Ruler with his skies. I do; and earnestly wish for his commands, which to the utmost of my power shall be implicitly and piously obeyed.

On November 4, 1816, John Adams wrote to Thomas Jefferson:

Conclude not from all this that I have renounced the Christian religion. Far from it. I see in every page something to recommend Christianity in its purity, and something to discredit its corruptions... The Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount contain my religion.

On December 27, 1816, in a letter to Judge F.A. Van de Kemp, John Adams wrote:

As I understand the Christian religion, it was, and is, a revelation... Let it once be revealed or demonstrated that there is no future state, and my advice to every man, woman, and child, would be, as our existence would be in our own power, to take opium. For, I am certain there is nothing in this world worth living for but hope, and every hope will fail us, if the last hope, that of a future state, is extinguished.

On April 19, 1817, John Adams wrote to Thomas Jefferson:

Without religion, this world would be something not fit to be mentioned in polite company.
... The most abandoned scoundrel that ever existed, never yet wholly extinguished his Conscience and while Conscience remains, there is some religion.

On October 7, 1818, John Adams wrote to Thomas Jefferson:

American Quotations.txt

Now, sir, for my griefs! The dear partner of my life for 54 years as a wife and for many more as a lover, now lies in extremis, forbidden to speak or to be spoken to... If human life is a bubble, no matter how soon it breaks, if it is, as I firmly believe, an immortal existence, we ought patiently to wait the instructions of the great Teacher.

I am, Sir, your deeply afflicted friend,
John Adams

John Adams wrote:

That you and I shall meet in a better world I have no doubt than we now exist on the same globe; if my reason did not convince me of this, Cicero's Dream of Scipio, and his Essay on Friendship and Old Age would have been sufficient for that purpose. But Jesus taught us that a future state is a social state, when He promised to prepare places in His Father's house of many mansions, for His disciples.

The moment the idea is admitted into society that property is not as sacred as the laws of God... anarchy and tyranny commence. Property must be secured or liberty cannot exist.

John Adams and Thomas Jefferson were on opposite sides of several major political issues, and many times engaged in heated debates. John Adams, the 2nd President, was succeeded in office by Thomas Jefferson. So strong were his feelings against Jefferson at the time, that Adams even left Washington, D.C., to avoid being at Jefferson's Inauguration.

Later in life, though, the two became the best of friends. Their correspondence reveals, not only their faith, but also their friendship. John Adams and Thomas Jefferson both died on the same day, July 4, 1826, exactly 50 years after they had signed the Declaration of Independence. Once a hardened political opponent of Jefferson's, John Adams' last words were:

Thank God, Jefferson lives!

Williamson, Hugh (December 5, 1735-May 22, 1819), was a signer of the U.S. Constitution. He was a member of the Continental Congress; a member of the U.S. House of Representatives, 1789-93; a land speculator; and a scientist, having joined with Dr. Franklin in many of his electrical experiments.

As a young man, Hugh Williamson studied for the ministry, visiting and praying for the sick in his neighborhood. After his father died, he pursued the study of divinity, and went on to become a preacher:

In 1759 he went to Connecticut, where he pursued his theological studies and was licensed to preach. After returning from Connecticut, he was admitted to membership in the Presbytery of Philadelphia... [and there] preached nearly two years.

Unfortunately, it became apparent that a chronic weakness in his chest would not permit him to continue in a career of public speaking.

Hugh Williamson then entered medical school, working as a professor in mathematics to finance his education. After graduation, he practiced in Philadelphia, and following travels in Europe became Surgeon General, distinguishing himself in medical service during the Revolutionary War.

After his service in Congress, Williamson became wealthy through investments and land speculations. He then wrote extensively for medical and literary societies, winning much acclaim.

In 1811, Hugh Williamson wrote a powerful book refuting the "higher criticism" of scripture. His book, entitled Observations of the Climate in Different Parts of America, provided a scientific explanation for the credibility of the Holy Scriptures in regard to Noah's flood and the events of Moses' exodus.

Henry, Patrick (May 29, 1736-June 6, 1799), was an American Revolutionary leader and orator, who spoke the phrase, "Give me Liberty or give me death!" He was Commander in Chief of the Virginia Militia, a member of the Virginia General Assembly and House of Burgesses, 1765; and a member of the Continental Congress, 1774-75. He was the five-time Governor of the State of Virginia, 1776-79, 1784-86, and was instrumental in writing the Constitution of Virginia.

Patrick Henry was offered numerous positions by President George Washington and Congress, but he declined them all, including: Secretary of State, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, U.S. Minister to Spain, U.S. Minister to France and U.S. Senator.

On the reverse of The Stamp Act Resolves, passed in the House of Burgesses, May 1765, Patrick Henry wrote:

This brought on the war which finally separated the two countries and gave independence to ours. Whether this will prove a blessing or a curse, will depend upon the use our people make of the blessings, which a gracious God hath bestowed on us.

If they are wise, they will be great and happy. If they are of a contrary character, they will be miserable.

Righteousness alone can exalt them as a nation. Reader! Whoever thou art, remember this, and in thy sphere practice virtue thyself, and encourage it in others.

(signed) P. Henry

Prior to the Revolution, in 1768, Patrick Henry rode for miles on horseback to a trial in Spottsylvania County. He entered the rear of the courtroom where three Baptist ministers were being tried for having preached without the sanction of the Episcopalian Church. In the midst of the proceedings, he interrupted:

May it please your Lordships, what did I hear read? Did I hear an expression that these men, whom you worships are about to try for misdemeanor, are charged with preaching the gospel of the Son of God?

In a courtroom speech, Patrick Henry stated:

I know, sir, how well it becomes a liberal man and a Christian to forget and forgive. As individuals professing a holy religion, it is our bounden duty to forgive injuries done us as individuals. But when the character of Christian you add the character of patriot, you are in a different situation. Our mild and holy system of religion inculcates an admirable maxim of forbearance. If your enemy smite one cheek, turn the other to him. But you must stop there. You cannot apply this to your country. As members of a social community, this maxim does not apply to you. When you consider injuries done to your country your political duty tells you of vengeance. Forgive as a private man, but never forgive public injuries. Observations of this nature are exceedingly unpleasant, but it is my duty to use them.

In a 1773 letter to Robert Pleasants, Patrick Henry expressed his disapproval of the slave trade:

I take this opportunity to acknowledge the receipt of Anthony Benezet's Book against the slave trade. I thank you for it....

Is it not amazing, that at a time when the rights of humanity are defined and understood with precision in a country above all others fond of liberty, that in such an age and in such a country, we find men professing a religion most humane, mild, meek, gentle and generous, adopting a Principle as repugnant to humanity, as it is inconsistent to the Bible and destructive to liberty?....

I will not, I cannot justify it.... I believe a time will come when an opportunity will be offered to abolish this lamentable evil....

It is a debt we owe to the purity of our Religion to show that it is at variance with that law which warrants slavery. I know not when to stop. I would say many things on this subject, a serious review of which gives gloomy perspective to future times.

On March 23, 1775, the Second Virginia Convention had been relocated from the House of Burgesses to St. John's Church in Richmond, because of increasing tensions between the Colonies and the British. Britain had burdens upon the Colonies as seen in the Currency Act (1764), the Sugar Act (1764), the Stamp Act (1765), the Quartering Act (1765), the Declaratory Act (1766), the Townshend Act (1767), the Tea Act (1773), the Boston Port Act (1774), the Justice Act (1774), the Massachusetts Government Act (1774), the Quartering Act (1774), the Quebec Act (1774), and the Proclamation of Rebellion (1775).

Patrick Henry stated:

No man thinks more highly than I do of the patriotism, as well as abilities, of the very worthy gentlemen who have just addressed the House. But different men often see the same subject in different lights; and, therefore, I hope that it will not be thought disrespectful to those gentlemen, if, entertaining as I do opinions of a character very opposite to theirs, I shall speak forth my sentiments freely and without reserve.

This is no time for ceremony. The question before the House is one of awful moment to this country. For my own part I consider it as nothing less than a question of freedom or slavery; and in proportion to the magnitude of the subject ought to be the freedom of the debate. It is only in this way that we can hope to arrive at truth, and fulfill the great responsibility which we hold to God and our country.

Should I keep back my opinions at such a time, through fear of giving offense, I should consider myself as guilty of treason towards my country, and of an act of disloyalty towards the majesty of heaven, which I revere above all earthly kings.

Mr. President, it is natural to man to indulge in the illusions of hope. We are apt to shut our eyes against a painful truth, and listen to the song of that siren, till she transforms us into beasts. Is this the part of wise men, engaged in a great and arduous struggle for liberty? Are we disposed to be of the number of those who, having eyes, see not, and having ears, hear not, the things which so nearly concern their temporal salvation?

For my part, whatever anguish of spirit it may cost, I am willing to know the whole truth -- to know the worst and to provide for it. I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided; and that is the lamp of experience. I know of no way of judging of the future but by the past. And judging by the past, I wish to know what there has been in the conduct of the British ministry for the last ten years, to justify those hopes with which gentlemen have been pleased to solace themselves and the House?

Is it that insidious smile with which our petition has been lately received? Trust it not, sir; it will prove a snare to your feet. Suffer not yourselves to be betrayed with a kiss. Ask yourselves how this gracious reception of our petition comports with these warlike preparations which cover our waters and darken our land.

Are fleets and armies necessary to a work of love and reconciliation? Have we shown ourselves so unwilling to be reconciled that force must be called in to win back our love? Let us not deceive ourselves, sir. These are the implements of war and subjugation -- the last arguments to which kings resort. I ask gentlemen, sir, what means this martial array, if its purpose be not to force us to submission?

Can gentlemen assign any other possible motives for it? Has Great Britain any enemy, in this quarter of the world, to call for all this accumulation of navies and armies?

No, sir, she has none. They are meant for us; they can be meant for no other. They are sent over to bind and rivet upon us those chains which the British ministry have been so long forging. And what have we to oppose to them? Shall we try argument? Sir, we have been trying that for the last ten years. Have we anything new to offer on the subject? Nothing.

We have held the subject up in every light of which it is capable; but it has been all in vain. Shall we resort to entreaty and humble supplication? What terms shall we find which have not been already exhausted? Let us not, I beseech you, sir, deceive ourselves longer.

Sir, we have done everything that could be done to avert the storm which is now coming on. We have petitioned; we have remonstrated; we have supplicated; we have prostrated ourselves before the throne, and have implored its interposition to arrest the tyrannical hands of the ministry and Parliament.

Our petitions have been slighted; our remonstrances have produced additional violence and insult; our supplications have been disregarded; and we have been spurned, with contempt, from the foot of the throne. In vain, after these things, may we indulge the fond hope of peace and reconciliation. There is no longer any room for hope.

If we wish to be free -- if we mean to preserve inviolate those inestimable privileges for which we have been so long contending -- if we mean not basely to abandon the noble struggle in which we have been so long engaged, and which we have pledged ourselves never to abandon until the glorious object of our contest shall be obtained, we must fight! I repeat it, sir, we must fight! An appeal to arms and to the God of Hosts is all that is left us!

They tell us, sir, that we are weak -- unable to cope with so formidable an adversary. But when shall we be stronger? Will it be the next week, or the next year? Will it be when we are totally disarmed, and when a British guard shall be stationed in every house? Shall we gather strength by irresolution and inaction? Shall we acquire the means of effectual resistance, by lying supinely on our backs, and hugging the delusive phantom of hope, until our enemies shall have bound us hand and foot?

Sir, we are not weak, if we make a proper use of the means which the God of nature hath placed in our power. Three millions of people, armed in the holy cause of liberty, and in such a country as that which we possess, are invincible by any force which our enemy can send against us. Besides, sir, we shall not fight our battles alone. There is a just God who presides over the destinies of nations, and who will raise up friends to fight our battles for us.

The battle, sir, is not to the strong alone; it is to the vigilant, the active, the brave. Besides, sir, we have no election. If we were base enough to desire it, it is now too late to retire from the contest. There is no retreat but in submission and slavery! Our chains are forged! Their clanking may be heard on the plains of Boston! The war is inevitable -- and let it come! I repeat it, sir, let it come!

It is in vain, sir, to extenuate the matter. Gentlemen may cry, "Peace! Peace!" -- but there is no peace. The war is actually begun! The next gale that sweeps from the north will bring to our ears the clash of resounding arms! Our brethren are already in the field! Why stand we here idle? What is it that gentlemen wish? What would they have? Is life so dear, or peace so sweet, as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery? Forbid it, Almighty God! I know not what course others may take; but as for me, give me liberty, or give me death!

On June 12, 1776, as a member of the committee chosen to draft the first constitution of the commonwealth of Virginia, Patrick Henry helped champion Article XVI of the Virginia Bill of Rights:

That religion, or the duty which we owe to our Creator, and the manner of discharging it, can be directed only by reason and conviction, not by force or violence; and therefore all men are equally entitled to the free exercise of religion, according to the dictates of conscience; and that it is the mutual duty of all to practice Christian forbearance, love, and charity towards each other.

In 1784, Patrick Henry supported a Bill establishing a "Provision for Teachers of the Christian Religion":

The general diffusion of Christian knowledge hath a natural tendency to correct the morals of men, restrain their vices, and preserve the peace of society...

Patrick Henry is attributed to have stated:

It cannot be emphasized too strongly or too often that this great nation was founded, not by religionists, but by Christians; not on religions, but on the Gospel of Jesus Christ. For this very reason peoples of other faiths have been afforded asylum, prosperity, and freedom of worship here.

Patrick Henry reprinted and distributed Soame Jennings' book, View of the Internal Evidence of Christianity.

In 1786, Patrick Henry wrote to his sister, Ann Christian, in Kentucky, upon learning of the death of her husband, Colonel William Christian:

Would to God I could say something to give relief to the dearest of women and sisters...

My heart is full. Perhaps I may never see you in this world. O may we meet in Heaven, to which the merits of Jesus will carry those who love and serve Him.

Heaven will, I trust, give you its choicest comfort and preserve your family. Such is the prayer of him who thinks it his honor and pride to be, Your Affectionate Brother, Patrick Henry.

In 1796, in a letter to his daughter, Patrick Henry stated:

Amongst other strange things said of me, I hear it is said by the deists that I am one of their number; and, indeed, that some good people think I am no Christian. This thought gives me much more pain than the appellation of Tory; because I think religion of infinitely higher importance than politics; and I find much cause to reproach myself that I have lived so long and have given no decided and public proofs of my being a Christian. But, indeed, my dear child, this is the character which I prize far above all this world has, or can boast.

Patrick Henry stated:

Bad men cannot make good citizens. It is impossible that a nation of infidels or idolaters should be a nation of free-men. It is when a people forget God, that tyrants forge their chains. A vitiated state of morals, a corrupted public conscience, is incompatible with freedom.

Patrick Henry, once interrupted while engaged in Bible reading, held up his Bible and said:

The Bible is worth all other books which have ever been printed, and it has been my misfortune that I have never found time to read it with the proper attention and feeling till lately. I trust in the mercy of Heaven that it is not yet too late.

Shortly before his death, in a letter to Archibald Blair, January 8, 1799, Patrick Henry commented on the French Revolution:

And, whilst I see the dangers that threaten ours from her [France's] intrigues and her arms, I am not so much alarmed as at the apprehension of her destroying the great pillars of all government and of social life, - I mean virtue, morality, and religion. This is the armor, my friend, and this alone, that renders us invincible. These are the tactics we should study. If we lose these, we are conquered, fallen indeed.

In failing health, Patrick Henry wrote in 1799 to President John Adams, to express regrets that he would not be able to serve as the U.S. Minister to France, nor the term he had been elected to in Virginia's legislature. Knowing his time was short he told his family:

Oh, how wretched should I be at this moment, if I had not made my peace with God!

While Patrick Henry was dying, he spoke:

Doctor, I wish you to observe how real and beneficial the religion of Christ is to a man about to die... I am, however, much consoled by reflecting that the religion of Christ has, from its first appearance in the world, been attacked in vain by all the wits, philosophers, and wise ones, aided by every power of man, and its triumphs have been complete.

On November 20, 1798, in his Last Will and Testament, Patrick Henry wrote:

I have now disposed of all my property to my family; there is one thing more I wish I could give them, and that is the Christian religion. If they had that, and I had not given them one shilling, they would be rich, and if they had not that, and I had given them all the world, they would be poor.

This is all the inheritance I give to my dear family. The religion of Christ will give them one which will make them rich indeed.

Bishop Meade wrote of Patrick Henry that:

His attachment to the [Episcopal] Church of his fathers is clearly established.

On behalf of the Henry family, Reverend Dresser wrote of Patrick Henry:

It is stated, in an article which I saw some time ago, from the Protestant Episcopalian, and, I presume, from one of you, that Patrick Henry was once an infidel, &c. His widow and some of his descendants are residing in this county, and I am authorized by one of them to say that the anecdote related is not true. He ever had, I am informed, a very abhorrence of infidelity, and actually wrote an answer to "Paine's Age of Reason," but destroyed it before his death. His widow informed me that he received the Communion as often as an opportunity was offered, and on such occasions always fasted until after he had communicated, and spent the day in the greatest retirement. This he did both while Governor and afterward. Had he lived a few years longer, he would have probably done much to check the immoral influence of one of his compatriots, whose works are now diffusing the poison of infidelity throughout our Land.

Patrick Henry's grandson, William Wirt Henry, described Henry as one who:

Looked to the restraining and elevating principles of Christianity as the hope of his country's institutions.

Patrick Henry Fontaine, also a grandson, said Patrick Henry had committed himself to the:

Earnest efforts to establish true Christianity in our country.

Hancock, John (January 12, 1737-October 8, 1793), was an American merchant and Revolutionary leader. He was a graduate of Harvard, 1754, a member of the Massachusetts Provincial Congress, 1766-72; and a member of the Continental Congress, 1774-78. He became well-known for being the first to sign the Declaration of Independence. He was the Governor of Massachusetts, 1780-85, 1787-93.

On March 5, 1774, on the occasion of the Boston Massacre, John Hancock gave an oration in Boston, which was printed in five pamphlet editions and widely circulated:

Some boast of being "friends to government": I am a friend to "righteous" government, to a government founded upon the principles of reason and justice....

I have the most animating confidence that the present noble struggle for liberty will terminate gloriously for America. And let us play the man for our GOD, and for the cities of our GOD; while we are using the means in our power, let us humbly commit our righteous cause to the great LORD of the universe, who loveth righteousness and hateth inequity.

- And having secured the approbation of our hearts, by a faithful and unwearied discharge of our duty to our country, let us joyfully leave her important concerns in the hands of HIM who raiseth up and putteth down empires and kingdoms of the world as HE pleases; and with cheerful submission to HIS sovereign will, devoutly say,

"Although the fig-tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines; the labour of the olives shall fail, and the fields shall yield no meat; the flock shall be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stalls; yet we will rejoice in the LORD, we will joy in the GOD of our salvation." (Habakkuk 3: 17-18)

While serving as President of the Massachusetts Provincial Congress in October of 1774, John Hancock urged the people of his colony to repentance:

We think it is incumbent upon this people to humble themselves before God on account of their sins, for He hath been pleased in His righteous judgment to suffer a great calamity to befall us, as the present controversy between Great Britain and the Colonies.

[And] also implore the Divine Blessing upon us, that by the assistance of His grace, we may be enabled to reform whatever is amiss among us, so that God may be pleased to continue to us the blessings we enjoy, and remove the tokens of His displeasure, by causing harmony and union to be restored between Great Britain and these Colonies.

The Massachusetts Provincial Congress agreed with John Hancock, concurring in late 1774:

Resistance to tyranny becomes the Christian and social duty of each individual... Continue steadfast and, with a proper sense of your dependence on God, nobly defend those rights which heaven gave, and no man ought to take from us.

On April 15, 1775, the Massachusetts Provincial Congress declared a Day of Public Humiliation, Fasting and Prayer, signed by the President of the Provincial Congress, John Hancock:

In circumstances dark as these, it becomes us, as Men and Christians, to reflect that, whilst every prudent Measure should be taken to ward off the impending Judgements... All confidence must be withheld from the Means we use; and reposed only on that GOD who rules in the Armies of Heaven, and without whose Blessing the best human Counsels are but Foolishness - and all created Power Vanity;

It is the Happiness of his Church that, when the Powers of Earth and Hell combine against it... that the Throne of Grace is of the easiest access - and its Appeal thither is graciously invited by the Father of Mercies, who has assured it, that when his Children ask Bread he will not give them a Stone...

RESOLVED, That it be, and hereby is recommended to the good People of this Colony of all Denominations, that THURSDAY the Eleventh Day of May next be set apart as a Day of Public Humiliation, Fasting and Prayer... to confess the sins... to implore the Forgiveness of all our Transgression... and a blessing on the Husbandry, Manufactures, and other lawful Employments of this People; and especially that the union of the American Colonies in Defence of their Rights (for hitherto we desire to thank Almighty GOD) may be preserved and confirmed... And that AMERICA may soon behold a gracious Interposition of Heaven.

By Order of the Provincial Congress,
John Hancock, President.

On November 8, 1783, Governor John Hancock, from Boston, Massachusetts, issued a Proclamation for a Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer to celebrate the victorious conclusion of the Revolutionary War:

John Hancock, Esquire
Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts
A Proclamation for a Day of Thanksgiving:

Whereas... these United States are not only happily rescued from the Danger and Calamities to which they have been so long exposed, but their Freedom, Sovereignty and Independence ultimately acknowledged.

And whereas... the Interposition of Divine Providence in our Favor hath been most abundantly and most graciously manifested, and the Citizens of these United States have every Reason for Praise and Gratitude to the God of their salvation.

Impressed therefore with an exalted Sense of the Blessings by which we are surrounded, and of our entire Dependence on that Almighty Being from whose Goodness and Bounty they are derived;

I do by and with the Advice of the Council appoint Thursday the Eleventh Day of December next (the Day recommended by the Congress to all the States) to be religiously observed as a Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer, that all the People may then assemble to celebrate... that he hath been pleased to continue to us the Light of the Blessed Gospel;... That we also offer up fervent Supplications... to cause pure Religion and Virtue to flourish... and to fill the World with his glory.

Paine, Thomas (January 29, 1737-June 8, 1809), was the American Revolutionary author who wrote a sixteen-pamphlet series entitled, The American Crisis, which he signed "Common Sense." Greatly fanning the flames of colonial independence, his first essay, issued December 23, 1776, was read out loud to the Colonial Army at Valley Forge by order of General Washington. In it, Thomas Paine wrote:

These are the times that try men's souls. the summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of his country; but he that stands it NOW, deserves the love and thanks of man and woman.

Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered; yet we have this consolation with us, that the harder the conflict, the more glorious the triumph.

What we obtain too cheaply, we esteem too lightly; 'tis dearness only that gives everything its value. Heaven knows how to put a price upon its goods; and it would be strange indeed if so celestial an article as FREEDOM should not be highly rated.

Britain, with an army to enforce her tyranny, has declared that she has a right (not only to TAX) but "to BIND us in ALL CASES WHATSOEVER," and if being bound in that manner, is not slavery, then is there no such a thing as slavery upon earth.

Even the expression is impious, for so unlimited a power can only belong to God...

I have as little superstition in me as any man living, but my secret opinion has ever been, and still is, that God Almighty will not give up a people to military destruction, or leave them unsupportedly to perish, who have so earnestly and so repeatedly sought to avoid the calamities of war, by every decent method which wisdom could invent.

Neither have I so much of the infidel in me, as to suppose that he has relinquished the government of the world, and given us up to the care of devils; and I do not, I cannot see on what grounds the king of Britain can look up to Heaven for help against us: a common murder, a highwayman, or a housebreaker, has as good a pretence as he....

Say not that thousands are gone, turn out your tens of thousands; throw not the burden of the day upon Providence, but "show your faith by your works" that God may bless you. It matters not where you live, or what rank of life you hold, the evil or the blessing will reach you all.

The far and the near, the home counties and the back, the rich and the poor, will suffer or rejoice alike.

The heart that feels not now is dead: the blood of his children will curse his cowardice, who shrinks back at a time when a little might have saved the whole and made them happy. I love the man that can smile in trouble, that can gather strength from distress, and grow brave by reflection.

'Tis the business of little minds to shrink; but he whose heart is firm, and whose conscience approves his conduct, will pursue his principles unto death.

The cause of America is in a great measure the cause of all mankind. Where, say some, is the king of America? I'll tell you, friend, He reigns above.

Yet that we may not appear to be defective even in earthly honors, let a day be solemnly set apart for proclaiming the charter; let it be placed on the divine law, the Word of God; let a crown be placed thereon.

The Almighty implanted in us these inextinguishable feelings for good and wise purposes. They are the guardians of His image in our heart. They distinguish us from the herd of common animals.

Attributed to Thomas Paine, The American Patriot's Prayer, written in 1776, reflected the sentiment of the colonies:

THE AMERICAN PATRIOT'S PRAYER

Parent of all, omnipotent
In heav'n and earth below,
Thro' all creation's bounds unspent,
Whose streams of goodness flow,

Teach me to know from whence I rose,
and unto what designed;
No private aims let me propose,

American Quotations.txt
Since linked with human kind.

But chief to hear my country's voice, may all my thoughts incline,
'Tis reason's law, 'tis virtue's choice,
 'Tis nature's call and thine.

Me from fair freedom's sacred cause,
 Let nothing e'er divide;
Grandeur, nor gold, nor vain applause,
 Nor friendship false misguide.

Let me not faction's partial hate
 Pursue to this land's woe;
Nor grasp the thunder of the state,
 To wound a private foe.

If, for the right, to wish the wrong
 My country shall combine,
Single to serve th' erroneous throng,
 Spirit of themselves, be mine.

In 1790, Benjamin Franklin wrote to Thomas Paine regarding his copy of the manuscript of The Age of Reason:

I have read your manuscript with some attention. By the argument it contains against a particular Providence, though you allow a general Providence, you strike at the foundation of all religion. For without the belief of a Providence that takes cognizance of, guards, and guides, and may favor particular persons, there is no motive to worship a Deity, to fear his displeasure, or to pray for his protection. I will not enter into any discussion of your principles, though you seem to desire it. At present I shall only give you my opinion that... the consequence of printing this piece will be a great deal of odium drawn upon yourself, mischief to you, and no benefit to others. He that spits into the wind, spits in his own face. But were you to succeed, do you imagine any good would be done by it?... Think how great a portion of mankind consists of weak and ignorant men and women and of inexperienced, inconsiderate youth of both sexes who have need of the motives of religion to restrain them from vice, to support their virtue... I would advise you, therefore, not to attempt unchaining the tiger, but to burn this piece before it is seen by any other person... If men are so wicked with religion, what would they be without it? I intend this letter itself as a proof of my friendship.

In retorting Thomas Paine's assertions, John Adams stated in his diary, July 26, 1796:

The Christian religion is, above all the Religions that ever prevailed or existed in ancient or modern times, the religion of Wisdom, Virtue, Equity, and Humanity. Let the Blackguard Paine say what he will; it is Resignation to God, it is Goodness itself to Man.

On November 30, 1802, in his last known letter to Thomas Paine, Samuel Adams wrote:

When I heard you had turned your mind to a defense of infidelity, I felt myself much astounded and more grieved, that you had attempted a measure so injurious to the feelings and so repugnant to the true interest of so great a part of the citizens of the United States. The people of New England, if you will allow me to use a Scripture phrase, are fast returning to their first love. Will you excite among them the spirit of angry controversy at a time when they are hastening to amity and peace? I am told that some of our newspapers have announced your intention to publish an additional pamphlet upon the principles of your Age of Reason. Do you think that your pen, or the pen of any other man, can unchristianize the mass of our citizens, or have you hopes of converting a few of them to assist you in so bad a cause.

Charles Carroll of Carrollton, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, described Paine's work as:

...blasphemous writings against the Christian religion.

Thomas Paine lost his popularity when he wrote The Age of Reason, a work embracing French Rationalism. In his later years, though, he is attributed with having stated:

I would give worlds, if I had them, if The Age of Reason had never been published. O Lord, help! Stay with me! It is hell to be left alone.

Thomas Paine stated:

Reputation is what men and women think of us; character in what God and the angels know of us.

Thomas Paine stated:

I believe in one God...and I hope for happiness beyond this life.

Thomas Paine, a man who was an "Englishman by birth, French citizen by decree, and American by adoption," gave his last words:

I die in perfect composure and resignation to the will of my Creator, God.

Carroll, Charles (September 19, 1737-November 14, 1832), was a member of the Continental Congress and one of the first signers of the Declaration of Independence. Born at Annapolis, Maryland, he became one of the richest men in the Colonies. Charles, who outlived all the other signers, made many daring speeches and greatly supported the patriot cause with his finances. When he signed his name to the Declaration, someone commented that there were many men with the name "Charles Carroll" and that the British would not know which one was him. He at once added "of Carrollton," and was known by that title ever since.

On November 4, 1800, in a letter to James McHenry, Charles Carroll, stated:

Without morals a republic cannot subsist any length of time; they therefore who are decrying the Christian religion, whose morality is so sublime and pure [and] which insures to the good eternal happiness, are undermining the solid foundation of morals, the best security for the duration of free governments.

On April 23, 1820, in a letter to Robert Goodloe, Charles Carroll, who was a member of a society to end slavery, stated:

[W]hy keep alive the question of slavery? It is admitted by all to be a great evil.

On September 27, 1825, in a letter to Charles W. Wharton, Esq., written from Doughoragen, Maryland, Charles Carroll stated:

On the mercy of my Redeemer I rely for salvation and on His merits not on the works I have done in obedience to His precepts.

On October 9, 1827, in a letter to the Rev. John Stanford, Charles Carroll, who was a Roman Catholic, stated:

To obtain religious as well as civil liberty I entered jealously into the Revolution, and observing the Christian religion divided into many sects, I founded the hope that no one would be so predominant as to become the religion of the State. That hope was thus early entertained, because all of them joined in the same cause, with few exceptions of individuals.

Allen, Ethan (January 21, 1738-February 12, 1789), was an American Revolutionary War leader and Commander of the Green Mountain Boys. On the morning of May 10, 1775, in a surprise attack, Allen's troops surrounded Fort Ticonderoga on Lake Champlain. Ethan Allen demanded that Captain de la Place surrender the fort instantly. The bewildered captain asked in whose name and in whose authority Allen was making such a demand. Ethan Allen responded:

In the Name of the Great Jehovah and the Continental Congress.

Duche', Jacob (January 31, 1738-January 3, 1798), was the Anglican clergyman. At the request of the Continental Congress, opened the first session of Congress with prayer. As recorded in the Journals of the Continental Congress, the first official act of Congress, immediately upon receiving the news that British troops had attacked Boston, was to open in prayer:

Tuesday, September 6, 1774. Resolved, That the Rev. Mr. Duche' be desired to open the Congress tomorrow morning with prayers, at the Carpenter's Hall, at 9 o'clock.

The 35th Psalm, the Psalter for September 7th, was read by Rev. Mr. Duche' in the first Continental Congress:

Plead my cause, Oh, Lord, with them that strive with me, fight against them that fight against me. Take hold of buckler and shield, and rise up for my help. Draw also the spear and the battle-axe to meet those who pursue me; Say to my soul, "I am your salvation."

Let those be ashamed and dishonored who seek my life;
Let those be turned back and humiliated who devise evil against me.

Rev. Mr. Duche' in Carpenter's Hall, Philadelphia, proceeded extemporaneously to offer the First Prayer in Congress on September 7, 1774:

Be Thou present, O God of Wisdom, and direct the counsel of this Honorable Assembly; enable them to settle all things on the best and surest foundations; that the scene of blood may be speedily closed; that Order, Harmony and Peace may be effectually restored, and that Truth and Justice, Religion and Piety, prevail and flourish among the people.

Preserve the health of their bodies, and the vigor of their minds, shower down on them, and the millions they here represent, such temporal Blessings as Thou seest expedient for them in this world, and crown them with everlasting Glory in the world to come. All this we ask in the name and through the merits of Jesus Christ, Thy Son and our Saviour, Amen.

The Journals of Congress record Congress' appreciation to Rev. Mr. Duche':

Wednesday, September 7, 1774, 9 o'clock a.m.
Agreeable to the resolve of yesterday, the meeting was opened with prayers by the Rev. Mr. Duche'. Voted, That the thanks of Congress be given to Mr. Duche'... for performing divine Service, and for the excellent prayer, which he composed and delivered on the occasion.

On May 17, 1776, The Journals of Congress recorded:

Resolved, That the Rev. Mr. Duche' be appointed chaplain to Congress, and that he be desired to attend
every morning at 9 O'Clock.

Herschel, Sir William (November 15, 1738-August 25, 1822), was an English astronomer. He discovered the planet "Uranus" and noted the recognition of double stars. He constructed the greatest reflecting telescopes of his time, with which he cataloged and studied the nebulae and galaxies as had never been done before.
It was Sir William Herschel who insisted:

The undevout astronomer must be mad.

du Pont de Nemours, Pierre Samuel (December 14, 1739-August 7, 1817), was a French-born American economist and politician. Along with his son, Eleuthere Irenee, he founded the E. I. DuPont de Nemours and Company, 1802, near Wilmington, Delaware. They began to produce a higher quality gun-powder which caused their company, especially after the War of 1812, to grow rapidly, eventually becoming the industrial giant of DuPont Industries.

Thomas Jefferson had commissioned DuPont de Nemours to survey and report on the status of American education in the early 1800's. He reported:

Most young Americans... can read, write and cipher. Not more than four in a thousand are unable to write legibly....

The Bible is read; it is considered a duty to read it to the children; and in that form of religion the sermons and liturgies in the language of the people tend to increase and formulate ideas of responsibility....

In America, a great number of people read the Bible, and all the people read a newspaper. The fathers read aloud to their children while breakfast is being prepared - a task which occupies the mothers for three-quarters of an hour every morning....

It is because of this kind of education that the Americans of the United States... have the advantage of having a larger proportion of moderately well-informed men.

New Guide to the English Tongue (1740), was published first in England by Thomas Dilworth, a distinguished educator and textbook writer. The book's popularity grew in the Colonies, until, by 1765, it was universally adopted in the New England schools. The book contained spelling, reading and grammar lessons, "adorned with proper Scriptures." Its first lesson, having words only three letters long or less, stated:

No Man may put off the Law of God.
The Way of God is no ill Way.
My Joy is in God all the Day.
A bad Man is a Foe to God.

Noah Webster, known as the "Schoolmaster to America," used only the Bible and the New Guide to the English Tongue, 1740, in his earliest school. Thomas Dilworth said he wanted to rescue:

Poor creatures from the Slavery of Sin and Satan by setting the word of God for a Lantern to our feet and a Light to our Paths.

French, Jonathan (1740-1809), was a pastor at South Church, Andover, 1772-1809, and was a trustee of Phillips Academy. He had served as a drummer during the Revolutionary War, and at Castle William in Boston Harbor. In June of 1746, one half of the French navy was sent to attack American interests on the Atlantic coast. By September the fleet had reached New England, but was so decimated by bad weather and disease that the venture was in jeopardy. The ministers in New England had mobilized to pray for the defense of the colonies. Rev. Jonathan French later wrote of the reaction of the people in the towns as the French vessels were first seen, and later turned away:

[People] were filled with consternation. The streets filled with men, marching for the defense of the ports, and the distresses of women and children, trembling for the event made... deep impressions upon the minds of those who remember these scenes.

But never did the religion, for which the country was settled, appear more important, nor prayer more prevalent, than on this occasion. A prayer hearing God, stretched forth the arm of His power, and destroyed that mighty Armament, in a manner almost as extraordinary as the drowning of Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea.

In 1746, Reverend Thomas Prince, who served as the Pastor of the South Church in Boston, described the incident:

While we knew nothing of Danger, God beheld it, and was working Salvation for us. And when we had none to help in America, He even prevented Friends in Europe from coming to succor us; that we might see our Salvation was his Work alone, and that the Glory belongs entirely to Him.

Toplady, Augustus Montague (1740-1778), composed the hymn, Rock of Ages, which originally appeared in the Gospel Magazine, October of 1775:

Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee.

Boudinot, Elias (May 2, 1740-October 24, 1821), was the President of the Continental Congress, 1782-83. He became a U. S. Representative from New Jersey, 1789-95, and helped frame the Bill of Rights. He was the Director of the U. S. Mint under Presidents George Washington and John Adams, 1795-97. He became a Christian during the Great Awakening, and was baptized by the Rev. George Whitefield. He helped found and served as the first President of the American Bible Society, 1816-21.

On July 4, 1783, in an address given in New Jersey, Dr. Elias Boudinot stated:

No sooner had the great Creator of the heavens and the earth finished His almighty work, and pronounced all very good, but He set apart...one day in seven for the commemoration of His inimitable power in producing all things out of nothing...

The deliverance of the children of Israel from a state of bondage to an unreasonable tyrant was perpetuated by the Paschal Lamb, and enjoining it on their posterity as an annual festival forever...The resurrection of the Savior of mankind is commemorated by keeping the first day of the week...

Let us then, my friends and fellow citizens, unite all our endeavors this day to remember, with reverential gratitude to our Supreme Benefactor, all the wonderful things He has done for us, in our miraculous deliverance from a second Egypt - another house of bondage.

On July 4, 1793, Elias Boudinot spoke at a Fourth of July celebration in Elizabethtown, New Jersey:

If the moral character of a people once degenerate, their political character must soon follow...These considerations should lead to an attractive solicitude...to be religiously careful in our choice of all public officers...and judge of the tree by its fruits.

Elias Boudinot stated:

"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" - Let it then (as workmanship of the same Divine hand) be our peculiar constant care and vigilant attention to inculcate this sacred principle, and to hand it down to posterity... Good government generally begins in the family, and if the moral character of a people once degenerate, their political character must soon follow.

Freeman, Nathaniel (March 28, 1741-September 20, 1827), was a jurist, soldier and politician. He served as Brigadier General of the Militia, 1781-93, a member of the Massachusetts state Legislature, and served Massachusetts as a representative to Congress, 1795-99. He served as a judge of Probate for 47 years and as a judge of Common Pleas for 30 years. In 1802, Judge Nathaniel Freeman gave a charge to the Massachusetts Grand Jury:

The laws of the Christian system, as embraced by the Bible, must be respected as of high authority in all our courts and it cannot be thought improper for the officers of such government to acknowledge their obligation to govern by its rule...

[Our government] originating in the voluntary compact of a people who in that very instrument profess the Christian religion, it may be considered, not a republic like Rome was, a Pagan but a Christian republic.

Chase, Samuel (April 17, 1741-June 19, 1811), was an attorney, jurist and politician. The son of an Anglican clergyman, he was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, served as the Chief Justice of the State of Maryland, 1791, and was appointed by George Washington as a U.S. Supreme Court Justice, 1796-1811. In the case of Runkel v. Winemiller, 1799, Justice Chase gave the court's opinion:

Religion is of general and public concern, and on its support depend, in great measure, the peace and good order of government, the safety and happiness of the people.

By our form of government, the Christian religion is the established religion; and all sects and denominations of Christians are placed upon the same equal footing, and are equally entitled to protection in their religious liberty.

In 1799, a dispute arose over whether Thomas M'Creery, an Irish emigrant, had in fact become naturalized as an American citizen and thereby able to leave an estate to a relative still living in Ireland. The court decided in M'Creery's favor based on a certificate executed before Justice Chase:

Thomas M'Creery, in order to become... naturalized according to the Act of Assembly... on the 30th of September, 1795, took the oath... before the Honorable Samuel Chase, Esquire, then being the Chief Judge of the State of Maryland... and did then and there receive from the said Chief Judge, a certificate thereof...:

"Maryland; I, Samuel Chase, Chief Judge of the State of Maryland, do hereby certify all whom it may concern, that... personally appeared before me Thomas M'Creery, and did repeat and subscribe a declaration of his belief in the Christian Religion, and take the oath required by the Act of Assembly of this State, entitled, An Act for Naturalization."

Warren, Joseph (June 11, 1741-June 17, 1775), was an American revolutionary patriot and physician. He sent Paul Revere on his midnight ride to Lexington, warning of the British advance. He graduated from Harvard in 1759, and became a physician in Boston in 1764. He was elected President pro-tempore of the Massachusetts Provincial Congress, April of 1775, and was commissioned as a major general in the Continental Army. Joseph Warren was killed in the Battle of Bunker Hill, June 17, 1775, and the Bunker Hill Memorial was erected where he fell.

On March 5, 1772, the second anniversary of the Boston Massacre, Joseph Warren delivered a commemorative speech:

If you perform your part, you must have the strongest confidence that the same Almighty Being who protected your pious and venerable forefathers, who enabled them to turn a barren wilderness into a fruitful field, who so often made bare His arm for their salvation, will still be mindful of you, their offspring.

May this Almighty Being graciously preside in all our councils. May He direct us to such measures as He Himself shall approve, and be pleased to bless.

May our land be a land of liberty, the seat of virtue, the asylum of the oppressed, a name and a praise in the whole earth, until the last shock of time shall bury the empires of the world in one common undisturbable ruin!

On April 26, 1775, Joseph Warren, then President of the Massachusetts Provincial Congress, addressed to the British the American account of the Battles of Lexington and Concord. He closed:

We sincerely hope that the Great Sovereign of the universe, who has so often appeared for the English nation, will support you in every rational and manly exertion with these colonies for saving it from ruin.

Langdon, John (June 26, 1741-September 18, 1819), was a merchant, soldier and a signer of the United States Constitution. He was a U.S. Senator, 1789-1801, and Governor of New Hampshire, 1805-08, 1810-11. A sixth generation American, he was the first citizen of considerable wealth to put himself and his fortune in jeopardy during the Revolution. He not only supplied arms and money to the Continental Army, but fought as a colonel in the militia as well.

John Langdon considered slothfulness the same as infidelity, as he stated in a speech before Congress:

There was evidence in New Hampshire of an "infidelity" in which the indolent, extravagant and wicked may divide the blessings of life with the industrious, the prudent and the virtuous.

John Langdon, as President (Governor) of New Hampshire, made this official Proclamation for a General Thanksgiving to the State on October 21, 1785:

A Proclamation For A General Thanksgiving:

THE munificent Father of Mercies, and Sovereign Disposer of Events, having been graciously pleased to relieve the UNITED STATES of AMERICA from the Calamities of a long and dangerous war: through the whole course of which, he continued to smile on the Labours of our Husbandmen, thereby preventing Famine (the almost inseparable Companion of War) from entering our Borders; - eventually restored to us the blessings of Peace, on Terms advantageous and honourable:

And since the happy Period, when he silenced the Noise of contending Armies, has graciously smiled on the Labours of our Hands, caused the Earth to bring forth her increase in plentiful Harvests, and crowned the present Year with new and additional Marks of his unlimited Goodness:

It therefore becomes our indispensable Duty, not only to acknowledge, in general with the rest of Mankind, our dependence on the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, but as a People peculiarly favoured, to testify our Gratitude to the Author of all our Mercies, in the most solemn and public manner.

I DO therefore, agreeably to a Vote of the General Court, appointing Thursday the 24th Day of November next, to be observed and kept as a Day of GENERAL THANKSGIVING throughout this State, by and with the Advice of Council, issue this Proclamation, recommending to the religious Societies of every Denomination, to assemble on that Day, to celebrate the Praises of our divine Benefactor;

to acknowledge our own Unworthiness, confess our manifold Transgressions, implore his Forgiveness, and intreat the continuance of those Favours which he had been graciously pleaded to bestow upon us;

that he would inspire our Rulers with Wisdom, prosper our Trade and Commerce, smile upon our Husbandry, bless our Seminaries of Learning, and spread the Gospel of his Grace over all the Earth.

And all servile Labour is forbidden on said Day.

GIVEN at the Council-Chamber in Concord, this Twenty-first Day of October, in the Year of our LORD, One Thousand Seven Hundred and Eighty-five, and in the Tenth Year of the Independence of the UNITED STATES of AMERICA.

As President (Governor) of the State of New Hampshire, John Langdon issued A Proclamation for a Day of Public Fasting and Prayer on February 21, 1786:

A Proclamation For A Day of Public FASTING and PRAYER Throughout this State [1786]:

Vain is the acknowledgement of a Supreme Ruler of the Universe, unless such acknowledgements influence our practice, and call forth those expressions of homage and adoration that are due to his character and providential government, agreeably to the light of nature, enforced by revelation, and countenanced by the practice of civilized nations, in humble and fervent application to the throne for needed mercies, and gratitude for favors received.

It having been the laudable practice of this State, at the opening of the Spring, to set apart a day for such denomination, to assemble together on said day, in their respective places of public worship;

that the citizens of this State may with one heart and voice, penitently confess their manifold sins and transgressions, and fervently implore the divine benediction, that a true spirit of repentance and humiliation may be poured out upon all orders and degrees of men, and a compleat and universal reformation take place:

that he who gave wisdom and fortitude in the scenes of battle, would give prudence and direction to extricate us from succeeding embarrassments, build up, support and establish this rising Empire;

particularly, that he would be pleased to bless the great Council of the United States of America, and direct their deliberations to the wise and best determinations, succeed our embassies at foreign Courts, bless our Allies, and national Benefactors:

that he would always be pleased, to keep this State under his most holy protection: that all in the legislature, executive and judicial departments, may be guided and supported by wisdom, integrity and firmness, that all the people through this State, and through the Land, may be animated by a true estimation of their privileges, and taught to secure, by their patriotism and virtue, what they have acquired by their valour:

that a spirit of emulation, industry, economy and frugality, may be diffused abroad, and that we may all be disposed to lead quiet and peaceable lives, in all godliness and honesty:

that he would be graciously pleased to bless us in the seasons of the year, and cause the earth to yield her increase, prosper our husbandry, merchandise, navigation and fishery, and all the labour of our hands, and give us to hear the voice of health in our habitations, and enjoy plenty of our borders:

that unanimity, peace and harmony, may be promoted and continue, and a spirit of universal philanthropy pervade the Land: that he would be pleased to smile upon the means of education, and bless every institution of useful knowledge;

and above all, that he would rain down righteousness upon the earth, revive religion, and spread abroad the knowledge of the true GOD, the Saviour of man, throughout the world.

And all servile labour and recreations are forbidden on said day.

GIVEN at the Council-Chamber in Portsmouth, this twenty-first day of February, in the year of our LORD, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, and in the tenth year of the Sovereignty and Independence of the United States of America.

John Langdon was one of the founders and the first President of the New Hampshire Bible Society, whose goal was to place a Bible into every home in New Hampshire.

Governor John Langdon was visited by President Monroe in 1817, as the President was making a tour of the New England States. The local newspaper reported the following article:

While at Portsmouth, the President spent that part of the Sabbath which was not devoted to public divine service, with that eminent patriot and Christian, John Langdon. His tarry at the mansion of Gov. L. was probably longer than the time devoted to any individual in New England. It is thus that the President has evinced his partiality to our most distinguished and illustrious citizen.

Greene, Nathaniel (August 7, 1742-June 19, 1786), was a General in the Revolutionary War. He served in the Rhode Island Legislature, 1770-72, 1775. On January 4, 1776, while at Camp Prospect Hill, General Nathaniel Greene wrote a letter to Samuel Ward, Rhode Island's representative to the Continental Congress:

Permit me, then, to recommend from the sincerity of my heart, ready at all times to bleed in my country's cause, a declaration of independence; and call upon the world, and the great God who governs it, to witness the necessity, propriety and rectitude thereof....

Let us, therefore, act like men inspired with a resolution that nothing but the frowns of Heaven shall conquer us.

Wilson, James (September 14, 1742-August 21, 1798), was a Supreme Court Justice appointed by President George Washington, 1789-98. Born and educated in Scotland, he held the distinction of being one of six Founding Fathers to sign both the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution. James Wilson was very active in the Constitutional Convention, having spoken 168 times. In 1790, James Wilson became the first Law Professor of the University of Pennsylvania.

In his Lectures on Law, delivered at the College of Philadelphia, 1789-91, James Wilson explained that all law comes from God, and can be divided into four categories: "law eternal," "law celestial," "laws of nature," and:

That law, which God has made for man in his present state; that law, which is communicated to us by reason and conscience, the divine monitors within us, and by the sacred oracles, the divine monitors without us....

As promulgated by reason and the moral sense it has been called natural; as promulgated by the holy scriptures, it has been called revealed law.

As addressed to men, it has been denominated the law of nature; as addressed to political societies, it has been denominated the law of nations.

But it should always be remembered, that this law, natural or revealed, made for men or for nations, flows from the same divine source; it is the law of God....

Human law must rest its authority, ultimately, upon the authority of that law, which is divine.

Far from being rivals or enemies, religion and law are twin sisters, friends, and mutual assistants. Indeed, these two sciences run into each other.

The first and governing maxim in the interpretation of a statute is to discover the meaning of those who made it.

In expounding on the "Will of God," James Wilson described it as the:

Efficient cause of moral obligation - of the eminent distinction between right and wrong.... [and therefore the] supreme law.... [It is revealed] by our conscience, by our reason, and by the Holy Scriptures.

In the records of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, Updegraph v. Commonwealth, 1824, Judge James Wilson is mentioned:

The late Judge Wilson, of the Supreme Court of the United States, Professor of Law in the College in Philadelphia, was appointed in 1791, unanimously, by the House of Representatives of this state.... He had just risen from his seat in the convention which formed the constitution of the United States, and of this state; and it is well known, that for our present form of government we are greatly indebted to his exertions and influence. With his fresh recollections of both constitutions, in his Course of Lectures (3d Vol. of his Works, 122), he states that.... Christianity is part of the common-law.

Ewald, Johannes (1743-1781), was a Danish lyric poet. Among his great dramas were Balder's Death and The Fisher, which contains the Danish national song, "King Christian Stood by the Lofty Mast." Johannes Ewald conceded:

In this little book (the New Testament), is contained all the wisdom of the world.

Jefferson, Thomas (April 13, 1743-July 4, 1826), was the 3rd President of the United States, 1801-09; approved the Louisiana Purchase and commissioned the Lewis and Clark Expedition, 1803; Vice-President under John Adams, 1797-1801; Rector of the University of Virginia, 1819; Secretary of State under George Washington, 1789-93; U.S. Minister to France, 1785-89; delegate to the Continental Congress, 1783-85; drafted the Virginia Constitution, 1783; Governor of Virginia, 1779-81; drafted the Declaration of Independence, 1776; alternate delegate to the Second Continental Congress, 1775-76; member of the Virginia House of Burgesses, 1768-79; married Martha Wayles Skelton, 1772; admitted to bar, 1767; graduated from the College of William and Mary, 1762; in addition to being an author, architect, educator and scientist.

In 1774, while serving in the Virginia Assembly, he personally introduced a resolution calling for a Day of Fasting and Prayer:

To invoke the Divine interposition to give to the American people one heart and one mind to oppose by all just means every injury to American rights.

On July 26, 1774, Thomas Jefferson drafted the "Resolutions of Freeholders of Albemarle County Virginia" which was accepted by the Virginia House of Burgesses:

And that we will ever be ready to join with our fellow-subjects in every part of the same, in executing all those rightful powers which God has given us, for the re-establishment and guaranteeing such their constitutional rights, when, where, and by whomever invaded...

In 1774, Thomas Jefferson wrote a pamphlet entitled "A Summary View of the Rights of British Americans," and sent it to the Virginia House of Burgesses as a proposed basis for the colony's delegates to the First Continental Congress:

The God who gave us liberty at the same time; the hand of force may destroy, but cannot disjoin them.

On July 6, 1775, the Continental Congress passed The Declaration of the Causes and Necessity for Taking Up Arms, composed by Thomas Jefferson, to explain to the British the presence of militiamen from several colonies gathering near Boston:

But a reverence for our great Creator, principles of humanity, and the dictates of common sense, must convince all those who reflect upon the subject, that government was instituted to promote the welfare on mankind, and ought to be administered for the attainment of that end....

Our cause is just. Our union is perfect. Our internal resources are great, and if necessary, foreign assistance is undoubtedly attainable....

We gratefully acknowledge, as signal instances of the Divine favour towards us, that His Providence would not permit us to be called into this severe controversy, until we were grown up to our present strength, had been previously exercised in warlike operation, and possessed of the means of defending ourselves.

With hearts fortified with these animating reflections, we most solemnly, before God and the world, declare, that, exerting the utmost energy of those powers, which our beneficent Creator hath graciously bestowed upon us, the arms we have been compelled by our enemies to assume, we will, in defiance of every hazard, with unabating firmness and perseverance, employ for the preservation of our liberties; being with one mind resolved to die freemen rather than to live slaves.....

With a humble confidence in the mercies of the Supreme and impartial God and Ruler of the Universe, we most devoutly implore His divine goodness to protect us happily through this great conflict, and to dispose our adversaries to reconciliation on reasonable terms, and thereby to relieve the empire from the calamities of civil war.

On July 4th, 1776, the words of the Declaration of Independence, which Thomas Jefferson penned, stated:

When in the Course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitles them....

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal. That they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life....

We, Therefore, the Representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress, Assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions....

And for the support of this Declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our Lives, our Fortunes, and our sacred Honor.

Shortly after the signing of the Declaration of Independence, a committee was appointed to draft a seal for the newly united states which would express the spirit of this new nation. Thomas Jefferson proposed:

The children of Israel in the wilderness, led by a cloud by day, and a pillar of fire by night.

During the period between 1779-81, Thomas Jefferson served as the Governor of Virginia. On November 11, 1779, Governor Thomas Jefferson issued a Proclamation Appointing a Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer.

Public and solemn thanksgiving and prayer to Almighty God.... That He would in mercy look down upon us, pardon all our sins, and receive us into His favour; and finally, that He would establish the independence of these United States upon the basis of religion and virtue, and support and protect them in the enjoyment of peace, liberty and safety.

In 1781, Thomas Jefferson made this statement in Query XVIII of his Notes on the State of Virginia. Excerpts of these statements are engraved on the Jefferson Memorial in Washington, D. C. :

God who gave us life gave us liberty. And can the liberties of a nation be thought secure when we have removed their only firm basis, a conviction in the minds of the people that these liberties are of the Gift of God? That they are not to be violated but with His wrath? Indeed, I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just; that His justice cannot sleep forever;

That a revolution of the wheel of fortune, a change of situation, is among possible events; that it may become probable by Supernatural influence! The Almighty has no attribute which can take side with us in that event.

In Query XIX of his Notes on the State of Virginia, 1781-1785, Thomas Jefferson wrote:

Those who labor in the earth are the chosen people of God... whose breasts He has made His peculiar deposit for substantial and genuine virtue.

On August 19, 1785, in a letter to Peter Carr, Thomas Jefferson wrote:

He who permits himself to tell a lie once, finds it much easier to do it a second and third time, till at length it becomes habitual; he tells lies without attending to it, and truths without the world's believing him. This falsehood of the tongue leads to that of the heart, and in time depraves all its good dispositions.

Thomas Jefferson's Notes on the State of Virginia were also part of the Republican Notes on Religion and an Act Establishing Religious Freedom, Passed in the Assembly of Virginia, in the Year 1786:

Our rulers can have no other authority over such natural rights, only as we have submitted to them (in a social compact). The rights of conscience we never submitted, we could not submit. We are answerable for them to our God...

In Thomas Jefferson's Republican Notes on Religion and an Act Establishing Religious Freedom, Passed in the Assembly of Virginia, in the Year 1786, reference is made to a law passed in 1705:

By our own act of assembly of 1705, c. 30, if a person brought up in the Christian religion denies the being of a God, or the Trinity, or asserts there are more gods than one, or denies the Christian religion to be true, or the Scriptures to be of divine authority, he is punishable on the first offense by incapacity to hold any office of employment, ecclesiastical, civil or military; on the second by disability to sue, to take any gift or legacy, to be guardian, executor, or administrator, and by three years' imprisonment without bail.

On January 16, 1786, Thomas Jefferson and the Committee on Religion drafted a bill for the Virginia Assembly guaranteeing religious freedom:

An Act for establishing Religious Freedom. I.

Well aware... that Almighty God hath created the mind free, and manifested His Supreme Will that free it shall remain by making it altogether insusceptible of restraints; that all attempts to influence it by temporal punishments, or burdens, or by civil incapacitations, tend only to beget habits of hypocrisy and meanness, and are a departure from the plan of the Holy Author of religion, who being Lord both of body and mind, yet chose not to propagate it by coercions on either, as was in his Almighty power to do, but to extend it by its influence on reason alone.

On September 11, 1790, just prior to the outbreak of the French Revolution, King Louis XVI sent a note to President Washington and the U.S. Congress expressing his gratitude for the service Thomas Jefferson had preformed as the U.S. Minister to France:

To our very dear friends and allies, the President and Members of the General Congress of the United States of North America.

Very Dear Great Friends and Allies: We have received the letter by which you inform us of the new mark of confidence that you have shown to Mr. Jefferson, and which puts a period to his appointment of minister plenipotentiary at our Court.

The manner in which he conducted during his residence with us has merited our esteem and entire approbation, and it is with pleasure that we now give him this testimony of it.

It is with the most sincere pleasure that we embrace this opportunity of renewing these assurances of regard and friendship which we feel for the United States in general and for each of them in particular. Under their influence we pray God that He will keep you, very dear friends and allies, under His holy and beneficent protection.

Done at Paris this 11th September, 1790. Your friend and ally, LOUIS. Montmorin. [seal].

On May 23, 1797, Vice-President Thomas Jefferson, as President of the Senate, addressed President John Adams:

And the Senate can not suffer the present occasion to pass without thus publicly and solemnly expressing their attachment to the Constitution and Government of their country; and as they hold themselves responsible to their constituents, their consciences, and their God, it is their determination by all their exertions to repel every attempt to alienate the affections of the people from the Government, so highly injurious to the honor, safety, and independence of the United States.

On November 16, 1798, Thomas Jefferson stated in the Kentucky Resolution:

Article III. Resolved, that it is true as a general principle, and is also expressly declared by one of the amendments to the Constitution that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people";

And that no power over the freedom of religion... [has been] delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States....

That thus was manifested their determination to retain to themselves the right of judging how far the licentiousness of speech and of the press may be abridged without lessening their useful freedom, and how far those abuses which cannot be separated from their use should be tolerated rather than the use be destroyed;

And thus also they guarded against all abridgement by the United States of the freedom of religious opinions and exercises, and retained to themselves the right of protecting the same, as this State, by a law passed in the general demand of its citizens, had already protected them... "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof..."

thereby guarding in the same sentence, and under the same words, the freedom of religion, of speech, and of the press, insomuch, that whatever violates either, throws down the sanctuary which covers the other, and that libels, falsehoods, defamation equally with heresy and false religion, are withheld from the cognizance of Federal tribunals...

On September 23, 1800, in a letter to Dr. Benjamin Rush, Thomas Jefferson wrote:

I have sworn upon the altar of God eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man.

On February 20, 1801, President-elect Thomas Jefferson responded to the notification of his election:

I know the difficulties of the station to which I am called, and feel and acknowledge my incompetence. But whatsoever of understanding, whatsoever of diligence, whatsoever of justice or of affectionate concern for the happiness of man, it has pleased Providence to place within the compass of my faculties shall be called forth for the discharge of the duties confided to me, and for procuring to my fellow-citizens all the benefits which our Constitution has placed under the guardianship of the General Government.

On Wednesday, March 4, 1801, in his First Inaugural Address, President Thomas Jefferson stated:

And let us reflect that having banished from our land that religious intolerance under which mankind so long bled and suffered, we have yet gained little if we countenance a political intolerance as despotic, as wicked, and capable of as bitter and bloody persecutions....

Sometimes it is said that man can not be trusted with the government of himself. Can he, then, be trusted with the government of others? Or have we found angels in the forms of kings to govern him? Let history answer this question. Let us, then, with courage and confidence pursue our own federal and republican principles....

Enlightened by a benign religion, professed, indeed, and practiced in various forms, yet all of them inculcating honesty, truth, temperance, gratitude, and the love of man; acknowledging and adoring an overruling Providence, which by all its dispensations proves that it delights in the happiness of man here and his greater happiness hereafter. With all these blessings, what more is necessary to make us a happy and prosperous people? Still one thing more, fellow citizens - a wise and frugal Government, which shall restrain men from injuring one another, shall leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement, and shall not take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned....

You should understand what I deem the essential principles of our Government.... Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political... abuses at the bar of the public reason; freedom of religion; freedom of the press, and freedom of person under the protection of the habeas corpus and trial by jury impartially selected....

And may that Infinite Power which rules the destinies of the universe, lead our councils to what is best, and give them a favorable issue for your peace and prosperity.

On December 8, 1801, in his First Annual Message to Congress, President Thomas Jefferson stated:

The wars and troubles which have for so many years afflicted our sister nations have at length come to an end, and that the communications of peace and commerce are once more opening among them. Whilst we devoutly return our thanks to the beneficent Being who has been pleased to breathe into them the spirit of consolation and forgiveness, we are bound with peculiar gratitude to be thankful to Him that our own peace has been preserved through a perilous season...

I can not omit recommending a revival of the laws on the subject of naturalization. Considering the ordinary chances of human life, a denial of citizenship under a residence of fourteen years is a denial to a great proportion of those who ask it, and controls a policy pursued from their first settlement by many of these States, and still believed of consequence to their prosperity; and shall we refuse to the unhappy fugitives from distress that hospitality which the savages of the wilderness extended to our fathers arriving in this land? Shall the oppressed humanity find no asylum of this globe?

Thomas Jefferson, while serving as the 3rd U.S. President (1801-09), chaired the school board for the District of Columbia. He authored the first plan of education adopted by the city of Washington, which used the Bible and Isaac Watts' Psalms, Hymns and Spiritual Songs, 1707, as the principal textbooks for teaching reading to students.

On March 23, 1801, President Thomas Jefferson wrote to Moses Robinson:

The Christian Religion, when divested of the rags in which they have enveloped it, and brought to the original purity and simplicity of its benevolent institutor, is a religion of all others most friendly to liberty, science, and the freest expansion of the human mind.

The Baptist denomination was one of the sects which had received severe persecution under the state Anglican church in several colonies prior to the Revolutionary War. There was concern that the newly formed Federal Government may choose a national denomination, similar to the Anglican Church in England and Virginia, the Lutheran Church in Germany, the Calvinist Church in Switzerland, or the Catholic Church in Italy and Spain, etc.

The Baptist Association of Danbury, Connecticut, wrote a letter to the newly elected President Thomas Jefferson, expressing their concern. In preparing his reply, Jefferson borrowed phraseology from the Baptist minister, Roger Williams, who founded the Baptist Church in America. Roger Williams had written:

When they have opened a gap in the hedge or wall of separation between the garden of the church and the wilderness of the world, God hath ever broke down the wall itself, removed the candlestick, and made His garden a wilderness, as it is this day. And that therefore if He will ever please to restore His garden and paradise again, it must of necessity be walled in peculiarly unto Himself from the world...

On January 1, 1802, President Thomas Jefferson replied to their concerns by sending a personal letter to Nehemiah Dodge, Ephraim Robbins, and Stephen Nelson of the Danbury Baptist Association, Danbury, Connecticut, calming their fears that Congress was not in the process of choosing any one single Christian denomination in order to make it the "state" denomination. He stated:

The affectionate sentiments of esteem and approbation which you are so good as to express towards me, on behalf of the Danbury Baptists Association, give me the highest satisfaction.

My duties dictate a faithful and zealous pursuit of my constituents, and in proportion as they are persuaded of my fidelity to those duties, the discharge of them becomes more and more pleasing.

Believing with you that religion is a matter which lies solely between man and his God, that he owes account to none other for faith or his worship, that the legislative powers of government reach actions only, and not opinions, I contemplate with solemn reverence that act of the whole American people which declared that their legislature should "make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," thus building a wall of separation between Church and State.

Adhering to this expression of the supreme will of the nation in behalf of the rights of conscience, I shall see with sincere satisfaction the progress of those sentiments which tend to restore man to all his natural rights, convinced he has no natural right in opposition to his social duties.

I reciprocate your kind prayers for the protection and blessing of the common Father and Creator of man, and tender you for yourselves and your religious association, assurances of my high respect and esteem.

Although Thomas Jefferson did sign the Declaration of Independence, he did not sign the United States Constitution. He was not present at the Constitutional Convention of 1787, nor was he there when the First Amendment was debated in the first session of Congress in 1789, as he was in France, serving as the U. S. Minister.

Due to his not being present to hear "first hand" the debates of the Founding Fathers regarding the First Amendment, Thomas Jefferson had to rely on second-hand information to learn of what transpired, rendering his letter to the Danbury Baptists, which was written thirteen years after the First Amendment, as a "third-hand" opinion, and ineligible to be considered a first-hand reflection of the intent of the Framers of the First Amendment.

Dr. Joseph Priestly wrote an article giving much credit for the Constitution to Jefferson. On June 19, 1802, President Thomas Jefferson wrote to him in reply, correcting:

American Quotations.txt

One passage in the paper you enclosed me must be corrected. It is the following, "And all say it was yourself more than any other individual, that planned and established it," i.e., the Constitution. I was in Europe when the Constitution was planned, and never saw it till after it was established.

On April 30, 1802, President Thomas Jefferson signed the enabling act for Ohio to become a state. It stated that the government in this new state "not be repugnant to the [Northwest] Ordinance.":

The Northwest Ordinance - Article III. Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall be forever encouraged.

On Wednesday, December 15, 1802, in his Second Annual Message to Congress, President Thomas Jefferson stated:

When we assemble together, fellow-citizens, to consider the state of our beloved country, our just attentions are first drawn to those pleasing circumstances which mark the goodness of that Being from whose favor they flow and the large measure of thankfulness we owe for His bounty.

Another year has come around, and finds us still blessed with peace and friendship abroad; law, order, and religion at home; good affection and harmony with our Indian neighbors; our burdens lightened, yet our income sufficient for the public wants, and the produce of the year great beyond example. These, fellow-citizens, are the circumstances under which we meet, and we remark with special satisfaction those which under the smiles of Providence result from the skill, industry, and order of our citizens....

When merely by avoiding false objects of expense we are able, without a direct tax, without internal taxes, and without borrowing to make large and effectual payments toward the discharge of our public debt and the emancipation of our posterity from that mortal canker, it is an encouragement, fellow-citizens, of the highest order to proceed as we have begun in substituting economy for taxation.

On April 9, 1803, in a letter to Dr. Joseph Priestly, President Thomas Jefferson wrote concerning Jesus:

His system of morality was the most benevolent and sublime probably that has been ever taught, and consequently more perfect than those of any of the ancient philosophers.

On April 21, 1803, President Thomas Jefferson wrote to Dr. Benjamin Rush, who was also a signer of the Declaration of Independence:

My views...are the result of a life of inquiry and reflection, and very different from the anti-christian system imputed to me by those who know nothing of my opinions. To the corruptions of Christianity I am, indeed, opposed; but not to the genuine precepts of Jesus himself. I am a Christian in the only sense in which he wished any one to be; sincerely attached to his doctrines in preference to all others.

Continuing in his letter to Dr. Benjamin Rush, April 21, 1803, President Thomas Jefferson wrote of Jesus:

His system of morals...if filled up in the style and spirit of the rich fragments He left us, would be the most perfect and sublime that has ever been taught by man...He corrected the deism of the Jews, confirming them in their belief of one only God, and giving them juster notions of His attributes and government....

The precepts of philosophy, and of the Hebrew code, laid hold of actions only. He pushed his scrutinies into the hearts of man, erected his tribunal in the region of thoughts, and purified the waters at the fountainhead....

Of all the systems of morality, ancient and modern, which have come under my observation, none appear to me so pure as that of Jesus.

On October 17, 1803, in his Third Annual Message to Congress, President Thomas Jefferson stated:

We have seen with sincere concern the flames of war lighted up again in Europe, and nations with which we have the most friendly and useful relations engaged in mutual destruction. While we regret the miseries in which we see others involved, let us bow with gratitude to that kind Providence which, inspiring with wisdom and moderation our late legislative councils while placed under the urgency of the greatest wrongs, guarded us from hastily entering into the sanguinary contest and left us only to look on and to pity its ravages.

On December 3, 1803, it was recommended by President Thomas Jefferson that the Congress of the United States pass a treaty with the Kaskaskia Indians. Included in this treaty was the annual support to a Catholic missionary priest of $100, to be paid out of the Federal treasury. Later in 1806 and 1807, two similar treaties were made with the Wyandotte and Cherokee tribes. The treaty provided:

And whereas the greater part of the said tribe have been baptized and received into the Catholic Church, to which they are much attached, the United States will give annually, for seven years, one hundred dollars toward the support of a priest of that religion, who will engage to perform for said tribe the duties of his office, and also to instruct as many of their children as possible, in the rudiments of literature, and the United States will further give the sum of three hundred dollars, to assist the said tribe in the erection of a church.

President Thomas Jefferson also extended, three times, a 1787 act of Congress in which special lands were designated:

For the sole use of Christian Indians and the Moravian Brethren missionaries for civilizing the Indians and promoting Christianity.

On June 17, 1804, President Thomas Jefferson wrote to Henry Fry:

I consider the doctrines of Jesus as delivered by himself to contain the outlines of the sublimest system of morality that has ever been taught but I hold in the most profound detestation and execration the corruptions of it which have been invented.

On September 11, 1804, in a letter to Abigail Adams, President Thomas Jefferson wrote:

Nothing in the Constitution has given them [federal judges] a right to decide for the Executive, more than to the Executive to decide for them... But the opinion which gives to the judges the right to decide what laws are constitutional, and what not, not only for themselves in their own sphere of action, but for the legislature and executive also, in their spheres, would make the judiciary a despotic branch.

In 1804, in a letter to John Page, President Thomas Jefferson wrote:

Whatever is to be our destiny, wisdom as well as duty dictates that we should acquiesce to the will of Him whose it is to give and take away, and be contented in the enjoyment of those (loved ones) who are still permitted to be with us.

On Monday, March 4, 1805, in his Second Inaugural Address, President Thomas Jefferson stated:

I know that the acquisition of Louisiana has been disapproved by some from a candid apprehension that the enlargement of our territory would endanger the union, but who can limit the extent to which the federative principle may operate effectively?...

In matters of religion I have considered that its free exercise is placed by the Constitution independent of the powers of the General Government. I have therefore undertaken, on no occasion, to prescribe the religious exercise suited to it; but have left them, as the Constitution found them, under the direction and discipline of state and church authorities by the several religious societies....

I shall now enter on the duties to which my fellow-citizens have again called me, and shall proceed in the spirit of those principles which they have approved... I shall need, therefore, all the indulgence I have heretofore experienced from my constituents; the want of it will certainly not lessen with increasing year.

I shall need, too, the favor of that Being in whose hands we are, who led our forefathers, as Israel of old, from their native land and planted them in a country flowing with all the necessities and comforts of life, who has covered our infancy with His Providence and our riper years with His wisdom and power, and to whose goodness I ask you to join with me in supplications that He will so enlighten the minds of your servants, guide their councils and prosper their measures, that whatever they do shall result in your good, and shall secure to you the peace, friendship and approbation of all nations.

On March 4, 1805, President Thomas Jefferson offered a National Prayer for Peace:

Almighty God, Who has given us this good land for our heritage; We humbly beseech Thee that we may always prove ourselves a people mindful of Thy favor and glad to do Thy will. Bless our land with honorable ministry, sound learning, and pure manners. Save us from violence, discord, and confusion, from pride and arrogance, and from every evil way. Defend our liberties, and fashion into one united people the multitude brought hither out of many kindreds and tongues.

Endow with Thy spirit of wisdom those to whom in Thy Name we entrust the authority of government, that there may be justice and peace at home, and that through obedience to Thy law, we may show forth Thy praise among the nations of the earth. In time of prosperity fill our hearts with thankfulness, and in the day of trouble, suffer not our trust in Thee to fail; all of which we ask through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

On December 3, 1805, in his Fifth Annual Message to Congress, President Thomas Jefferson stated:

In taking a view of the state of our country we in the first place notice the late affliction of two of our cities under the fatal fever which in latter times has occasionally visited our shores. Providence in His goodness gave it an early termination on this occasion and lessened the number of victims which have usually fallen before it.

On February 19, 1806, in a message to Congress, President Thomas Jefferson stated:

In pursuance of a measure proposed to Congress by a message of January 18, 1803, and sanctioned by their approbation for carrying it into execution, Captain Meriwether Lewis, of the First Regiment of infantry, was appointed, with a party of men, to explore the river Missouri from its mouth to its source, and, crossing the highlands by the shortest portage, to seek the best water communication thence to the Pacific Ocean; and Lieutenant Clarke was appointed second in command.

As President, Thomas Jefferson not only signed bills which appropriated financial support for chaplains in Congress and in the armed services, but he also signed the Articles of War, April 10, 1806, in which he:

Earnestly recommended to all officers and soldiers, diligently to attend divine services.

On January 23, 1808, in a letter to Samuel Miller, President Thomas Jefferson wrote:

I consider the government of the United States as interdicted by the Constitution from intermeddling with religious institutions, their doctrines, discipline, or exercises. This results not only from the provision that no law shall be made respecting the establishment or free exercise of religion, but from that also which reserves to the states the powers not delegated to the United States [10th Amendment].

Certainly no power to prescribe any religious exercise, or to assume authority in religious discipline, has been delegated to the General government. It must then rest with the States as far as it can be in any human authority....

I do not believe it is for the interest of religion to invite the civil magistrate to direct its exercises, its discipline, or its doctrines.... Every religious society has a right to determine for itself the times for these exercises, and the objects proper for them, according to their own particular tenets.

On November 8, 1808, in his Eighth Annual Message to Congress, President Thomas Jefferson stated:

Looking forward with anxiety to their future destinies, I trust that in their steady character, unshaken by difficulties, in their love of liberty, obedience to law, and support of the public authorities I see a sure guaranty of the permanence of our Republic; and, retiring from the charge of their affairs, I carry with me the consolation of a firm persuasion that Heaven has in store for our beloved country long ages to come of prosperity and happiness.

President Thomas Jefferson stated:

No nation has ever yet existed or been governed without religion. Nor can be. The Christian religion is the best religion that has ever been given to man and I as chief Magistrate of this nation am bound to give it the sanction of my example.

In 1813, in a letter to John Adams, Thomas Jefferson wrote:

In extracting the pure principles which Jesus taught, we should have to strip off the artificial vestments in which they have been muffled... there will be found remaining the most sublime and benevolent code of morals which has ever been offered to man.

On September 18, 1813, Thomas Jefferson wrote to William Canby:

An eloquent preacher of your religious society, Richard Mote, in a discourse of much emotion and pathos, is said to have exclaimed aloud to his congregation that he did not believe there was a Quaker, Presbyterian, Methodist, or Baptist in heaven, having paused to give his hearers time to stare and to wonder. He added, that in Heaven, God knew no distinctions, but considered all good men as his children, and as brethren of the same family. I believe, with the Quaker preacher, that he who steadily observes those moral precepts in which all religions concur, will never be questioned at the gates of heaven, as to the dogmas in which they all differ. That on entering there, all these are left behind us, and the Aristides and Catos, the Penns and Tillotsons, Presbyterians and Baptists, will find themselves united in all principles which are in concert with the reason of the Supreme Mind.

On March 17, 1814, in a letter to Horatio G. Spafford, Thomas Jefferson wrote:

Merchants have no country. The mere spot they stand on does not constitute so strong an attachment as that from which they draw their gains.

On June 13, 1814, in a letter to Thomas Law, Jefferson acknowledged:

It shows how necessary was the care of the Creator in making the moral principle so much a part of our constitution as that no errors of reasoning or of speculation might lead us astray from its observance in practice.

On September 26, 1814, Thomas Jefferson wrote to Miles King:

...Nay, we have heard it said that there is not a Quaker or a Baptist, a Presbyterian or an Episcopalian, a Catholic or a Protestant in heaven; that on entering that gate, we leave those badges of schism behind... Let us not be uneasy about the different roads we may pursue, as believing them the shortest, to that our last abode; but following the guidance of a good conscience, let us be happy in the hope that by these different paths we shall all meet in the end. And that you and I may meet and embrace, is my earnest prayer. And with this assurance I salute you with brotherly esteem and respect.

In 1815, Thomas Jefferson stated:

We are not in a world ungoverned by the laws and the power of a Superior Agent. Our efforts are in His hand, and directed by it and He will give them their effect in His own time.

In 1816, Thomas Jefferson wrote:

The Life and Morals of Jesus of Nazareth, extracted textually from the Gospels in Greek, Latin, French and English - "A Table of the Texts from the Evangelists employed in this Narrative and the order of their arrangement."

In 1904, the fifty-seventh Congress, in order to restrain unethical behavior, voted:

That there be printed and bound, by photolithographic process, with an introduction of not to exceed twenty-five pages, to be prepared by Dr. Cyrus Adler, Librarian of the Smithsonian Institution, for the use of Congress, 9,000 copies of Thomas Jefferson's Morals of Jesus of Nazareth, as the same appears in the National Museum; 3,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 6,000 copies for the use of the House.

On January 9, 1816, in a letter to Charles Thomson, Thomas Jefferson wrote regarding his book, The Life and Morals of Jesus of Nazareth, which he had recently translated into other languages:

I have made this wee-little book...which I call the Philosophy of Jesus. It is a paradigm of his doctrines, made by cutting the texts out of the book and arranging them on the pages of a blank book, in a certain order of time and subject.

A more beautiful or precious morsel of ethics I have never seen; it is a document in proof that I am a real Christian, that is to say, a disciple of the doctrines of Jesus, very different from the Platonists, who call me an infidel, and themselves Christians and preachers of the gospel, while they draw all their characteristic dogmas from what its Author never said nor saw.

On August 6, 1816, Thomas Jefferson wrote to Mrs. Harrison Smith regarding his letter to Charles Thomson, January 9, 1816:

I recognize the same motives of goodness in the solicitude you express on the rumor supposed to proceed from a letter of mine to Charles Thomson, on the subject of the Christian religion. It is true that, in writing to the translator of the Bible and Testament, that subject was mentioned; but equally so that no adherence to any particular mode of Christianity was there expressed, nor any change of opinions suggested.

A change from what? That priests indeed have heretofore thought proper to ascribe to me religious, or rather anti-religious sentiments, of their own fabric, but such as soothed their resentments against the Act of Virginia for establishing religious freedom.

They wished him to be thought atheist, deist or devil, who could advocate freedom from their religious dictations. But I have ever thought religion a concern purely between our God and our consciences, for which we were accountable to Him, and not to the priests....

I have ever judged of the religion of others by their lives and by this test my dear Madam, I have been satisfied yours must be an excellent one to have produced a life of such exemplary virtue and correctness. For it is in our lives, and not from our words, that our religion must be read....

On September 6, 1819, Thomas Jefferson wrote:

The Constitution is a mere thing of wax in the hands of the judiciary, which they may twist and shape into any form they please.

On September 28, 1820, in a letter to William Jarvis, Thomas Jefferson wrote:

You seem...to consider the judges as the ultimate arbiters of all constitutional questions; a very dangerous doctrine indeed, and one which would place us under the despotism of an oligarchy. Our judges are as honest as other men, and not more so...and their power [is] the more dangerous, as they are in office for life and not responsible, as the other functionaries are, to the elective control.

The Constitution has erected no such single tribunal, knowing that to whatever hands confided, with corruptions of time and party, its members would become despots.

On November 4, 1820, Thomas Jefferson wrote to Jared Sparks:

I hold the precepts of Jesus as delivered by Himself, to be the most pure, benevolent and sublime which have ever been preached to man.

In 1821, in a letter to Mr. Hammond, Thomas Jefferson wrote:

The germ of dissolution of our federal government is in...the federal judiciary; an irresponsible body (for impeachment is scarcely a scare-crow) working like gravity by night and by day, gaining a little today and a little to-morrow, and advancing its noiseless step like a thief, over the field of jurisdiction, until all shall be usurped from the States.

On October 7, 1822, in a memorandum clarifying the regulations of the University of Virginia, Thomas Jefferson wrote:

The relations which exist between man and his Maker, and the duties resulting from those relations, are the most interesting and important to every human being, and most incumbent on his study and investigation.

On April 11, 1823, in a letter to John Adams, Thomas Jefferson remarked:

I hold (without appeal to revelation) that when we take a view of the Universe, in its parts general or particular, it is impossible for the human mind not to perceive and feel a conviction of design, consummate skill, and indefinite power in every atom of its composition....

It is impossible, I say, for the human mind not to believe that there is, in all this, design, cause and effect, up to an Ultimate Cause, a Fabricator of all things from matter to motion, their Preserver and Regulator, while permitted to exist in their present forms, and their Regenerator into new and other forms.

We see, too, evident proofs of the necessity of a Superintending Power to maintain the Universe in its course and order....

So irresistible are these evidences of an Intelligent and Powerful Agent that, of the infinite numbers of men who have existed thro' all time, they have believed, in the proportion of a million at least to Unit, in the hypothesis of an eternal pre-existence of a Creator, rather than in that of self-existent Universe...

On June 12, 1823, in a letter to Supreme Court Justice William Johnson (December 27, 1771-August 4, 1834), regarding the meaning to the Constitution, Thomas Jefferson wrote:

On every question of construction, carry ourselves back to the time when the Constitution was adopted, recollect the spirit manifested in the debates, and instead of trying what meaning may be squeezed out of the text, or invented against it, conform to the probable one in which it was passed.

On August 30, 1823, Thomas Jefferson wrote James Madison regarding the Declaration of Independence:

I know that I turned to neither book nor pamphlet while writing it. I did not consider it as any part of my charge to invent new ideas altogether, and to offer no sentiments which had never been expressed before... I pray God that these principles may be eternal, and close the prayer with my affectionate wishes for yourself of long life, health and happiness.

On February 21, 1825, in a letter to Thomas Jefferson Smith, the son of a friend, Thomas Jefferson gave the admonition:

Adore God. Reverence and cherish your parents. Love your neighbor as yourself. Be just. Be true. Murmur not at the ways of Providence. So shall the life into which you have entered be the Portal to one of eternal and ineffable bliss.

In establishing the University of Virginia, Thomas Jefferson not only encouraged the teaching of religion by recommending the establishment of a school of "Theology and Ecclesiastical History," but he also set aside a place inside the Rotunda for chapel services:

It is supposed probable, that a building of somewhat more size in the middle of the grounds may be called for in time, in which may be rooms for religious worship.

On April 7, 1824, the Board of Visitors of the University of Virginia, of which James Madison was a member, approved the regulations prepared by Thomas Jefferson, Rector of the University, which stated:

Should the religious sects of this State, or any of them, according to the invitation held out to them, establish within or adjacent to, the precincts of the University, schools for instruction in the religion of their sect, the students of the University will be free, and expected to attend religious worship at the establishment of their respective sects, in the morning, and in time to meet their school in the University at its stated hour....

The students of such religious school, if they attend any school of the University, shall be considered as students of the University, subject to the same regulations, and entitled to the same privileges....

The upper circular room of the rotunda shall be reserved for a library. One of its larger elliptical rooms on its middle floor shall be used for annual examinations, or lectures to such schools as are too numerous for their ordinary school room, and for religious worship, under the regulations to be prescribed by law.

In his plan for the University of Virginia, Thomas Jefferson outlined the responsibilities of the professor of ethics:

The proof of the being of a God, the Creator, Preserver, and Supreme Ruler of the Universe, the author of all the relations of morality, and the laws and obligations which these infer, will be in the province of the professor of ethics.

In 1813, Thomas Jefferson wrote concerning the curriculum of the University of Virginia:

The want of instruction in the various creeds of religious faith existing among our citizens presents... a chasm in general instruction of the useful sciences....

A remedy, however, has been suggested of promising aspect, which, while it excludes the public authorities from the domain of public religious freedom, will give to the sectarian schools of divinity the full benefit of public provisions made for instruction in the other branches of science....

It has, therefore, been in contemplation, and suggested by some pious individuals, who perceive the advantages of associating other studies with those of religion, to establish their religious schools on the confines of the University, so as to give to their students ready and convenient access and attendance on the scientific lectures of the University; and to maintain, by that means, those destined for religious professions on as high a standing of science, and of personal weight and respectability, as may be obtained by others from the benefits of the University.

Such establishments would offer the further and greater advantage of enabling the students of the University to attend religious exercise[s] with the professor of their particular sect, whether in rooms of the building still to be erected, and destined to that purpose under impartial regulations, as proposed in the same report of the commission, or in the lecturing room of such professor....

Such an arrangement would complete the circle of the useful sciences embraced by this institution, and would fill the chasm now existing, in principles which would leave inviolate the constitutional freedom of religion.

Thomas Jefferson also spoke highly using the local courthouse for religious services. When in Philadelphia, Thomas Jefferson attended Christ Church, along with George Washington, Robert Morris, Francis Hopkins, Alexander Hamilton, Betsy Ross and Benjamin Franklin. In Virginia, Jefferson attended Bruton Parish Church (Episcopalian) in Williamsburg, along with George and Martha Washington. In the catalog listing the books in his library, Thomas Jefferson wrote:

I am for freedom of Religion, and against all maneuvers to bring about a legal ascendancy of one sect over another.

Thomas Jefferson stated:

The doctrines which flowed from the lips of Jesus himself are within the comprehension of a child; but thousands of volumes have not yet explained the Platonisms engrafted on them.

Had the doctrines of Jesus been preached always as pure as they came from his lips, the whole civilized world would now have been Christians.

The Bible is the cornerstone of liberty. A student's perusal of the sacred volume will make him a better citizen, a better father, a better husband.

I have always said, I always will say, that the studious perusal of the Sacred Volume will make better citizens, better fathers, and better husbands.

1. The doctrines of Jesus are simple and tend to the happiness of man.
2. There is only one God, and He is all perfect.
3. There is a future state of rewards and punishment.
4. To love God with all the heart and thy neighbor as thyself is the sum of all. These are the great points on which to reform the religion of the Jews.

No one sees with greater pleasure than myself the progress of reason in its advance toward rational Christianity, and my opinion is that if nothing had ever been added to what flowed from His lips, the whole world would at this day been Christian....

Had there never been a commentator there never would have been an infidel. I have little doubt that the whole country will soon be rallied to the unity of our Creator, and, I hope, to the pure doctrines of Jesus also.

If a nation expects to be ignorant and free, in a state of civilization, it expects what never was and never will be.

Among the most inestimable of our blessings is that...of liberty to worship our Creator in the way we think most agreeable in His will; a liberty deemed in other countries incompatible with good government and yet proved by our experience to be its best support.

Thomas Jefferson and John Adams were on the opposite sides of several major political issues, many times resulting in heated debates. John Adams, the 2nd President, was succeeded in office by Thomas Jefferson. So strong were John Adams' feelings against Jefferson at the time, that Adams even left Washington, D.C., to avoid being at Jefferson's Inauguration.

Later in life, however, the two became the best of friends. Their correspondence reveals, not only their faith, but their friendship. In a providential coincidence, Thomas Jefferson and John Adams both died on the same day, July 4, 1826, exactly 50 years after they both had signed the Declaration of Independence. Once hardened political opponents, John Adams' last words were:

Thank God, Jefferson lives!

Inscribed on his grave is the epitaph Jefferson composed:

Here lies buried Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, author of the Statutes for Religious Freedom in Virginia, and father of the University of Virginia.

The Jefferson Memorial, on the south banks of Washington D.C.'s Tidal Basin, has inscribed in marble Thomas Jefferson's own words:

Almighty God hath created the mind free. All attempts to influence it by temporal punishments or burdens... are a departure from the plan of the Holy Author of our religion.

No man shall... suffer on account of his religious opinions or belief, but all men shall be free to profess and by argument to maintain, their opinion in matters of religion. I know but one code of morality for men whether acting singly or collectively.

Commerce between master and slave is despotism. Nothing is more certainly written in the Book of Life than that these people are to be free.

Quincy, Josiah (February 23, 1744-April 26, 1775), was an American Revolutionary patriot, lawyer, and orator of freedom. He wrote many patriotic articles and signed them, "An Independent" or, "An Old Man." His most notable work was Observations of the Act of Parliament Commonly called the Boston Port Bill with Thoughts on Civil Society and Standing Arms, 1774. Josiah Quincy was sent on a mission to England to argue the cause of the Colonists in 1774, and during his return trip, April 26, 1775, he died at sea. His son, Josiah Quincy, (1772-1864), was a U.S. Representative, 1805-18; and president of Harvard, 1829-45.

In response to the 1774 closing of the Boston harbor by the British, Josiah Quincy declared:

Blandishments will not fascinate us, nor will threats of a "halter" intimidate. For, under God, we are determined that wheresoever, whensoever, or howsoever we shall be called to make our exit, we will die free men.

Adams, Abigail Smith (November 22, 1744-October 28, 1818), was the wife of John Adams, the 2nd President of the United States, and the mother of John Quincy Adams, the 6th President. The daughter of Reverend William Smith, she married John Adams when she was 20 years old, and together they had five children. She strongly supported her husband's career. Her letters and memoirs are now considered major historical documents revealing life during the Revolutionary era.

On October 16, 1774, as tensions with Great Britain increased, Abigail wrote to her husband, John Adams, from their home in Braintree:

American Quotations.txt

I dare not express to you, at three hundred miles distance, how ardently I long for your return... And whether the end will be tragical, Heaven only knows. You cannot be, I know, nor do I wish to see you, an inactive spectator; but if the sword be drawn, I bid adieu to all domestic felicity, and look forward to that country where there are neither wars nor rumors of war, in a firm belief that through the mercy of its King we shall both rejoice there together...

Your most affectionate,
Abigail Adams.

On June 18, 1775, Abigail wrote to her husband, John Adams:

The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong; but the God of Israel is He that giveth strength and power unto His people. Trust in Him at all times, ye people, pour out your hearts before Him; God is a refuge for us.

Charlestown is laid in ashes. The battle began upon our entrenchments upon Bunker's Hill, Saturday morning about 3 o'clock, and has not ceased yet, and it is now three o'clock Sabbath afternoon. It is expected they will come out over the Neck tonight, and a dreadful battle must ensue. Almighty God, cover the heads of our countrymen, and be a shield to our dear friends...

Abigail Adams.

In a letter dated June 25, 1775, Abigail wrote to her husband, John Adams regarding the battle at Charlestown, Massachusetts:

We live in continual Expectation of Hostilities. Scarcely a day that does not produce some, but like Good Nehemiah having made our prayer with God, and set the people with their Swords, their Spears and their bows we will say unto them, Be not afraid of them. Remember the Lord who is great and terrible, and fight for your Brethren, your sons and your daughters, your wives and your houses...

They [British] delight on molesting us on the Sabbath. Two Sabbaths we have been in such Alarms that we have had no meetings. This day we have set under our own vine in quietness, have heard Mr. Taft, from Psalms. The Lord is good to all and his tender mercies are over all his works. The good man was earnest and pathetick. I could forgive his weakness for the sake of his sincerity - but I long for a Cooper and an Elliot. I want a person who has feeling and sensibility who can take one up with his [speaking].

And in his Duty prompt at every call Can watch, and weep, and pray, and feel for all.

On Sunday, September 16, 1775, Abigail wrote to her husband, John Adams:

I set myself down to write with a heart depressed with the melancholy scenes around me. My letter will be only a bill of mortality; though thanks be to the Being who restraineth the pestilence, that it has not yet proved mortal to any of our family, though we live in daily expectation that Patty will not continue many hours....

And unto Him who mounts the whirlwind and directs the storm, I will cheerfully leave the ordering of my lot and whether adverse or prosperous days should be my future portion, I will trust in His right Hand to lead me safely through, and after a short rotation of events, fix me in a state immutable and happy.... Adieu! I need not say how sincerely I am your affectionate
Abigail Adams.

Near November 5, 1775, Abigail wrote to her friend, Mercy Warren:

A patriot without religion in my estimation is as great a paradox as an honest Man without the fear of God. Is it possible that he whom no moral obligations bind, can have any real Good Will towards Men? Can he be a patriot who, by an openly vicious conduct, is undermining the very bonds of Society, corrupting the Morals of Youth, and by his bad example injuring the very Country he professes to patronize more than he can possibly compensate by intrepidity, Generosity and honour? The Scriptures tell us "righteousness exalteth a Nation."

Abigail Adams stated:

[A] true patriot must be a religious man. [H]e who neglects his duty to his Maker, may well be expected to be deficient and insincere in his duty towards the public.

On June 20, 1776, Abigail wrote to her husband, John Adams, in Philadelphia:

I feel no anxiety at the large armament designed against us. The remarkable interpositions of heaven in our favor cannot be too gratefully acknowledged. He who fed the Israelites in the wilderness, who clothes the lilies of the field and who feeds the young ravens when they cry, will not forsake a people engaged in so right a cause, if we remember His loving kindness.

On July 14, 1776, Abigail wrote to her husband, John Adams:

May the foundation of our new constitution, be Justice, Truth and Righteousness. Like the wise Man's house may it be founded upon those Rocks and then neither storms or tempests will overthrow it.

On July 21, 1776, Abigail wrote to her husband, John Adams, of the reaction in Boston to the public reading of the Declaration of Independence:

Last Thursday after hearing a very good Sermon I went with the Multitude into Kings Street to hear the proclamation for independence read and proclaimed.... When Col. Crafts read from the Balcony of the State House the Proclamation, great attention was given to every word. As soon as he ended, the cry from the Balcony, was God Save Our American States....

After dinner the kings arms were taken down from the State House and every vestige of him from every place in which it appeared and burnt in King Street. Thus ends royall Authority in this State, and all the people shall say Amen.

On July 21, 1776, Abigail Adams stated:

Our worthy preacher told us that he believed one of our Great Sins for which a righteous God has come out in judgment against us, was our Bigoted attachment to so wicked a Man [King George III]. May our repentance be sincere.

On March 20, 1780, Abigail Adams wrote to her son, John Quincy Adams:

The only sure and permanent foundation of virtue is religion. Let this important truth be engraven upon your heart... Justice, humanity and benevolence are the duties you owe to society in general. To your Country the same duties are incumbent upon you with the additional obligation of sacrificing ease, pleasure, wealth and life itself for its defense and security.

On February 8, 1797, Abigail wrote to her husband, John Adams, upon his election as the 2nd President of the United States:

You have this day to declare yourself head of a nation. "And now, O Lord, my God, Thou hast made thy servant ruler over the people. Give unto him an understanding heart, that he may know how to go out and come in before this great people; that he may discern between good and bad. For who is able to judge this thy so great a people?" were the words of a royal Sovereign; and not less applicable to him who is invested with the Chief Magistracy of a nation, though he wear not a crown, nor robes of royalty....

Though personally absent... my petitions to Heaven are that "the things which make for peace may not be hidden from your eyes."... That you may be enabled to discharge them with honor to yourself, with justice and impartiality to your country, and with satisfaction to this great people, shall be the daily prayer of your Abigail Adams.

In the year 1800, Abigail Adams wrote concerning upcoming elections:

Can the placing at the head of the nation two characters known to be Deists be productive to order, peace and justice?

In a letter to her sister, Abigail Adams expressed concern about the Presidential candidates:

Never were a people placed in more difficult circumstances than the virtuous part of our countrymen are at the resent crisis. I have turned, and turned and overturned in my mind at various times the merits and demerits of the two candidates. Long acquaintance, private friendship and the full belief that the private character of [Jefferson] is much purer than [Burr]...inclines me to [Jefferson].

[H]ave we any claim to the favor or protection of Providence when we have against warning admonition and advice chosen as our chief Magistrate a man who makes no pretensions to the belief of an all wise supreme Governor of the World, ordering or directing or overruling the events which take place in it?... [I]f we ever saw a day of darkness, I fear this is one.

Abigail wrote in a letter to her son, John Quincy Adams:

Great learning and superior abilities, should you ever possess them, will be of little value, unless honor, truth and integrity are added to them.

Rush, Benjamin (January 4, 1745-April 19, 1813), was a physician, educator and philanthropist. He was a member of the Continental Congress, 1776-77, and signed the Declaration of Independence. In 1774, he helped found and was president of the Pennsylvania Society for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery. He helped found and was vice-president of the Philadelphia Bible Society; was a principal promoter of the American Sunday School Union; and a member of the Abolition Society. He also served as the Surgeon General of the Continental Army, 1777-78; helped to write the Pennsylvania Constitution, 1789-90; and was Treasurer of the U. S. Mint, 1797-1813. In 1783, Dr. Benjamin Rush helped found Dickinson College and joined the staff of the Pennsylvania Hospital. In 1786, he established the first free medical clinic.

On December 30, 1776, while serving with the Continental Army in New Jersey, Dr. Benjamin Rush wrote to Virginia Representative Richard Henry Lee requesting 2,000 to 3,000 pounds to be sent to George Washington for the war effort:

Let not this matter be debated and postponed in the usual way for two or three weeks; the salvation of America, under God, depends upon its being done in an instant.

In 1786, Dr. Benjamin Rush wrote Thoughts Upon the Mode of Education Proper in a Republic, in which he stated:

The First remark that I shall make upon this subject is that an education in our own is to be preferred to an education in a foreign country. The principle of patriotism stands in need of the reinforcement....

I proceed, in the next place, to inquire what mode of education we shall adopt so as to secure to the state all of the advantages that are to be derived from the proper instruction of the youth; and here I beg leave to remark that the only foundation for a useful education in a republic is to be laid on the foundation of religion. Without this there can be no virtue, and without virtue there can be no liberty, and liberty is the object and life of all republican governments.

Such is my veneration for every religion that reveals the attributes of the Deity, or a future state of rewards and punishments, that I had rather see the opinions of Confucius or Mohamed inculcated upon our youth than to see them grow up wholly devoid of a system of religious principles. But the religion I mean to recommend in this place is that of the New Testament.

It is not my purpose to hint at the arguments which establish the truth of the Christian revelation. My only business is to declare that all its doctrines and precepts are calculated to promote the happiness of society and the safety and well-being of civil government.

A Christian cannot fail of being a republican... for every precept of the Gospel inculcates those degrees of humility, self-denial, and brotherly kindness which are directly opposed to the pride of monarchy....

A Christian cannot fail of being useful to the republic, for his religion teaches him that no man "liveth to himself."

And lastly a Christian cannot fail of being wholly inoffensive, for his religion teaches him in all things to do to others what he would wish, in like circumstances, they should do to him.

In his work, A Plan for Free Schools, 1787, Dr. Benjamin Rush counseled:

Let the children... be carefully instructed in the principles and obligations of the Christian religion. This is the most essential part of education.

On July 9, 1788, in a letter to Elias Boudinot regarding a parade in Philadelphia, Dr. Benjamin Rush stated:

The Rabbi of the Jews locked arms of two ministers of the Gospel was a most delightful sight. There could not have been a more happy emblem.

On July 13, 1789, in a letter to Jeremy Belknap, Dr. Benjamin Rush stated:

The great enemy of the salvation of man, in my opinion, never invented a more effectual means of extirpating Christianity from the world than by persuading mankind that it was improper to read the Bible at schools.

While serving as the treasurer of the U.S. Mint, Dr. Benjamin Rush stated in his work, Essays, Literary, Moral, and Philosophical, published in 1798:

I know there is an objection among many people to teaching children doctrines of any kind, because they are liable to be controverted. But let us not be wiser than our Maker.

If moral precepts alone could have reformed mankind, the mission of the Son of God into all the world would have been unnecessary. The perfect morality of the Gospel rests upon the doctrine which, though often controverted has never been refuted: I mean the vicarious life and death of the Son of God.

In Essays, Literary, Moral, and Philosophical, Dr. Benjamin Rush explained:

Christianity is the only true and perfect religion, and that in proportion as mankind adopts its principles and obeys its precepts, they will be wise and happy.

In contemplating the political institutions of the United States, I lament that we waste so much time and money in punishing crimes and take so little pains to prevent them. We profess to be republicans, and yet we neglect the only means of establishing and perpetuating our republican forms of government, that is, the universal education of our youth in the principles of Christianity by the means of the Bible.

For this Divine book, above all others, favors that equality among mankind, that respect for just laws, and those sober and frugal virtues, which constitute the soul of republicanism.

In an essay entitled, "A Defense of the Use of the Bible as a School Book," included in his 1798 work, Essays, Literary, Moral and Philosophical, Dr. Benjamin Rush wrote:

[T]he Bible, when not read in schools, is seldom read in any subsequent period of life.... [It] should be read in our schools in preference to all other books from its containing the greatest portion of that kind of knowledge which is calculated to produce private and public temporal happiness.

Dr. Benjamin Rush stated:

Without religion, I believe that learning does real mischief to the morals and principles of mankind.

Dr. Benjamin Rush described himself:

I have been alternately called an Aristocrat and a Democrat. I am neither. I am a Christocrat. I believe all power... will always fail of producing order and happiness in the hands of man. He alone who created and redeemed man is qualified to govern him.

During his final illness, Benjamin Rush wrote to his wife:

My excellent wife, I must leave you, but God will take care of you. By the mystery of Thy holy incarnation; by Thy holy nativity; by Thy baptism, fasting, and temptation; by Thine agony and bloody sweat; by Thy cross and passion; by Thy precious death and burial; by Thy glorious resurrection and ascension, and by the coming of the Holy Ghost, blessed Jesus, wash away all my impurities, and receive me into Thy everlasting kingdom.

Bassett, Richard (April 2, 1745-September 15, 1815), was an attorney, jurist and politician. He was a signer of the Constitution of the United States. He was instrumental in leading his state of Delaware to be the first to ratify the United States Constitution, 1787. He was a U.S. Senator, 1789-93; Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Delaware, Captain in the Revolutionary War. He helped write the Constitution of the State of Delaware and was appointed by President John Adams as a U. S. Circuit Court Judge.

Richard Bassett converted to Methodism during the Revolutionary War and became close personal friends with Francis Asbury, the circuit-riding preacher. Richard Bassett personally contributed half the cost of building the First Methodist Church in Dover. He freed his slaves and then paid them as hired labor. On his way to the Methodist campmeetings, many times on his own plantation, he would ride joyfully with his former slaves, sharing the enthusiasm of their singing as they went.

In 1776, Richard Bassett, along with Thomas McKean and George Read, participated in the writing of the Constitution of the State of Delaware, which stated:

Article XXII. Every person who shall be chosen a member of either house, or appointed to any office or place of trust... shall... make and subscribe the following declaration, to wit: "I, _____, do profess faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ His only Son, and in the Holy Ghost, one God, blessed for evermore; and I do acknowledge the holy scriptures of the Old and New Testaments to be given by divine inspiration."

In 1787, Major William Pierce of Georgia, the only delegate to the Constitutional Convention who recorded character sketches of each of the delegates, described Richard Bassett as:

A religious enthusiast, lately turned Methodist, who serves his country because it is the will of the people that he should do so. He is a man of plain sense, and has modesty enough to hold his tongue. He is a gentlemanly man, and is in high estimation among Methodists.

Brearly, David (June 11, 1745-August 16, 1790), was a signer of the Constitution of the United States of America. He served as a Colonel in the Revolutionary Army, was appointed Federal Judge in New Jersey by President George Washington and served as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of New Jersey.

David Brearly attended Princeton University, where he was under the instruction of the Reverend John Witherspoon, one of the nation's premier theologians and legal experts. He was admitted to the bar in 1767 and was so outspoken for the cause of liberty that he was arrested for "high treason" against Britain. David Brearly was also active in many areas of religion, being:

... a warden of St. Michael's Church... a compiler of the Protestant Episcopal Prayer Book and a delegate to the Episcopal General Convention in 1786.

Jay, John (December 12, 1745-May 17, 1829), was the first Chief Justice of the U. S. Supreme Court, having been appointed by President George Washington. He was a member of the First and Second Continental Congresses and served as the President of the Continental Congress. He was very instrumental in causing the Constitution to be ratified, by writing the Federalist Papers, along with James Madison and Alexander Hamilton. In 1777, John Jay helped to write the Constitution of New York, and from 1795-1801 held the position of Governor of the State of New York.

On December 23, 1776, in an address before the New York

Convention, John Jay urged:

Let a general reformation of manners take place--let universal charity, public spirit, and private virtue be inculcated, encouraged, and practiced. Unite in preparing for a vigorous defense of your country, as if all depended on your own exertions. And when you have done all things, then rely upon the good Providence of Almighty God for success, in full confidence that without his blessings, all our efforts will inevitably fail...

The holy gospels are yet to be preached to these western regions, and we have the highest reason to believe that the Almighty will not suffer slavery and the gospel to go hand in hand. It cannot, it will not be.

In 1777, in a charge to the Grand Jury of Ulster County, New York, John Jay, explained:

The Americans are the first people whom Heaven has favoured with an opportunity of deliberating upon, and choosing the forms of government under which they should live.

On September 3, 1783, John Jay, along with Benjamin Franklin and John Adams, signed the Treaty of Paris, ratified by Congress January 14, 1784, which officially ended the War with the British:

In the name of the Most Holy and Undivided Trinity. It having pleased the Divine Providence to dispose the hearts of the most serene and most potent Prince George the Third, by the Grace of God, King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, ... and of the United States of America, to forget all past misunderstandings and differences. ... Done at Paris, this third day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three.

John Jay was Secretary of Foreign Affairs under the Articles of Confederation; U.S. Minister to Spain; and, in 1794, authored the Jay Treaty which prevented the United States from getting involved in the war between France and England. On April 15, 1794, John Jay wrote to his wife, Sally, from England:

If it should please God to make me an instrument to the continuation of peace, and in preventing the effusion of blood and other evils and miseries incident to war, we shall both have reason to rejoice. Whatever may be the event, the endeavour will be virtuous, and consequently consolatory. Let us repose unlimited trust in our Maker; it is our business to adore and to obey.

On May 28, 1802, John Jay wrote to his children after his wife Sally's death:

Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?... Behold I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed.... Death is swallowed up in victory. (I Corinthians 15)

In a letter to John Bristed, April 23, 1811, John Jay recounted a conversation he had with several atheists:

I was at a large party, of which were several of that description. They spoke freely and contemptuously of religion. I took no part in the conversation. In the course of it, one of them asked me if I believed in Christ. I answered that I did, and that I thanked God that I did.

He [an atheist] was a sedate, decent man. I frequently observed him drawing the conversation towards religion, and I constantly gave it another direction. He, nevertheless, during one of his visits, very abruptly remarked that there was no God, and he hoped the time would come when there would be no religion in the world.

I very concisely remarked that if there was no God there could be no moral obligations, and I did not see how society could subsist without them.

On January 1, 1813, John Jay penned a letter to Jedediah Morse regarding voting:

Whether our Religion permits Christians to vote for infidel rulers is a question which merits more consideration than it seems yet to have generally received, either from the clergy or the laity.

It appears to me that what the prophet said to Jehoshaphat about his attachments to Ahab ('Shouldest thou help the ungodly and love them that hate the Lord?' 2 Chron. 19:2) affords a salutary lesson....

Although the mere expediency of public measures may not be a proper subject for the pulpit, yet, in my opinion, it is the right and duty of our pastors to press the observance of all moral and religious duties, and to animadvert on every course of conduct which may be repugnant to them....

On October 12, 1816, John Jay admonished:

Providence has given to our people the choice of their rulers, and it is the duty, as well as the privilege and interest of our Christian nation to select and prefer Christians for their rulers.

On April 15, 1818, John Jay wrote to his Quaker friend, John Murry:

[Natural Laws and Morality are] given by the Sovereign of the Universe to all mankind.... Being founded by infinite wisdom and goodness on essential right, which never varies, it can require no amendment or alteration.

It is true that the Law was given to Moses, not however in his individual or private capacity, but as the agent or instrument, and by the authority of the Almighty. The Law demanded exact obedience, and proclaimed: "Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them." The law was inexorable, and by requiring perfect obedience, under a penalty so inevitable and dreadful, operated as a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ for mercy.

Legal punishments are adjusted and inflicted by the law and magistrate, and not by unauthorized individuals. These and all other positive laws or ordinances established by Divine direction, must of necessity be consistent with the moral law.

It certainly was not the design of the law or ordinance in question, to encourage a spirit of personal or private revenge. On the contrary, there are express injunctions in the law of Moses which inculcate a very different spirit.

In addition to being appointed by President George Washington as the first Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, John Jay was also elected president of the Westchester Bible Society in 1818 and president of the American Bible Society in 1821. On May 13, 1824, while serving as its president, John Jay gave an address to the American Bible Society:

By conveying the Bible to people thus circumstanced, we certainly do them a most interesting kindness. We thereby enable them to learn that man was originally created and placed in a state of happiness, but, becoming disobedient, was subjected to the degradation and evils which he and his posterity have since experienced.

The Bible will also inform them that our gracious Creator has provided for us a Redeemer, in whom all the nations of the earth shall be blessed; that this Redeemer has made atonement "for the sins of the whole world," and thereby reconciling the Divine justice with the Divine mercy has opened a way for our redemption and salvation; and that these inestimable benefits are of the free gift and grace of God, not of our deserving, nor in our power to deserve.

John Jay stated:

In forming and settling my belief relative to the doctrines of Christianity, I adopted no articles from creeds but such only as, on careful examination, I found to be confirmed by the Bible. . . . At a party in Paris, once, the question fell on religious matters. In the course of it, one of them asked me if I believed in Christ? I answered that I did, and that I thanked God that I did.

Let a general reformation of manners take place - virtue be inculcated, encouraged, and practiced. United in preparing for a vigorous defence of your country, as if all depended on your own exertions. And when you have done all things, then rely upon the good Providence of Almighty God for success, in full confidence that without His blessings, all our efforts will inevitably fail.

John Jay's comments on Scripture reflect a life of intense study, which can be seen, not only in his early upbringing, but also in his admission to King's College in New York at the age of fourteen, the requirements of which included translating the first ten chapters of the Gospel of John from Greek into Latin. John Jay gave his understanding of God:

God is great, and therefore He will be sought: He is good, and therefore He will be found.

If in the day of sorrow we own God's presence in the cloud, we shall find Him also in the pillar of fire, brightening and cheering our way as the night comes on.

In all His dispensations God is at work for our good, - In prosperity He tries our gratitude; in mediocrity, our contentment; in misfortune, our submission; in darkness, our faith; under temptation, our steadfastness, and at all times, our obedience and trust in Him.

God governs the world, and we have only to do our duty wisely, and leave the issue to Him.

In 1826, John Jay was sent a letter from the Corporation of the City of New York, asking him to join with them in the celebration of America's fiftieth anniversary. John Jay replied, expressing his:

Earnest hope that the peace, happiness, and prosperity enjoyed by our beloved country may induce those who direct her national counsels to recommend a general and public return of praise to Him from whose goodness these blessings descend.

In his address to the Committee of the Corporation of the City of New York, June 29, 1826, at eighty years of age, John Jay stated:

The most effectual means of securing the continuance of our civil and religious liberties is, always to remember with reverence and gratitude the Source from which they flow.

In his Last Will and Testament, John Jay wrote:

Unto Him who is the Author and Giver of all good, I render sincere and humble thanks for His merciful and unmerited blessings, and especially for our redemption and salvation by His beloved Son.

He has been pleased to bless me with excellent parents, with a virtuous wife, and with worthy children.

His protection has accompanied me through many eventful years, faithfully employed in the service of my country; and His providence has not only conducted me to this tranquil situation, but also given me abundant reason to be contented and thankful.

Blessed be His Holy Name. While my children lament my departure, let them recollect that in doing them good, I was only the agent of their Heavenly Father, and that He never withdraws His care and consolations from those who diligently seek Him.

On May 17, 1829, John Jay was drawing near death after a life of serving his country. As recorded by his son, Judge William Jay, John Jay was asked if he had any words for his children, to which he responded:

They have the Book.

John Jay is recorded as having stated:

I would have my funeral decent, but not ostentatious, no scarfs, no ring. Instead thereof, I give $200 to any one poor deserving widow or orphan of this town whom by children shall select.

John Jay's son, William Jay, who wrote his father's biography, described him as:

A rare but interesting picture of the Christian patriot and statesman.

Paterson, William (December 24, 1745-September 9, 1806), was a jurist, politician and a signer of the United States Constitution. He served as a U. S. Supreme Court Justice, 1793-1806, having been appointed by President George Washington. He was a delegate to the Constitutional Convention, 1787; a U. S. Senator, 1789-90; Governor of New Jersey after Governor Livingston died, 1790-93; New Jersey State Attorney General, 1776; member of the State Constitutional Convention, 1776; and a member of the New Jersey Provincial Congress, 1775. The people of his state esteemed him so much that they named the city of Paterson, New Jersey, after him.

William Paterson moved from Ireland with his strong Presbyterian family when he was two years old. He attended Princeton University during a time when there was a strong evangelical movement (12 of his 18 classmates became ministers).

An entry in William Paterson's personal journal, during a visit in 1776 to the West Indies, gives insight into his character:

On my arrival in the West Indies in the year 1776, a new scene was opened to me for which I was little prepared, for I had previously lived with religious people, and my new acquaintances, and those with whom I was to transact business, were the reverse of this.

No one went there to settle for life; all were in quest of fortune, to retire and spend it elsewhere; character was little thought of. Of course it required the utmost circumspection and caution to steer clear of difficulties.

A kind superintending Providence, in this, as in many other concerns of my life, enabled me, however, to surmount every difficulty, young and inexperienced as I then was.

On May 24, 1800, William Paterson stated:

Religion and morality... [are] necessary to good government, good order, and good laws, for "when the righteous are in authority, the people rejoice."

Princeton University (1746), was originally called "The College of New Jersey." It was founded in Princeton, New Jersey, by the Presbyterian Church. Many influential individuals served as its president, including: Jonathan Dickinson, Aaron Burr Sr., Jonathan Edwards, Samuel Davies, Samuel Finley and Woodrow Wilson, who was the first president not a clergyman. Its president just prior to the Revolutionary War was John Witherspoon, the only clergyman to sign the Declaration of Independence, 1776.

Princeton University, under President John Witherspoon, 1768-94, graduated 478 students who directly shaped America, including: James Madison, who served eight years as Secretary of State and eight years as U.S. President; Aaron Burr, Jr., who was a U.S. Vice-President; 3 U.S. Supreme Court justices; 10 Cabinet members; 13 state governors; 21 U.S. Senators; 39 U.S. Representatives; and 114 ministers. Nine of the 55 delegates to the Constitutional Convention were graduates, including: Gunning Bedford Jr., Del.; David Brearley, N.J.; William Richardson Davie N.C.; Jonathan Dayton, N.J.; William Churchill Houston, N.J.; James Madison, Va.; Alexander Martin, N.C.; Luther Martin, Md.; and William Paterson, N.J.

Princeton University's official motto was:

Under God's Power She Flourishes.

The first president of Princeton University, the Rev. Jonathan Dickinson, stated:

Cursed be all that learning that is contrary to the cross of Christ.

The requirements of Princeton University, during President John Witherspoon tenure, 1768-76, included:

Every student shall attend worship in the college hall morning and evening at the hours appointed and shall behave with gravity and reverence during the whole service. Every student shall attend public worship on the Sabbaths... Besides the public exercises of religious worship on the Sabbaths, there shall be assigned to each class certain exercises for their pupils... and no student belonging to any class shall neglect them.

Pinckney, Charles Cotesworth (February 25, 1746-August 16, 1825), was a signer of the United States Constitution. He was a delegate to the Constitutional Convention and helped to write the Constitution of the State of South Carolina. A Presidential and Vice-Presidential candidate, he was a successful lawyer, planter, statesman, soldier, aide-de-camp to General Washington and Brigadier General.

Pinckney turned down many offers from President Washington for positions within government, including several cabinet appointments and a place on the U.S. Supreme Court, though he finally accepted the position of U.S. Minister to France. He helped found the Charleston Bible Society and served as its first president.

He studied for his military career at the Royal Military Academy of France, after having studied law at the Westminster School at Oxford, under Sir William Blackstone.

Sir William Blackstone, the second most quoted legal authority by our Founding Fathers, gave evidence of the views he taught, stating:

Blasphemy against the Almighty is denying his being or providence, or uttering contumelious reproaches on our Savior Christ. It is punished, at common law by fine and imprisonment, for Christianity is part of the laws of the land.

And consequently, as man depends absolutely upon his Maker for every thing, it is necessary that he should, in all points, conform to his Maker's will. This will of his Maker, is called the law of nature.

Charles Cotesworth Pinckney was very involved in forming the Constitution of the State of South Carolina, which contained the article:

SOUTH CAROLINA, 1778. Article XXXVIII. That all persons and religious societies who acknowledge that there is one God, and a future state of rewards and punishments, and that God is publicly to be worshipped, shall be freely tolerated. . . . That all denominations of Christian[s] . . . in this State, demeaning themselves peaceably and faithfully, shall enjoy equal religious and civil privileges.

In a personal letter to a military friend, Pinckney wrote:

The great art of government is not to govern too much.

In answer to Charles Maurice de Talleyrand's insulting proposal from the French Directory, Charles Cotesworth Pinckney is credited with uttering the sentiment:

No! No! Not a sixpence. Millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute.

Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, since a child, had learned "to love Christ and the Church." As the first president of the Charleston Bible Society, he distributed Bibles to Negroes, putting aside finances to evangelize the slaves and teach them to read the Holy Scriptures. The elder Charles Pinckney, who was the chief justice of South Carolina, wrote in his Last Will and Testament concerning his young son, Charles Cotesworth Pinckney:

To the end that my beloved son Charles Cotesworth may the better be enabled to become the head of his family and prove not only of service and advantage to his country, but also an Honour to his Stock and kindred, my order and direction is that my said son be virtuously, religiously and liberally brought up and Educated in the Study and practice of the Laws of England; and from said son I hope, as he would have the blessings of Almighty God, and deserve the Countenance and favour of all good men, and answer my expectations of him, that he will employ all his future abilities in the service of God, and his Country, in the Cause of virtuous liberty as well religious as Civil; and in support of private right and Justice between Man and Man; and that he do by no means debase the dignity of his human nature, nor the honour of his profession, by giving countenance to, or ever appearing in favour of irreligion, injustice or wrong, oppression or tyranny of any sort, public or private;

but that he make the glory of God and the good of Mankind, the relief of the poor and distressed, the widow and the fatherless, and such as have none else to help them, his principal aim and study.

At his death in 1825, the following resolutions were read:

The Board of Managers of the Charleston Bible Society, entertaining a high sense of the benefits conferred on his country and on society, by their late revered President General CHARLES COTESWORTH PINCKNEY, in the course of a long life, steadily and honorably devoted to the service of both;

and of the fidelity, zeal and ability, with which he fulfilled the duties of the important and responsible public functions, to which he was called; as well as of the virtues, which adorned his private life and character, and by which he justly earned and secured the permanent respect, veneration and affection of all his fellow citizens....

That they give devout thanks to Almighty God for the invaluable services which the life, influence and example of their late revered President, have rendered to the cause of religion, virtue and good order, to his country and to mankind; and that they submit themselves to this painful dispensation of Providence, with a sorrow mitigated by the grateful remembrance of his virtue, and by a pious trust in Divine mercy...

For fifteen years past he presided over our Society, and at our Board. Our meetings were held at his house. We will long remember his kindness and hospitality to us all, while the patience, industry, perseverance and zeal, which he exercised to promote the interests of our Society, merit the approbation of the cause in which we were engaged.

The last time he met our Society he was so feeble that it was necessary to support him to the chair. It was evident to all of us, that his long and useful life was drawing to a close. He seemed to come among us to show that in his last hours the cause of the Bible was nearest his heart, to give us his blessing and to bid us farewell; for from that day he was confined to his chamber; and after having lived nearly fourscore years, an age seldom attained, he soon after fell to the ground, like as a shuck of corn cometh forth in his season.

Charles Cotesworth Pinckney's parents were also very loved and respected for their godly and patriotic influence. President Washington himself, at his own request, served as a pallbearer at the funeral of Charles Cotesworth's mother, Elizabeth Lucas Pinckney (1722-1793).

Muhlenberg, John Peter Gabriel (October 1, 1746-October 1, 1807), was an American clergyman, soldier and politician. In 1774, being 30-years-old, he was a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses and a pastor. He was the son of Henry Melchior Muhlenberg, one of the founders of the Lutheran Church in America.

In 1775, John Peter Muhlenburg preached a message on Ecclesiastes 3:1, "For everything there is a season, and a time for every matter under heaven." He closed his message by saying:

In the language of the Holy Writ, there is a time for all things. There is a time to preach and a time to fight. And now is the time to fight.

He then threw off his clerical robes to reveal the uniform of an officer in the Continental Army. That afternoon, at the head of 300 men, he marched off to join General Washington's troops. He became Colonel of the 8th Virginia Regiment and served until the end of the war, being promoted to the rank of Major-General.

John Peter Muhlenburg became the Vice-President of Pennsylvania, 1785; a member of the Pennsylvania Constitutional Convention, 1790; a U.S. Representative from Pennsylvania; and a U.S. Senator, 1801. In 1889, Pennsylvania chose his statue to represent their State in the Statuary Hall at Washington, D.C.

John Peter Gabriel Muhlenburg was memorialized in a poem written by Thomas Buchanan Read, entitled "The Rising," which is included in William Holmes McGuffey Fifth Eclectic Reader (Cincinnati and New York: Van Antwerp, Bragg & Co., revised edition, 1879), Lesson LXV, pp. 200-204:

Out of the North the wild news came,
Far flashing on its wings of flame
Swift as the boreal light which flies
At midnight through the startled skies.

And there was tumult in the air,
The fife's shrill note, the drum's loud beat,
And through the wide land every-where
The answering tread of hurrying feet.

While the first oath of Freedom's gun
Came on the blast from Lexington,
And Concord, roused, no longer tame,
Forgot her old baptismal name,
Made bare her patriot arm of power,
And swelled the discord of the hour.

The yeoman and the yeoman's son,
With knitted brows and sturdy dint,
Renewed the polish of each gun,
Re-oiled the lock, reset the flint;
And oft the maid and matron there,
While kneeling in the firelight glare,
Long poured, with half-suspended breath,
The lead into the molds of death.

The hands by Heaven made silken soft
To soothe the brow of love or pain,
Alas! are dulled and soiled too oft
By some unhallowed earthly stain;
But under the celestial bound
No nobler picture can be found
Than woman, brave in word and deed,
Thus serving in her nation's need:
Her love is with her country now,
Her hand is on the aching brow.

The church of Berkley Manor stood:
There Sunday found the rural folk,
And some esteemed of gentle blood.
In vain their feet with loitering tread
Passed 'mid the graves where rank is naught:
All could not read the lesson taught
In that republic of the dead.

The pastor rose: the prayer was strong;
The psalm was warrior David's song;
The text, a few short words of might, -
"The Lord of Hosts shall arm the right!"

He spoke of wrongs too long endured,
Of sacred rights to be secured;
Then from his patriot tongue of flame
The startling words for Freedom came.
The stirring sentences he spake
Compelled the heart to glow or quake,
And, rising on his theme's broad wing,
And grasping in his nervous hand
The imaginary battle-brand,
In face of death he dared to fling
Defiance to a tyrant king.

Even as he spoke, his frame renewed
In eloquence of attitude,
Rose, as it seemed, a shoulder higher;
Then swept his kindling glance of fire
From startled pew to breathless choir;
When suddenly his mantle wide
His hands impatient flung aside,
And, lo! He met their wondering eyes
Complete in all a warrior's guise.

A moment there was awful pause, -
When Berkley cried, "Cease, traitor! Cease!
God's temple is the house of peace!"
The other shouted, "Nay, not so,
When God is with our righteous cause:
His holiest places then are ours,
His temples are our forts and towers
That frown upon the tyrant foe:
In this the dawn of Freedom's day
There is a time to fight and pray!"

And now before the open door-
The warrior priest had ordered so-
The enlisting trumpet's sudden soar
Rang through the chapel, o'er and o'er,
Its long reverberating blow,
So loud and clear, it seemed the ear
Of dusty death must wake and hear.
And there the startling drum and fife
Fired the living with fiercer life;
While overhead with wild increase,
Forgetting its ancient toll of peace,
The great bell swung as ne'er before:
It seemed as it would never cease;
And every word its ardor flung
From off its jubilant iron tongue
Was, "War! War! War!"

"Who dares" - this was the patriot's cry,
As striding from the desk he came -
"Come out with me, in Freedom's name,
For her to live, for her to die?"
A hundred hands flung up reply,
A hundred voices answered "!!"

Bedford, Gunning (1747-March 30, 1812), was a signer of the United States Constitution. He was the delegate from Delaware to the Constitutional Convention, where he played a considerable part in the Federal Convention. In 1789, he was appointed to the First Federal District Court by President Washington. Gunning Bedford attended Princeton University, sharing rooms with James Madison. He studied under the influence of John Witherspoon, one of the nation's premier theologians and legal scholars.

As a delegate from the State of Delaware, Gunning Bedford would have complied with the requirements for office, as stipulated by that State's constitution:

Article XXII. Every person who shall be chosen a member of either house, or appointed to any office or place of trust... shall... make and subscribe the following declaration, to wit: "I, _____, do profess faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ His only Son, and in the Holy Ghost, one God, blessed for evermore; and I do acknowledge the holy scriptures of the Old and New Testaments to be given by divine inspiration."

Jones, John Paul (July 6, 1747-July 18, 1792), was called the "Father of the American Navy." He was noted for his courage in fighting larger and better equipped fleets. In 1779, he took command of the Bonhomme Richard (Poor Richard), which he named in honor of the Benjamin Franklin, author of Poor Richard's Almanac. On September 23, 1779, the Bonhomme Richard attacked the British ship, Serapis, which was leading a convoy. The ships came so close to each other that the masts entangled and the cannon muzzles touched. After intense naval combat, which nearly destroyed the Bonhomme Richard, the British commander yelled, wanting to know if the Americans were ready to surrender. John Paul Jones responded:

I have not yet begun to fight.

The British convoy finally surrendered after three hours of fighting.

On February 13, 1905, in a message to Congress, President Theodore Roosevelt made comment as to John Paul Jones' burial as a Protestant in France:

For a number of years efforts have been made to confirm the historical statement that the remains of Admiral John Paul Jones were interred in a certain piece of ground in the city of Paris then owned by the Government and used at the time as a burial place for foreign Protestants. These efforts have at last resulted in documentary proof that John Paul Jones was buried, on July 20, 1792, between 8 and 9 o'clock p.m., in the now abandoned cemetery of St. Louis, in the northeastern section of Paris....

The great interest which our people feel in the story of Paul Jones's life, the national sense of gratitude for the great service done by him toward the achievement of independence, and the sentiment of mingled distress and regret felt because the body of one of our greatest heroes lies, forgotten and unmarked, in foreign soil, lead me to approve the ambassador's suggestion that Congress should take advantage of this unexpected opportunity to do proper honor to the memory of Paul Jones.

Tyler, Sir Alexander Fraser (October 15, 1747-January 5, 1813) knighted Lord Woodhouselee, was an English historian. He wrote an essay entitled The Principles of Translation, 1791, which was the first systematic study in English of translation. In his thesis entitled a "Cycle of Nations" in The Decline and Fall of the Athenian Republic, Sir Alexander Fraser Tyler stated:

A democracy cannot exist as a permanent form of government. It can only exist until the voters discover that they can vote themselves money from the public treasury. From that moment on, the majority always votes for the candidates promising the most benefits from the public treasury, with a result that a democracy always collapses over loose fiscal policy, always followed by dictatorship. The average age of the world's greatest civilizations has been 200 years. These nations have progressed through the following sequence -

- From bondage to spiritual faith;
- From spiritual faith to great courage
- From courage to liberty
- From liberty to abundance;
- From abundance to selfishness;
- From selfishness to complacency;
- From complacency to apathy;
- From apathy to dependency;
- From dependency back into bondage.

Martin, Luther (c. 1748-July 10, 1826), was a delegate to the Constitutional Convention where he gave 53 speeches. He proposed the "electoral college" system for selecting the President and strongly opposed a central government which would usurp the sovereignty of the states. One of the most prominent lawyers in the country, he served for 28 years as the Attorney General of Maryland, one of the longest records in American history.

Luther Martin described himself as being devoted to:

The sacred truths of the Christian religion.

Madison, Bishop James (August 27, 1749-March 6, 1812) was President of the College of William and Mary, 1777-1812; presided over the first convention of the Episcopal Church in Virginia, 1785; and was elected first Bishop of the dioceses, 1790. His "Eulogy on George Washington" was published in 1800.

On February 19, 1795, Bishop Madison responded to President George Washington's call for a National Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer by preaching a sermon, later published, entitled Manifestation of the Beneficence of Divine Providence towards America - a Discourse, Delivered on Thursday the 19th of

February, 1795, Being the Day Recommended by the President of the United States, for General Thanksgiving and Prayer:

Brethren, there are few situations more interesting to the human race than that which the people of America this day presents.

The temples of the living God are everywhere, throughout this rising empire, this day, crowded, I trust, with worshipers, whose hearts, impressed with a just and lively sense of the great things, which He hath done for them, pour forth, in unison, the grateful tribute of praise and thanksgiving... for the history of nations doth not exhibit a people who ever had cause to offer up to the Great Author of every good the most fervent expressions of gratitude and thanksgiving.

Let, my brethren, the sons of irreligion, wrapped in their dark and gloomy system of fatality, refuse to open their eyes to the great luminous proofs of providential government, which America displays; let them turn from a light, which their weak vision cannot bear; but let the righteous, let those who trust God, who can trace in that good and glorious being the relations of father, friend, and governor, let them with eagle eyes look up to that full blaze of salvation, which he hath vouchsafed to this new world.

Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von (August 28, 1749-March 22, 1832), was a German poet, playwright and novelist. Born in Frankfurt-am-Main, he achieved recognition with his " Sturm und Drang " style play Gotz von Berlichingen, 1773, and the romantic novel The Sorrows of Young Werther, 1774. He lived at the ducal court of Saxe-Weimar from 1775 till his death. A visit to Italy, 1786-88, gave inspiration for the plays Iphigenie auf Tauris, 1787, and Egmont, 1788. He wrote Torquato Tasso, 1790; The Apprenticeship of Wilhelm Meister, 1795-96; and his most noted work, Faust, written in stages over his career, 1808-32. He compiled fourteen volumes of scientific studies, with his complete works totaling 133 volumes, published in the Weimar edition, 1887-1919.

Johann Wolfgang von Goethe stated:

Let mental culture go on advancing, let the natural sciences progress in ever greater extent and depth, and the human mind widen itself as much as it desires; beyond the elevation and moral culture of Christianity, as it shines forth in the gospels, it will not go.

It is a belief in the Bible, the fruit of deep meditation, which has served me as the guide of my moral and literary life. I have found it a capital safely invested, and richly productive of interest.

In Conversations with Eckermann, 1828-29, Johann Wolfgang von Goethe wrote:

I esteem the Gospels to be thoroughly genuine, for there shines from them the reflected splendor of a sublimity proceeding from the person of Jesus Christ of so Divine a kind as only the Divine could ever have manifested on earth.

In Aus Makarieus Archiv W. Meister, 1786-1830, Goethe wrote:

I am persuaded that the Bible becomes evermore beautiful the more it is understood; that is, the more we consider that every word which we apply to ourselves has had at first a particular, peculiar, immediate reference to certain special circumstances.

In his Autobiography, Johann Wolfgang von Goethe wrote:

Nothing, therefore, remained to me but to part from this society; and as my love for the Holy Scriptures, as well as the Founder of Christianity, and its early professors, could not be taken from me, I formed a Christianity for my private use, and sought to build it up by an attentive study of history.

Madison, James (March 16, 1751-June 28, 1836), was the 4th President of the United States, 1809-17; Commander in Chief during the War of 1812, having to flee the White House, with his wife Dolly, before it was captured and burned by the British; Rector of the University of Virginia, 1826-36; Secretary of State under Thomas Jefferson, 1801-09, where he negotiated the Louisiana Purchase, 1803; U. S. Representative, 1789-1801; married Dorothy "Dolly" Payne Todd, 1794; original author and promoter of the Bill of Rights, 1789; penned many of The Federalist Papers, 1788, which were instrumental in convincing the States to ratify the U. S. Constitution; member of the Constitutional Convention, 1787, where he exerted such influence that he became known as the "Chief Architect of the Constitution"; attended the Continental Congress, 1780-83; a member of the Virginia House of Delegates, where he helped to write the Constitution of Virginia, 1776; graduated from Princeton University, 1771, under the direction of Reverend John Witherspoon, one of the nation's premier theologians and legal scholars; and was home-schooled as a child under Reverend Thomas Martin.

Princeton University, during the period James Madison attended, had declared:

Cursed be all that learning that is contrary to the cross of Christ.

On November 9, 1772, James Madison, who outlived all of the other 54 founders of the American Republic, wrote to his close college friend, William Bradford:

A watchful eye must be kept on ourselves lest while we are building ideal monuments of Renown and Bliss here we neglect to have our names enrolled in the Annals of Heaven.

[My health has] intimated to me not to expect a long or healthy life, yet it may be better with me after some time tho I hardly dare expect it and therefore have little spirit and alacrity to set about any thing that is difficult in acquiring and useless in possessing after one has exchanged Time for Eternity.

On September 25, 1773, James Madison wrote again to William Bradford:

My advice [is]... that you would always keep the Ministry obliquely in View whatever your profession be...

I have sometimes thought there could not be a stronger testimony in favor of Religion or against temporal Enjoyments even the most rational and manly than for men who occupy the most honorable and gainful departments and are rising in reputation and wealth, publicly to declare their unsatisfactoriness by becoming fervent Advocates in the cause of Christ, & I wish you may give in your Evidence in this way.

James Madison, known to regularly lead his household in the observance of family devotions, was an adamant defender of religious liberty. His strong position of defending religious freedom began when, as a youth, he stood with his father outside a jail in the village of Orange and listened to several Baptists preach from their cell windows, having been imprisoned for their religious opinions. On January 24, 1774, Madison disapproved of this to his friend William Bradford:

There are at this [time] in the adjacent [Culpepper] County not less than 5 or 6 well meaning men in close Goal [jail] for publishing their religious Sentiments which in the main are very orthodox.

James Madison is attributed with having made the following observation in 1778:

We have staked the whole future of American civilization, not upon the power of government, far from it. We have staked the future of all of our political institutions upon the capacity of mankind for self-government; upon the capacity of each and all of us to govern ourselves, to control ourselves, to sustain ourselves according to the Ten Commandments of God.

In Federalist Paper #39, James Madison stated:

That honourable determination which animates every votary of freedom, to rest all our political experiments on the capacity of mankind for self-government.

In November of 1784, James Madison made abbreviated notes of what he believed would result if a bill for government support of religion were passed in Virginia:

- v. Probable effects of the Bill,
 1. limited
 2. in particular.
 3. What is Xnty? Courts of law to Judge.
 4. What edition: Hebrew, Septuagint, or Vulgate?
What copy? What translation?
 5. What books canonical, what apocryphal? the papists holding to be the former what protestants the latter, the Lutherans the latter what the protestants & papists ye former.
 6. In what light are they to be viewed, as dictated every letter by inspiration, or the essential parts only? Or the matter in general not the words?
 7. What sense the true one for if some doctrines be essential to Xnty those who reject these, whatever name they take are no Xn in Society.

8. Is it Trinitarianism, Arianism, Socinianism? Is it salvation by faith or works also, by free grace or by will, &c, &c.

9. What clue is to guide (a) Judge thro' this labyrinth when ye question come before them whether any particular society is a Cn society?

10. Ends in what is orthodoxy, what heresy, . Dishonors christiandy. panegyric on it, on our side. Decl. Ri ghts.

In the 1785 session of the General Assembly of the State of Virginia, James Madison reasoned that a bill instituting a tax "for the support of the Christian religion" would put civil judges into the position of having to decide what constituted Christianity, a function for which they were totally unqualified for. On June 20, 1785, in his address entitled Religious Freedom - A Memorial and Remonstrance, James Madison stated:

It is the duty of every man to render to the Creator such homage, and such only, as he believes to be acceptable to Him. This duty is precedent both in order of time, and degree of obligation, to the claims of civil society.

Before any man can be considered as a member of Civil Society, he must be considered as a subject of the Governor of the Universe.

Much more must every man who becomes a member of any particular Civil Society, do it with a saving of his allegiance to the Universal Sovereign. We maintain therefore that in matters of Religion, no man's right is abridged by the institution of Civil Society, and that Religion is wholly exempt from its cognizance.

The policy of the bill is adverse to the diffusion of the light of Christianity. The first wish of those who ought to enjoy this precious gift, ought to be, that it may be imparted to the whole race of mankind.

Compare the number of those who have as yet received it, with the number still remaining under the dominions of false religions, and how small is the former! Does the policy of the bill tend to lessen the disproportion? No; it at once discourages those who are strangers to the light of Truth, from coming into the regions of it.

Whilst we assert for ourselves a freedom to embrace, to profess, and to observe the Religion which we believe to be of divine origin, we cannot deny an equal freedom to those whose minds have not yet yielded to the evidence which has convinced us. If this freedom be abused, it is an offence against God, not against man: To God, therefore, not to man, must an account of it be rendered.

Earnestly praying, as we are in duty bound, that the Supreme Lawgiver of the Universe by illuminating those to whom it is addressed, may, on the one hand, turn their councils from every act which would affront His holy prerogative, or violate the trust committed to them; and, on the other, guide them into every measure which may be worthy of His blessing.

"The equal right of every citizen to the free exercise of his religion according to the dictates of his conscience" is held by the same tenure with all our other rights. If we recur to its origin, it is equally the gift of nature; if we weight its importance, it cannot be less dear to us; if we consult the "Declaration of those rights which pertain to the good people of Virginia, as the basis and foundation of government," it is enumerated with equal solemnity.

In response to an essay by Reverend Jasper Adams, James Madison stated:

Waiving the rights of conscience, not included in the surrender implied by the social state, & more or less invaded by all Religious establishments, the simple question to be decided, is whether a support of the best & purest religion, the Christian religion itself ought not, so far at least as pecuniary means are involved, to be provided for by the Government, rather than be left to the voluntary provisions of those who profess it.

On October 31, 1785, James Madison introduced legislation in the Virginia Legislature entitled, "Bill for Punishing Disturbers of Religious Worship and Sabbath Breakers," which was passed in 1789:

If any person on Sunday shall himself be found laboring at his own or any other trade or calling, or shall employ the apprentices, servants or slaves in labor, or other business, except it be in the ordinary household offices of daily necessity, or other work of necessity or charity, he shall forfeit the sum of ten shillings for every such offense, deeming every apprentice, servant, or slave so employed, and every day he shall be so employed as constituting a distinct offense.

On October 31, 1785, James Madison introduced a bill in the Virginia Legislature entitled, "For Appointing Days of Public Fasting and Thanksgiving," which included:

Forfeiting fifty pounds for every failure, not having a reasonable excuse.

James Madison, who was only 36 years old at the time, was an instrumental member of the United States Constitutional Convention, speaking 161 times, (more than any other founder except Gouverneur Morris and James Wilson). His records of the debates in the Constitutional Convention are the most accurate and detailed that exist. In 1787, at the Constitutional Convention, James Madison made the statement:

All men having power ought to be distrusted.

It was James Madison who made the motion, which was seconded by Roger Sherman, that Benjamin Franklin's appeal for prayer at the Constitutional Convention be enacted. James Madison authored 29 of the 85 Federalist Papers, which argued successfully in favor of the ratification of the U.S. Constitution. In The Federalist No. 51, Madison wrote:

But the great security against a gradual concentration of the several powers in the same department, consists in giving to those who administer each department, the necessary constitutional means, and personal motives, to resist encroachments of the others.

The provisions for defense must in this, as in all other cases, be made commensurate to the danger of attack.

Ambition must be made to counteract ambition. The interest of the man must be connected with the constitutional rights of the place.

It may be a reflection on human nature that such devices should be necessary to control the abuses of government.

But what is government itself but the greatest of all reflections on human nature?

If angels were to govern men, neither external or internal controls on government would be necessary.

In framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: you must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place oblige it to control itself.

A dependence on the people is, no doubt, the primary control on the government; but experience has taught mankind the necessity of auxiliary precautions.

On June 12, 1788, James Madison entered in his journal:

There is not a shadow of right in the general [federal] government to intermeddle with religion... The subject is, for the honor of America, perfectly free and unshackled. The government has no jurisdiction over it.

On October 15, 1788, James Madison wrote:

As the courts are generally the last in making the decision [on laws], it results to them, by refusing or not refusing to execute a law, to stamp it with its final character. This makes the Judiciary dept paramount in fact to the Legislature, which was never intended, and can never be proper.

On June 7, 1789, with the experience fresh on his mind of the Anglican Church being the officially enforced denomination by the British in the colony of Virginia, James Madison introduced a proposal in the U.S. Congress for an amendment with the wording:

The Civil Rights of none shall be abridged on account of religious belief or worship, nor shall any national religion be established, nor shall the full and equal rights of conscience be in any manner, nor on any pretext infringed.

James Madison, who had studied for the ministry before he took up the study of law, said:

Religion, or the duty we owe to our Creator, and manner of discharging it, can be directed only by reason and conviction, not by force or violence; and, therefore, that all men should enjoy the fullest toleration in the exercise of religion according to the dictates of conscience, unpunished and unrestrained by the magistrate, unless under color of religion any man disturb the peace, the happiness, or safety of society, and that it is the mutual duty of all to practice Christian forbearance, love and charity toward each other.

In 1792, James Madison wrote in regards to property rights:

Government is instituted to protect property of every sort....This being the end of government....That is NOT a just government...nor is property secure under it, where the property which a man has...is violated by arbitrary seizures of one class of citizens for the service of the rest.

Property...in the former sense, a man's land, or merchandise, or money, is called his property. In the latter sense, a man has a property in his opinions and the free communication of them.

He has a property of peculiar value in his religious opinions, and in the profession and practice dictated by them....

He has an equal property in the free use of his faculties, and free choice of the objects on which to employ them. In a word, as a man is said to have a right to his property, he may be equally said to have a property in his rights.

On Saturday, March 4, 1809, in his First Inaugural Address, President James Madison stated:

To support the Constitution, which is the cement of the Union, as well in its limitations as in its authorities; to respect the rights and authorities reserved to the States and to the people as equally incorporated with and essential to the success of the general system; to avoid the slightest interference with the rights of conscience or the function of religion, so wisely exempted from civil jurisdiction...as far as sentiments and intentions such as these can aid the fulfillment of my duty, they will be a resource which can not fail me....

But the source to which I look for the aids which alone can supply my deficiencies is in the well-tryed intelligence and virtue of my fellow-citizens, and in the counsels of those representing them in the other departments associated in the care of the national interests.

In these my confidence will under every difficulty be best placed, next to that which we have all been encouraged to feel in the guardianship and guidance of that Almighty Being whose power regulates the destiny of nations, whose blessings have been so conspicuously dispensed to this rising Republic, and to whom we are bound to address our devout gratitude for the past, as well as our fervent supplications and best hopes for the future.

On November 29, 1809, in his First Annual Message to Congress, President James Madison stated:

American Quotations.txt

Recollecting always that for every advantage which may contribute to distinguish our lot from that to which others are doomed by the unhappy spirit of the times we are indebted to that Divine Providence whose goodness has been so remarkably extended to this rising nation, it becomes us to cherish a devout gratitude, and to implore from the same Omnipotent Source a blessing on the consultations and measures about to be undertaken for the welfare of our beloved country.

On October 27, 1810, in a Proclamation that the United States should take possession of the Territory south of the Mississippi Territory and eastward of the Mississippi River extending to the Perdi do River, President James Madison stated:

The good people inhabiting the same are invited and enjoined... to be obedient to the laws, to maintain order, to cherish harmony, and in every manner to conduct themselves as peaceful citizens, under full assurance that they will be protected in the enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion.

On December 5, 1810, in his Second Annual Message to Congress, President James Madison stated:

Among the commercial abuses still committed... it appears that... citizens are instrumental in carrying on a traffic in enslaved Africans, equally in violation of the laws of humanity and in defiance to those of their country. The same just and benevolent motives which produced the interdiction in force against this criminal conduct will doubtless be felt by Congress in devising further means of suppressing the evil....

I close the present by expressing my reliance, under the blessing of Divine Providence, on the judgement and patriotism which will guide your measures.

On November 5, 1811, in his Third Annual Message to Congress, President James Madison stated:

I can not close this communication without expressing my deep sense of the crisis in which you are assembled, my confidence in a wise and honorable result to your deliberations, and assurances of the faithful zeal with which my cooperating duties will be discharged, invoking at the same time the blessing of Heaven on our beloved country.

On March 9, 1812, in a message to Congress, President James Madison stated:

The British Government, through its public minister here, a secret agent of that Government was employed in certain States... in fomenting disaffection to the constituted authorities of the nation, and in intrigues with the disaffected, for the purpose of bringing about resistance to the laws, and eventually, in concert with a British force, of destroying the Union....

In addition to the effect which the discovery of such a procedure ought to have on the public councils, it will not fail to render more dear to the hearts of all good citizens that happy union of these States which, under Divine Providence, is the guaranty of their liberties, their safety, their tranquillity, and their prosperity.

On June 1, 1812, in a message to Congress, President James Madison stated:

We behold, in fine, on the side of Great Britain a state of war against the United States, and on the side of the United States a state of peace toward Great Britain. Whether the United States shall continue passive under these progressive usurpations and these accumulating wrongs, or, opposing force to force in defense of their national rights, shall commit a just cause into the hands of the Almighty Disposer of Events.

On June 19, 1812, in a Proclamation of War between Great Britain and the United States, President James Madison stated:

I do moreover exhort all the good people of the United States, as they love their country, as they value the precious heritage derived from the virtue and valor of their fathers, as they feel the wrongs which have forced on them the last resort of injured nations, and as they consult the best means under the blessing of Divine Providence of abridging its calamities, that they exert themselves in preserving order.

On Thursday, July 9, 1812, President James Madison issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Public Humiliation and Prayer:

Whereas the Congress of the United States, by a joint resolution of the two Houses, have signified a request that a day may be recommended to be observed by the people of the United States with religious solemnity, as a day of public humiliation and prayer; and

Whereas such a recommendation will enable the several religious denominations and societies so disposed, to offer, at one and the same time, their common vows and adorations to Almighty God, on the solemn occasion produced by the war in which He has been pleased to permit the injustice of a foreign Power to involve these United States;

I do therefore recommend the third Thursday of August next, as a convenient day, to be set apart for the devout purpose of rendering the Sovereign of the Universe and the Benefactor of mankind the public homage due to His holy attributes; of acknowledging the transgressions which might justly provoke the manifestations of His divine displeasure; of seeking His merciful forgiveness, and His assistance in the great duties of repentance and amendment; and especially of offering fervent supplications that in the present season of calamity and war He would take the American people under His peculiar care and protection; that He would guide their public councils, animate their patriotism, and bestow His blessing on their arms; that He would inspire all nations with a love of justice and of concord, and with a reverence for the unerring precept of our holy religion, to do to others as they would require that others should do to them; and, finally, that, turning the hearts of our enemies from the violence and injustice which sway their councils against us, He would hasten a restoration of the blessings of peace.

Given at Washington, the ninth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twelve.
James Madison.

By the President: James Monroe, Secretary of State.

On November 4, 1812, in his Fourth Annual Message to Congress, President James Madison stated:

On our present meeting it is my first duty to invite your attention to the Providential favors which our country has experienced in the unusual degree of health dispensed to its inhabitants, and in the rich abundance with which the earth has rewarded the labors bestowed on it....

The war in which we are actually engaged in... was preceded by a patience without example under wrongs accumulating without end, and it was finally not declared until every hope of averting it was extinguished... through the British envoy here, that the hostile edicts against our commercial rights and our maritime independence would not be revoked....

It was at this moment and with such an alternative that war was chosen. The nation felt the necessity of it, and called for it. The appeal was accordingly made, in a just cause, to the Just and All-powerful Being who holds in His hand the chain of events and the destiny of nations. It remains only that, faithful to ourselves, entangled in no connections with the views of other powers, and ever ready to accept peace from the hand of justice, we prosecute the war with united counsels and with the ample faculties of the nation until peace be so obtained and as the only means under the Divine blessing of speedily obtaining it.

On February 24, 1813, in a message to Congress, President James Madison stated:

The Government of Great Britain had already introduced into her commerce during the war a system which, at once violating the rights of other nations and resting on a mass of forgery and perjury unknown to other times, was making an unfortunate progress in undermining those principles of morality and religion which are the best foundation of national happiness... The general tendency of these demoralizing and disorganizing contrivances will be reprobated by the civilized and Christian world.

On Thursday, March 4, 1813, in his Second Inaugural Address, President James Madison stated:

From the weight and magnitude now belonging to it I should be compelled to shrink if I had less reliance on the support of an enlightened and generous people, and felt less deeply a conviction that the war with a powerful nation, which forms so prominent a feature in our situation, is stamped with that justice which invites the smiles of Heaven on the means of conducting it to a successful termination.

On May 25, 1813, in a Special Session Message to Congress, President James Madison stated:

The contest in which the United States are engaged appeals for its support to every motive that can animate an uncorrupted and enlightened people - to the love of country; the pride of liberty... and, finally, to the sacred obligation of transmitting entire to future generations that precious patrimony of national rights and independence which is held in trust by the present from the goodness of Divine Providence.

On July 23, 1813, President James Madison issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Public Humiliation and Prayer:

Whereas the Congress of the United States, by a joint resolution of the two Houses, have signified a request that a day may be recommended to be observed by the people of the United States with religious solemnity as a day of public humiliation and prayer; and

Whereas in times of public calamity such as that of the war brought on the United States by the injustice of a foreign government it is especially becoming that the hearts of all should be touched with the same and the eyes of all be turned to that Almighty Power in whose hands are the welfare and the destiny of nations:

I do therefore issue this my proclamation, recommending to all who shall be piously disposed to unite their hearts and voices in addressing at one and the same time their vows and adorations to the Great Parent and Sovereign of the Universe that they assemble on the second Thursday of September next in their respective religious congregations to render Him thanks for the many blessings He has bestowed on the people of the United States; that He has blessed them with a land capable of yielding all the necessaries and requisites of human life, with ample means for convenient exchanges with foreign countries; that He has blessed the labors employed in this cultivation and improvement; that He is now blessing the exertions to extend and establish the arts and manufactures which will secure within ourselves supplies too important to remain dependent on the precarious policy or the peaceable dispositions of other nations, and particularly that He has blessed the United States with a political Constitution founded on the will and authority of the whole people and guaranteeing to each individual security, not only of his person and his property, but of those sacred rights of conscience so essential to his present happiness and so dear to his future hopes; that with those expressions of devout thankfulness be joined supplications to the same Almighty Power that He would look down with compassion on our infirmities; that He would pardon our manifold transgressions and awaken and strengthen in all the wholesome purposes of repentance and amendment; that in this season of trial and calamity He would preside in a particular manner over our public councils and inspire all citizens with a love of their country and with those fraternal affections and that mutual confidence which have so happy a tendency to make us safe at home and respected abroad; and that as He was graciously pleased heretofore to smile on our struggles against the attempts of the Government of the Empire of which these States then made a part to wrest from them the rights and privileges to which they were entitled in common with every other part and to raise them to the station of an independent and sovereign people, so He would now be pleased in like manner to bestow His blessings on our arms in resisting the hostile and persevering efforts of all, from rights and immunities belonging and essential to the American people as a coequal member of the great community of independent nations; and that, inspiring our enemies with moderation, with justice, and with that spirit of reasonable accommodation which our country has continued to manifest, we may be enabled to beat our swords into plowshares and to enjoy in peace every man the fruits of his honest industry and the rewards of his lawful enterprise.

If the public homage of a people can ever be worthy of the favorable regard of the Holy and Omniscient Being to whom it is addressed, it must be that in which those who join in it are guided only by their free choice, by the impulse of their hearts and the dictates of their consciences; and such a spectacle must be interesting to all Christian nations as proving that religion, that gift of Heaven for the good of man, freed from all coercive edicts, from that unhallowed connection with the powers of this world which corrupts religion into an instrument or an usurper of the policy of the state, and making no appeal but to reason, to the heart, and to the conscience, can spread its benign influence everywhere and can attract to the divine altar those freewill offerings of humble supplication, thanksgiving, and praise which alone can be acceptable to Him whom no hypocrisy can deceive and no forced sacrifices propitiate.

Upon these principles and with these views the good people of the United States are invited, in conformity with the resolution aforesaid, to dedicate the day above named to the religious solemnities therein recommended.

Given at Washington, this 23d day of July, A. D. 1813. James Madison.

On December 7, 1813, in his Fifth Annual Message to Congress, President James Madison stated:

The best encouragement is derived from the success with which it has pleased the Almighty to bless our arms both on the land and on the water. . . . On Lake Erie, the squadron under the command of Captain Perry having met the British squadron of superior force, a sanguinary conflict ended in the capture of the whole. . . .

It would be improper to close this communication without expressing a thankfulness in which all ought to unite for the numerous blessings with which our beloved country continues to be favored; for the abundance which overspreads our land, and the prevailing health of its inhabitants; for the preservation of our internal tranquillity, and the stability of our free institutions, and, above all, for the light of Divine truth....

In time, the war, with all its vicissitudes, is illustrating the capacity and the destiny of the United States to be a great, a flourishing, and a powerful nation....In contending for these we behold a subject for our congratulations in the daily testimonies of increasing harmony throughout the nation, and may humbly repose our trust in the smiles of Heaven on so righteous a cause.

On September 1, 1814, in a National Proclamation after the British had invaded the Capitol, President James Madison stated:

Whereas the enemy by a sudden incursion have succeeded in invading the capitol of the nation, defended at the moment by troops less numerous than their own and almost entirely of the militia, during their possession of which, though for a single day only, they wantonly destroyed the public edifices....

On an occasion which appeals so forcibly to the proud feelings and patriotic devotion of the American people none will forget what they owe to themselves, what they owe to their country and the high destinies which await it, what to the glory acquired by their fathers in establishing the independence which is now to be maintained by their sons with the augmented strength and resources with which time and Heaven had blessed them.

On September 20, 1814, in his Sixth Annual Message to Congress, President James Madison stated:

Having forborne to declare war until to other aggressions had been added the capture of nearly a thousand American vessels and the impressment of thousands of American seafaring citizens, and until a final declaration had been made by the Government of Great Britain that her hostile orders against our commerce would not be revoked...our beloved country, in still opposing to his persevering hostility all its energies, with an undiminished disposition toward peace and friendship on honorable terms, must carry with it the good wishes of the impartial world and the best hopes of support from an Omnipotent and Kind Providence.

On November 16, 1814, President James Madison issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Public Humiliation, Fasting and Prayer:

The two Houses of the National Legislature having by a joint resolution expressed their desire that in the present time of public calamity and war a day may be recommended to be observed by the people of the United States as a day of public humiliation and fasting and of prayer to Almighty God for the safety and welfare of these States, His blessing on their arms, and a speedy restoration of peace, I have deemed it proper by this proclamation to recommend that

Thursday, the 12th of January next, be set apart as a day on which all may have an opportunity of voluntarily offering at the same time in their respective religious assemblies their humble adoration to the Great Sovereign of the Universe, of confessing their sins and transgressions, and of strengthening their vows of repentance and amendment. They will be invited by the same solemn occasion to call to mind the distinguished favors conferred on the American people in the general health which has been enjoyed, in the abundant fruits of the season, in the progress of the arts instrumental to their comfort, their prosperity, and their security, and in the victories which have so powerfully contributed to the defense and protection of our country, a devout thankfulness for all which ought to be mingled with their supplications to the Beneficent Parent of the Human Race that He would be graciously pleased to pardon all their offenses against Him; to support and animate them in the discharge of their respective duties; to continue to them the precious advantages flowing from political institutions so auspicious to their liberties, civil and religious; and that He would in a special manner preside over the nation in its public councils and constituted authorities, giving wisdom to its measures and success to its arms in maintaining its rights and in overcoming all hostile designs and attempts against it; and, finally, that by inspiring the enemy with dispositions favorable to a just and reasonable peace its blessings may be speedily and happily restored.

Given at the city of Washington, the 16th day of November, 1814, and of the Independence of the United States the thirty-eighth. James Madison.

On February 18, 1815, in a message to Congress, President James Madison stated:

I lay before Congress copies of the treaty of peace and amity between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, which was signed by the commissioners of both parties at Ghent on the 24th of December, 1814....

My sanguine hope that the peace which has been just declared will not only be the foundation of the most friendly intercourse between the United States and Great Britain, but that it will also be productive of happiness and harmony in every section of our beloved country. The influence of your precepts and example must be everywhere powerful, and while we accord in grateful acknowledgments for the protection which Providence has bestowed upon us, let us never cease to inculcate obedience to the laws and fidelity to the Union as constituting the palladium of the national independence and prosperity.

On March 4, 1815, President James Madison issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving:

The Senate and House of Representatives of the United States have by a joint resolution signified their desire that a day may be recommended to be observed by the people of the United States with religious solemnity as a day of thanksgiving and of devout acknowledgments to Almighty God for His great goodness manifested in restoring to them the blessing of peace.

No people ought to feel greater obligations to celebrate the goodness of the Great Disposer of Events and of the Destiny of Nations than the people of the United States. His kind providence originally conducted them to one of the best portions of the dwelling place allotted for the great family of the human race. He protected and cherished them under all the difficulties and trials to which they were exposed in their early days. Under His fostering care their habits, their sentiments, and their pursuits prepared them for a transition in due time to a state of independence and self-government. In the arduous struggle by which it was attained they were distinguished by multiplied tokens of His benign interposition. During the interval which succeeded He reared them into the strength and endowed them with the resources which have enabled them to assert their national rights and to enhance their national character in another arduous conflict, which is now so happily terminated by a peace and reconciliation with those who have been our enemies. And to the same Divine Author of Every Good and Perfect Gift we are indebted for all those privileges and advantages, religious as well as civil, which are so richly enjoyed in this favored land.

It is for blessings such as these, and more especially for the restoration of the blessing of peace, that I now recommend that the second Thursday in April next be set apart as a day on which the people of every religious denomination may in their solemn assemblies unite their hearts and their voices in a freewill offering to their Heavenly Benefactor of their homage of thanksgiving and of their songs of praise.

Given at the city of Washington on the fourth of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, and of the independence of the United States the thirty-ninth. James Madison.

On December 5, 1815, in his Seventh Annual Message to Congress, President James Madison stated:

In closing this communication I ought not to repress a sensibility, in which you will unite, to the happy lot of our country and to the goodness of a superintending Providence, to which we are indebted for it....

It remains for the guardians of the public welfare... to cherish institutions which guarantee their safety and their liberties, civil and religious.

On December 3, 1816, in his Eighth Annual Message to Congress, President James Madison stated:

Our thankfulness is due to Providence for what is far more than a compensation, in the remarkable health which has distinguished the present year....

The United States, having been the first to abolish within the extent of their authority the transportation of the natives of Africa into slavery, by prohibiting the introduction of slaves and by punishing their citizens participating in the traffic, can not but be gratified at the progress made by concurrent efforts of other nations toward a general suppression of so great an evil....

Government, in a word, whose conduct within and without may bespeak the most noble of all ambitions - that of promoting peace on earth and good will to man. These contemplations, sweetening the remnant of my days, will animate my prayers for the happiness of my beloved country, and a perpetuity of the institutions under which it is enjoyed.

On March 2, 1819, in a letter to Robert Walsh, James Madison wrote:

That there has been an increase of religious instruction since the revolution can admit of no question. The English church was originally the established religion;...Of other sects there were but few adherents, except the Presbyterians who predominated on the west side of the Blue Mountains. A little time previous to the Revolutionary struggle, the Baptists sprang up, and made very rapid progress.

Among the early acts of the Republican Legislature, were those abolishing the Religious establishment, and putting all Sects at full liberty and on a perfect level.

At present the population is divided, with small exceptions, among the Protestant Episcopalians, the Presbyterians, the Baptists and the Methodists...I conjecture the Presbyterians and Baptists to form each about a third, and the two other sects together of which the Methodists are much the smallest, to make up the remaining third....

Among the other sects, Meeting Houses have multiplied and continue to multiply...

Religious instruction is now diffused throughout the Community by preachers of every sect with almost equal zeal...The qualifications of the Preachers, too among the new sects where there is the greatest deficiency, are understood to be improving.

On a general comparison of the present and former times, the balance is certainly and vastly on the side of the present, as to the number of religious teachers the zeal which actuates them, the purity of their lives and the attendance of the people on their instructions.

In 1823, James Madison wrote in a letter to Edward Everett:

The settled question here is that religion is essentially distinct from Civil Government and exempt from its cognizance; that a connexion between them is injurious to both; that there are causes in the human breast, which ensure the perpetuity of religion without the aid of the law; that rival sects, with equal rights, exercise mutual censorship in favor of good morals; that if new sects arise with absurd opinions or overheated maginations, the proper remedies lie in time, forbearance and example; that a legal establishment of religion without a toleration could not be thought of, and with toleration, is no security for public quiet & harmony, but rather a source itself of discord & animosity; and finally that these opinions are supported by experience, which has shewn that every relaxation of the alliance between Law & religion, from the partial example in Holland, to its consummation in Pennsylvania, Delaware, N. J., &c, has been found as safe in practice as it is sound in theory.

Prior to the Revolution, the Episcopal Church was established by law in this State. On the Declaration of Independence it was left with all other sects, to a self-support. And no doubt exists that there is much more of religion among us now that there ever was before the change; and particularly in the Sect which enjoyed the legal patronage. This proves rather more than, that the law is not necessary to the support of religion.

On April 7, 1824, the Board of Visitors of the University of Virginia, of which James Madison was a member, approved the regulations prepared by Thomas Jefferson, Rector of the University, which stated:

Should the religious sects of this State, or any of them, according to the invitation held out to them, establish within or adjacent to, the precincts of the University, schools for instruction in the religion of their sect, the students of the University will be free, and expected to attend religious worship at the establishment of their respective sects, in the morning, and in time to meet their school in the University at its stated hour....

The students of such religious school, if they attend any school of the University, shall be considered as students of the University, subject to the same regulations, and entitled to the same privileges....

The upper circular room of the rotunda shall be reserved for a library. One of its larger elliptical rooms on its middle floor shall be used for annual examinations, or lectures to such schools as are too numerous for their ordinary school room, and for religious worship, under the regulations to be prescribed by law.

On June 25, 1824, in a letter to Henry Lee, James Madison stated:

I entirely concur in the propriety of resorting to the sense in which the Constitution was accepted and ratified by the nation. In that sense alone it is the legitimate Constitution. And if that be not the guide in expounding it, there can be no security for a consistent and stable, more than for a faithful, exercise of its powers....What a metamorphosis would be produced in the code of law if all its ancient phraseology were to be taken in its modern sense.

On November 20, 1825, James Madison stated in a letter to Frederick Beasley:

The belief in a God All Powerful wise and good, is so essential to the moral order of the World and to the happiness of man, that arguments which enforce it cannot be drawn from too many sources nor adapted with too much solicitude to the different characters and capacities to be impressed with it.

In 1833, James Madison expressed to Rev. Jasper Adams in a letter:

I must admit... that it may not be easy, in every possible case, to trace the line of separation, between the rights of the religious and the civil authority, with such distinctness, as to avoid collisions and doubts on unessential points!

James Madison, who was a member of the Episcopalian Church, included in his personal library not only the Holy Bible, but the Book of Common Prayer, Gospel Mystery of Sanctification, and the Life of Man in the Soul of God. In his personal Bible he made copious notes, of which were:

Acts Chapter 19

Holy Ghost. have ye recd. the Holy Ghost since ye Believed. The Apostle does not mean in its Sanctifying operations, but in its miraculous Gifts v. 2d.

Spirit of Prophecy, departed (as the Jews believe) from Israel after the Death of Haggai, Zachariah & Malachi. v. 2d.

Apostles did greater Miracles than Christ, in the matter, not manner, of them v. 11

Until signifies in Scripture as much as never. v

25.

Virgin Mary had no other Child (probably) but our Saviour. v. 25.

Among his manuscripts on the Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles, James Madison commended the Bereans as more noble than the Thessalonians, describing them:

As a noble example for all succeeding Christians to imitate.

In another place James Madison stated:

It is not the talking but the walking and working person that is the true Christian.

Christ's Divinity appears by St. John, chapter xx, 2: 'And Thomas answered and said unto Him, My Lord and my God!' Resurrection testified to and witnessed by the Apostles, Acts iv, 33: 'And with great power gave the apostles witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus, and great grace was upon them all.'

James Madison was raised being close friends with many slaves, especially a young man named Billy. In regards to slavery, Madison wrote:

The whole Bible is against negro slavery; but that the clergy do not preach this, and the people do not see it.

When a slave greeted Mr. Madison by removing his hat, Mr. Madison greeted him back by removing his own hat. When questioned on this practice, Madison replied:

I never allow a negro to excel me in politeness.

On July 9, 1836, on the occasion of the death of James Madison, President Andrew Jackson sent a letter to Mrs. Dorothy "Dolly" Payne Madison at Montpelier, Virginia:

Madam: It appearing to have been the intention of Congress to make me the organ of assuring you of the profound respect entertained by both its branches for your person and character, and of their sincere condolence in the late afflicting dispensation of Providence, which has at once deprived you of a beloved companion and your country of one of its most valued citizens, I perform that duty by transmitting the documents herewith enclosed.

On August 20, 1836, Mrs. Dorothy "Dolly" Payne Madison answered President Andrew Jackson, delivering to him her husband's records of the early Congress:

The best return I can make for the sympathy of my country is to fulfill the sacred trust his confidence reposed in me, that of placing before it and the world what his pen prepared for their use - a legacy of the importance of which is deeply impressed on my mind.

Brooks, John (1752-March 1, 1825), was a physician who became the Governor of Massachusetts. He stated:

I look back upon my humble life with humility. I am sensible of many imperfections that cling to me. I know that the present is neither the season nor the place to begin the preparation for death.

Our whole life is given us for this great object, and the work of preparation should be early commenced, and be never relaxed till the end of our days. To God I can appeal that it has been my humble endeavor to serve Him with sincerity; and wherein I have failed, I trust in His grace to forgive.

I now rest my soul on the mercy of the adorable Creator, through the only mediation of His Son, our Lord.

Broom, Jacob (1752-1810), was an American banker, entrepreneur, farmer, merchant and surveyor. He was a signer of the Constitution of the United States of America. Jacob Broom was described in the Official Papers of Delaware, written in 1909, as follows:

A fair example of the product of a sturdy, energetic, sagacious ancestry and evangelical Swedish orthodoxy, co-operating amid the trying environments of a struggling colony in an undeveloped land. . . .

He lived in one of the potential crises of history, in which and for which the sublime visions and words of prophets and apostles had developed and inspired a stalwart manhood. . . .

As it is an accepted fact that "the foundation of all permanent prosperity is a right regard for the Divine Being", it is proper to say that Jacob Broom was a God-fearing man.

As a delegate from the State of Delaware, Jacob Broom would have complied with the requirements for office as stipulated by his state's constitution, which included:

Article XXII. Every person who shall be chosen a member of either house, or appointed to any office or place of trust. . . shall. . . make and subscribe the following declaration, to wit: "I, _____, do profess faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ His only Son, and in the Holy Ghost, one God, blessed for evermore; and I do acknowledge the holy scriptures of the Old and New Testaments to be given by divine inspiration."

In a letter to his son, then a senior at Princeton University, Jacob Broom wrote in 1794:

Do not be so much flattered as to relax in your application; do not forget to be a Christian. I have said much to you on this head, and I hope an indelible impression is made.

Morris, Gouverneur (January 31, 1752-November 6, 1816), was an attorney, politician, soldier and diplomat. He penned the final draft of the Constitution of the United States, being the head of the Committee on Style, and was the originator of the phrase "We the people of the United States." He was 35 years old when he served as one of the members of the Continental Congress, and he spoke 173 times during the Constitutional debates (more than any other delegate).

He was the first U.S. Minister to France, a U.S. Senator, and helped to write the New York Constitution. A graduate of King's College (Columbia University), he was a merchant, lawyer, planter, financier and pioneer promoter of the Erie Canal.

On April 17, 1778, Gouverneur Morris wrote a letter to his mother:

I look forward serenely to the course of events, confident that the Fountain of Supreme wisdom and virtue will provide for the happiness of his creatures....

Whenever the present storm subsides, I shall rush with eagerness into the bosom of private life, but while it continues, and while my country calls for the exertion of that little share of abilities, which it has pleased God to bestow on me, I hold it my indispensable duty to give myself to her.

In An Address on the Bank of North America, given in the Pennsylvania State Assembly, 1785, Gouverneur Morris stated:

How can we hope for public peace and national prosperity, if the faith of governments so solemnly pledged can be so lightly infringed? Destroy this prop, which once gave us support, and where will you turn in the hour of distress? To whom will you look for succor? By what promise or vows can you hope to obtain confidence?

This hour of distress will come. It comes to all, and the moment of affliction is known to Him alone, whose Divine Providence exalts or depresses states and kingdoms. Not by the blind dictates of arbitrary will. Not by a tyrannous and despotic mandate.

But in proportion to their obedience or disobedience of His just and holy laws. It is He who commands us that we abstain from wrong. It is He who tells you, "do unto others as ye would that they would do unto you."

On April 29, 1789, shortly before the French Revolution, Gouverneur Morris wrote in a letter to George Washington:

The materials for a revolution in this country (France) are very indifferent. Everybody agrees that there is an utter prostration of morals; but this general proposition can never convey to an American mind the degree of depravity.

It is not by any figure of rhetoric, or force of language, that the idea can be communicated. A hundred anecdotes, and a hundred thousand examples, are required to show the extreme rottenness of every member. There are men and women who are greatly and eminently virtuous. I have the pleasure to number many in my acquaintance; but they stand forward from a background deeply shaded.

It is however, from such crumbling matter, that the great edifice of freedom is to be erected here....The great masses of the common people have no religion but their priests, no law but their superiors, no morals but their interest.

These are the creatures who, led by drunken curates, are now in the high road a la liberte, and the first use they make of it is to form insurrections everywhere for the want of bread.

In a speech prepared for the King of France, Gouverneur
Morris wrote in 1792:

Those who are charged with the important duties of administering justice, should, if possible, depend only on God.

When France was in the process of establishing a new form of government, Gouverneur Morris offered them his expertise in government formation by writing Observation on Government, Applicable to the Political State of France, and Notes on the Form of a Constitution for France in 1792:

Religion is the only solid basis of good morals;
therefore education should teach the precepts of religion, and the duties of man toward God.

These duties are, internally, love and adoration; externally, devotion and obedience; therefore provision should be made for maintaining divine worship as well as education.

But each one has a right to entire liberty as to religious opinions, for religion is the relation between God and man; therefore it is not within the reach of human authority.

In a letter to Thomas Jefferson, written on December 3, 1792, Gouverneur Morris commented regarding France:

The open contempt of religion, also cannot but be offensive to all sober minded men.

In writing again to his Tory mother, Gouverneur Morris expressed:

There is one Comforter who weighs our Minutes and Numbers out our Days.

Near the end of his life, Gouverneur Morris stated that he would soon:

Descend towards the grave full of gratitude to the Giver of all good.

Dwight, Timothy (May 14, 1752-January 11, 1817), was an American educator and author. He was the president of Yale, 1795-1817. He was the grandson of Jonathan Edwards, the New England minister and president of Princeton University. Timothy Dwight's grandson, also named Timothy Dwight, was president of Yale from 1886 to 1898.

During his presidency at Yale, Timothy Dwight, Sr. was instrumental in fostering a powerful revival which ensued at the New Haven campus. A large percentage of the class were not only professing Christ, but entering the ministry. On July 4th, 1798, in New Haven, President Timothy Dwight delivered an address entitled, The Duty of Americans, at the Present Crisis,

Illustrated in a Discourse, in which stated:

About the year 1728, Voltaire, so celebrated for his wit and brilliancy and not less distinguished for his hatred of Christianity and his abandonment of principle, formed a systematical design to destroy Christianity and to introduce in its stead a general diffusion of irreligion and atheism. For this purpose he associated with himself Frederick the II, king of Prussia, and Mess. D'Alembert and Diderot, the principal compilers of the Encyclopedie, all men of talents, atheists, and in the like manner abandoned.

The principle parts of this system were:

1. The compilation of the Encyclopedie: in which with great art and insidiousness the doctrines of natural as well as Christian theology were rendered absurd and ridiculous; and the mind of the reader was insensibly steeled against conviction and duty.

2. The overthrow of the religious orders in Catholic countries, a step essentially necessary to the destruction of the religion professed in those countries.

3. The establishment of a sect of philosophists to serve, it is presumed as a conclave, a rallying point, for all their followers.

4. The appropriation to themselves, and their disciples, of the places and honors of members of the French Academy, the most respectable literary society in France, and always considered as containing none but men of prime learning and talents. In this way they designed to hold out themselves and their friends as the only persons of great literary and intellectual distinction in that country, and to dictate all literary opinions to the nation.

5. The fabrication of books of all kinds against Christianity, especially such as excite doubt and generate contempt and derision. Of these they issued by themselves and their friends who early became numerous, an immense number; so printed as to be purchased for little or nothing, and so written as to catch the feelings, and steal upon the approbation, of every class of men.

6. The formation of a secret Academy, of which Voltaire was the standing president, and in which books were formed, altered, forged, imputed as posthumous to deceased writers of reputation, and sent abroad with the weight of their names. These were printed and circulated at the lowest price through all classes of men in an uninterrupted succession, and through every part of the kingdom...

While these measures were advancing the great design with a regular and rapid progress, Doctor Adam Weishaupt, professor of the canon law in the University of Ingolstadt, a city of Bavaria (in Germany), formed, about the year 1777, the order of Illuminati. This order is professedly a high order of Masons, originated by himself, and grafted on ancient Masonic institutions....

In societies of Illuminati, doctrines were taught which strike at the root of all human happiness and virtue; and every such doctrine was either expressly or implicitly involved in their system. The being of God was denied and ridiculed... The possession of property was pronounced robbery. Chastity and natural affection were declared to be nothing more than groundless prejudices. Adultery, assassination, poisoning, and other crimes of the like infernal nature, were taught as lawful and even as virtuous actions. To crown such a system of falsehood and horror, all means were declared to be lawful, provided the end was good....

The great and good ends proposed by the Illuminati as the ultimate objects of their union are the overthrow of religion, government, and human society, civil and domestic. These they pronounce to be so good that murder, butchery, and war, however extended and dreadful, are declared by them to be completely justifiable if necessary for these great purposes. With such an example in view, it will be in vain to hunt for ends, which can be evil. Correspondent with this summary was the whole system. No villainy, no impiety, no cruelty can be named which was not vindicated; and no virtue which was not covered with contempt.

The means by which this society was enlarged and its doctrines spread were of every promising kind. With unremitting ardor and diligence the members insinuated themselves into every place of power and trust, and into every literary, political, and friendly society; engrossed as much as possible the education of youth, especially of distinction; became licensers of the press and directors of every literary journal; waylaid every foolish prince, every unprincipled civil officer, and every abandoned clergyman; entered boldly into the desk, and with unhallowed hands and satanic lips polluted the pages of God; enlisted in their service almost all the booksellers and of course the printers of Germany; inundated the country with book replete with infidelity, irreligion, immorality, and obscenity; prohibited the printing and prevented the sale of books of the contrary character; decried and ridiculed them when published in spite of their efforts; panegyricized and trumpeted those of themselves and their coadjutors; and in a word made more numerous, more diversified, and more strenuous exertions than an active imagination would have preconceived....

Where religion prevails, Illumination cannot make disciples, a French directory cannot govern, a nation cannot be made slaves, nor villains, nor atheists, nor beasts. To destroy us therefore, in this dreadful sense, our enemies must first destroy our Sabbath and seduce us from the house of God. Religion and liberty are the two great objects of defensive war. Conjoined, they united all the feelings and call forth all the energies of man....

Religion and liberty are the meat and the drink of the body politic. Withdraw one of them and it languishes, consumes, and dies. If indifference to either, at any time, becomes the prevailing character of a people, one half of their motives to vigorous defense is lost, and the hopes of their enemies are proportionally increased. Here, eminently, they are inseparable.

Without religion we may possibly retain the freedom of savages, bears, and wolves, but not the freedom of New England. If our religion were gone, our state of society would perish with it and nothing would be left which would be worth defending.

Timothy Dwight stated:

Where there is no religion, there is no morality... With the loss of religion... the ultimate foundation of confidence is blown up; and the security of life, liberty and property are buried in ruins.

The Bible is a window in this prison of hope, through which we look into eternity.

Perhaps no one who has persisted in his efforts to gain eternal life was ever finally deserted by the Spirit of grace.

In a 1777 sermon, Timothy Dwight explained:

Nothing obstructs the deliverance of America but the crimes of its inhabitants...

Independence and happiness [are] fixed upon the most lasting foundations, and that Kingdom of the Redeemer... [is] highly exalted and durably established on the ruins

In a sermon Yale President Timothy Dwight communicated:

God brought His little flock hither and placed it in this wilderness, for the great purpose of establishing permanently the church of Christ in these vast regions of idolatry and sin, and commencing here the glorious work of salvation. This great continent is soon to be filled with the praise of the Millennium. But here is the seed, from which this vast harvest is to spring.

Liberty Bell (August 1752), was cast in England by an order of the Pennsylvania Assembly to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the colony's existence. Founded in 1701, when William Penn wrote the Charter of Privileges, the colony's Assembly declared a "Year of Jubilee" in 1751, and commissioned a bell to be put in the Philadelphia State House. The Liberty Bell got its name from being rung at the first public reading of the Declaration of Independence, July 8, 1776, and it cracked as it was rung at the funeral for Chief Justice John Marshall, 1835.

Isaac Norris, the Speaker of the Pennsylvania Assembly, chose Leviticus chapter 25 verse 10:

And ye shall make hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof; it shall be a jubilee.

The inscription cast onto the bell, August 1752, stated:

Proclaim liberty through all the land and to all the inhabitants thereof. (Leviticus XXV. 10)

Randolph, Edmund Jennings (August 10, 1753-September 13, 1813), was an American Revolutionary leader. He was a member of the Continental Congress and delegate to the Constitutional Convention. He was the Governor of Virginia, U.S. Attorney General and U.S. Secretary of State.

On June 28, 1787, at the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia, following the historical address and appeal for prayer by Dr. Benjamin Franklin (which ended the heated debates over state representation), Edmund Jennings Randolph of Virginia proposed:

That a sermon be preached at the request of the convention on the 4th of July, the anniversary of Independence; & thenceforward prayers be used in ye Convention every mornng.

Both houses of Congress have been opened with prayers ever since.

On July 4th, according to the proposal by Edmund Jennings Randolph of Virginia, the entire Constitutional Convention assembled in the Reformed Calvinistic Church to hear a sermon by Rev. William Rogers. His prayer was a reflection of the hearts of all the delegates, following the convicting admonition of Dr. Franklin:

We fervently recommend to the fatherly notice...our federal convention...Favor them, from day to day, with thy inspiring presence; be their wisdom and strength; enable them to devise such measures as may prove happy instruments in healing all divisions and prove the good of the great whole...that the United States of America may form one example of a free and virtuous government....

May we...continue, under the influence of republican virtue, to partake of all the blessings of cultivated and Christian society.

McHenry, James (November 16, 1753-May 3, 1816), was a physician, soldier and politician. He was one of the signers of the Constitution of the United States, a member of the Continental Congress, a state legislator, and the U.S. Secretary of War, who supervised the establishment of the U.S. Military Academy at West Point.

He studied medicine under the renowned Dr. Benjamin Rush, himself a signer of the Declaration of Independence. James McHenry served with distinction under General Washington on the medical staff during the Revolutionary War. Fort McHenry, where, in 1812, the battle with Britain occasioned the writing of our national anthem, was named after him.

In 1813, he became the president of the first Bible society in Baltimore, Maryland. He conveys the urgency of distributing Bibles to the public in an article to solicit funds for the society:

Neither, in considering this subject, let it be overlooked, that public utility pleads most forcibly for the general distribution of the Holy Scriptures.

The doctrine they preach, the obligations they impose, the punishment they threaten, the rewards they promise, the stamp and image of divinity they bear, which produces a conviction of their truths, can alone secure to society, order and peace, and to our courts of justice and constitutions of government, purity, stability and usefulness.

In vain, without the Bible, we increase penal laws and draw intrenchments around our institutions. Bibles are strong intrenchments. Where they abound, men cannot pursue wicked courses, and at the same time enjoy quiet conscience.

Consider also, the rich do not possess aught more precious than their Bible, and that the poor cannot be presented by the rich with anything of greater value. Withhold it not from the poor. It is a book of councils and directions, fitted to every situation in which man can be placed. It is an oracle which reveals to mortals the secrets of heavens and the hidden will of the Almighty....

It is an estate, whose title is guaranteed by Christ, whose delicious fruits ripen every season, survive the worm, and keep through eternity. It is for the purpose of distributing this divine book more effectually and extensively among the multitudes, whose circumstances render such a donation necessary, that your cooperation is most earnestly requested.

Dartmouth College (1754), was founded in New Hampshire by Reverend Eleazar Wheelock by a charter granted by George III. Its alumni included Daniel Webster, who defended the College's Charter before the U.S. Supreme Court, 1819. The Charter of Dartmouth College, 1754, stated:

Whereas... the Reverend Eleazar Wheelock... educated a number of the children on the Indian natives with a view to their carrying the Gospel in their own language and spreading the knowledge of the great Redeemer among their savage tribes. And... the design became reputable among the Indians insomuch that a larger number desired the education of their children in said school... Dartmouth-College [has been founded] for the education and instruction of youths... in reading, writing and all parts of learning which shall appear necessary and expedient for civilizing and Christianizing the children.

Columbia University (1754), founded in New York City. Originally named Kings College in honor of King George II, it was renamed Columbia College, 1784, and Columbia University, 1896. It has grown to become one of the most influential universities in America.

Its seal consisted of a seated woman and written above her head the Hebrew Tetragrammaton name of God, YHVH. The Latin motto inscribed across the top is Psalm 36:10, "In Thy light we see light." The Hebrew phrase Uri El, which is written on a ribbon, alludes to Psalm 27:1 "God is my light." Under the woman's feet is inscribed the scripture, "1 PET. II. 1-2", admonishing students to desire of the pure milk of God's Word.

Admission requirements for Columbia College, which John Jay, the first Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, passed at the age of fourteen, included translating from Greek the first ten chapters of the Gospel of John. The requirements stated:

No candidate shall be admitted into the College... unless he shall be able to render into English... the Gospels from the Greek... It is also expected that all students attend public worship on Sunday.

In 1787, William Samuel Johnson, a signer of the U. S. Constitution, became the first president of the new Columbia College, 1787-1800. In his commencement speech to the college's graduates, William Samuel Johnson stated:

You this day, gentlemen, . . . have . . . received a public education, the purpose whereof hath been to qualify you the better to serve your Creator and your country. . . . Your first great duties, you are sensible, are those you owe to Heaven, to your Creator and Redeemer. Let these be ever present to your minds and exemplified in your lives and conduct. Imprint deep upon your minds the principles of piety towards God and a reverence and fear of His holy name. The fear of God is the beginning of wisdom. . . . Remember, too, that you are the redeemed of the Lord, that you are bought with a price, even the inestimable price of the precious blood of the Son of God. . . . Love, fear, and serve Him as your Creator, Redeemer, and Sanctifier. Acquaint yourselves with Him in His Word and holy ordinances. Make Him your friend and protector and your felicity is secured both here and hereafter.

Baldwin, Abraham (November 22, 1754-March 4, 1807), was an attorney, educator and politician. He was a signer of the Constitution of the United States, member of Congress and U. S. Senator.

He graduated from Yale University and, in 1781, was offered the professorship of divinity there. He served as chaplain in the Continental Army during the Revolutionary War and later studied law. In 1783 he was admitted to the bar, elected to the state assembly, and later chosen as a representative from Georgia to the Constitutional Convention.

In 1785, he founded and became the first President of the University of Georgia, which was the first state-chartered university in the United States. Through his far-sighted efforts, he secured for the university 40,000 acres of land. His expertise in law and ministry was manifest in his writing of the Charter of the College of Georgia:

As it is the distinguishing happiness of free governments that civil order should be the result of choice and not of necessity, and the common wishes of the people become the laws of the land, their public prosperity and even existence very much depend upon suitably forming the minds and morals of their citizens.

When the minds of the people in general are viciously disposed and unprincipled, and their conduct disorderly, a free government will be attended with greater confusions and evils more horrid than the wild, uncultivated state of nature.

It can only be happy when the public principles and opinions are properly directed, and their manners regulated.

This is an influence beyond the reach of laws and punishments, and can be claimed only by religion and education.

It should therefore be among the first objects of those who wish well to the national prosperity to encourage and support the principles of religion and morality, and early to place the youth under the forming hand of society, that by instruction they may be molded to the love of virtue and good order.

Sending them abroad to other countries for their education will not answer these purposes, is too humiliating an acknowledgement of the ignorance or inferiority of our own, and will always be the cause of so great foreign attachments that upon principles of policy it is inadmissible.

Hamilton, Alexander (January 11, 1755-July 11, 1804), was a signer of the U.S. Constitution. He was known as the "Ratifier of the Constitution," writing 51 of the 85 Federalist Papers. These were of immense significance in influencing the States to ratify the Constitution, which was much needed, as two-thirds of the States were required to approve it in order for it to go into effect. Although Alexander Hamilton was raised on the island of Nevis, West Indies, he supported the American's cause. In 1772, at age 15, he came to America. In 1773, he attended King's College, New York, where he worked for independence and wrote patriotic pamphlets, including "The Farmer Refuted." Alexander Hamilton became captain of a New York artillery unit. He was chosen as an aide-de-camp by General George Washington, retained as his staff lawyer and later promoted to Lieutenant Colonel. He was the first Secretary of the Treasury, founded one of the first banks in New York, and established the New York Post.

Alexander Hamilton's roommate at King's College, Robert Troup, described him as:

Attentive to public worship and in the habit of praying upon his knees both night and morning... I have lived in the same room with him for some time, and I have often been powerfully affected by the fervor and eloquence of his prayers.

He had read many of the polemical writers on religious subjects, and he was a zealous believer in the fundamental doctrines of Christianity... I confess that the arguments with which he was accustomed to justify his belief, have tended in no small degree to confirm my own faith in revealed religion.

In February of 1775, in "The Farmer Refuted," Alexander Hamilton wrote:

The Supreme Being gave existence to man, together with the means of preserving and beautifying that existence. He endowed him with rational faculties, by the help of which to discern and pursue such things as were consistent with his duty and interest; and invested him with an inviolable right to personal liberty and personal safety.

The sacred rights of mankind are not to be rummaged for among old parchments or musty records. They are written, as with a sunbeam, in the whole volume of human nature, by the Hand of the Divinity itself, and can never be erased or obscured by mortal power....

Good and wise men, in all ages... have supposed that the Deity, from the relations we stand in to Himself, and to each other, has constituted an eternal and immutable law, which is indispensably obligatory upon all mankind, prior to any human institutions whatsoever.

This is what is called the law of nature, which, being coeval with mankind, and dictated by God himself, is, of course, superior in obligations to any other. It is binding all over the globe, in all countries, and at all times.

No human laws are of any validity, if contrary to this; and such of them as are valid derive all their authority, mediately, or immediately, from this original.

On June 22, 1787, in a speech at the Constitutional Convention, Alexander Hamilton spoke of the biblical concept that mankind has a sinful nature:

Take mankind in general, they are vicious - their passions may be operated upon.... Take mankind as they are, and what are they governed by? Their passions. There may be in every government a few choice spirits, who may act from more worthy motives.

One great error is that we suppose mankind is more honest than they are, our prevailing passions are ambition and interest; and it will be the duty of a wise government to avail itself of those passions, in order to make them subservient to the public good.

After the Constitutional Convention of 1787, Alexander Hamilton stated:

For my own part, I sincerely esteem it a system which without the finger of God, never could have been suggested and agreed upon by such a diversity of interests.

Alexander Hamilton was known to lead his household regularly in the observance of family prayers. In April of 1802, he wrote to his friend, James Bayard:

In my opinion, the present constitution is the standard to which we are to cling. Under its banner bona fide must we combat our political foes, rejecting all changes but through the channel itself provided for amendments. By these general views of the subject have my reflections been guided.

I now offer you the outline of the plan they have suggested. Let an association be formed to be denominated "The Christian Constitutional Society," its object to be first: The support of the Christian religion. second: The support of the United States.

Alexander Hamilton stated:

I have carefully examined the evidences of the Christian religion, and if I was sitting as a juror upon its authenticity I would unhesitatingly give my verdict in its favor. I can prove its truth as clearly as any proposition ever submitted to the mind of man.

In refuting those who had a misunderstanding of the nature of liberty, Alexander Hamilton stated:

The fundamental source of all your errors, sophisms, and false reasoning, is a total ignorance of the natural rights of mankind. Were you once to become acquainted with these, you could never entertain a thought, that all men are not, by nature, entitled to a parity of privileges.

You would be convinced, that natural liberty is a gift of the beneficent Creator, to the whole human race; and that civil liberty is founded in that; and cannot be wrested from any people, without the most manifest violation of justice.

Political disagreements between Hamilton and Aaron Burr led to a duel, set for July 11, 1804. On July 8, 1804, in the event he might not live, Alexander Hamilton wrote his Last Will and Testament:

In the name of God, Amen.

Though, if it should please God to spare my life, I may look for considerable surplus out of my present property; yet if He should speedily call me to the eternal world, a forced sale, as is usual, may possibly render it insufficient to satisfy my debts. I pray God that something may remain for the maintenance and education of my dear wife and children.

The day before the duel, Alexander Hamilton wrote to his wife, Elizabeth:

I need not tell you of the pangs I feel from the idea of quitting you, and exposing you to the anguish I know you would feel. Nor could I dwell on the topic, lest it should unman me. The consolation of religion, my beloved, can alone support you; and these you have a right to enjoy. Fly to the bosom of your God, and be comforted. With my last idea I shall cherish the sweet hope of meeting you in a better world...

In a second note to his wife regarding the duel set for the next morning, Alexander Hamilton wrote:

The scruples of a Christian have determined me to expose my own life to any extent, rather than subject myself to the guilt of taking another... Heaven can preserve me, and I humbly hope will; but, in the contrary event, I charge you to remember that you are a Christian. God's will be done! The will of a merciful God must be good...

Since Alexander Hamilton had been successful in helping to outlaw dueling in New York, he and Aaron Burr took their places on the New Jersey side of the Hudson River. On July 11, 1804, Hamilton was fatally shot. He suffered for ten hours before death. The Reverend Benjamin Moore, Episcopalian Bishop of New York, stayed with him, ministering the last rites. He recorded Hamilton's last word:

I have a tender reliance on the mercy of the Almighty, through the merits of the Lord Jesus Christ. I am a sinner. I look to Him for mercy; pray for me.

In the eulogy given for him, Alexander Hamilton was quoted as saying:

American Quotations.txt

Mortals hastening to the tomb, and once the companions of my pilgrimage, take warning, and avoid my errors. Cultivate the virtues I have recommended. Choose the Saviour I have chosen. Live disinterestedly, and would you rescue anything from final dissolution, lay it up in God.

On May 17, 1923, at the unveiling of a statue of Alexander Hamilton, President Warren G. Harding stated:

It was from Hamilton's lips that came the finest utterance ever made concerning human liberty: "The sacred rights of mankind are written as with a sunbeam, by the hand of Divinity itself, never to be erased or obscured by mortal power."

King, Rufus (March 24, 1755-April 29, 1827), was an attorney, politician and a diplomat. He was one of the signers of the Constitution of the United States; a member of the Continental Congress; a diplomat; a U. S. Minister to England; and a U. S. Senator from New York. He also served as an aide to General Sullivan during the Revolutionary War. At 32 years old, Rufus King, a graduate of Harvard, was one of the youngest delegates at the Constitutional Convention.

In a speech made before the Senate at the time Missouri was petitioning for statehood, Rufus King stated:

I hold that all laws or compacts imposing any such condition [as involuntary servitude] upon any human being are absolutely void because contrary to the law of nature, which is the law of God.

Hale, Nathan (June 6, 1755-September 22, 1776), was a American patriot of the Revolutionary War. Born in Coventry, Connecticut, he was educated at Yale College and became a teacher at New London. In July of 1775, he joined a Connecticut regiment of volunteers, as did his five brothers. He enlisted as a first lieutenant and within six months was promoted to captain, stationed near New York City.

When General Washington appealed for a someone to gather desperately needed intelligence on the British forces, Nathan Hale volunteered. He disguised himself as a Dutch schoolmaster and discreetly visited the British camps in New York and Long Island, gathering information and making rough drawings of their fortifications.

Fatefully, on the night of September 21, Hale was captured. He was sentenced to be hanged the next morning. British Major Cunningham denied his last request for a Bible and destroyed his final letter to his friends.

The next morning he was brought to the gallows, near 66th Street and Third Avenue in New York City, and hanged. A British officer later gave the account that Nathan Hale's last words were:

I only regret that I have but one life to lose for my country.

The angered British Major in charge shouted in response: "Swing the rebel up!"

A large boulder in New York City near Long Island Sound marks "Hale-site," where it is believed Hale was captured.

Marshall, John (September 24, 1755-July 6, 1835), was the Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, appointed by President John Adams, and held that position for 34 years. He had been a captain in the Revolutionary War and had served with General George Washington during the freezing winter at Valley Forge in 1777-78.

John Marshall was a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses and strongly advocated the ratification of the Constitution. He turned down President George Washington's offer to be the U.S. Attorney General, though he later served as U.S. Minister to France, gaining recognition for his refusal to take French bribes during the "XYZ Affair."

After having been a U.S. Representative, he was appointed Secretary of State, and finally Chief Justice of the Supreme Court in 1801. His influence helped form the judicial branch of the government. In the 1833 case of Barron v. Baltimore, Marshall emphasized that the Bill of Rights restricted only the national government. The country mourned at his death, and it was at his funeral, 1835, that the Liberty Bell cracked.

The Winchester Republican newspaper published the following occurrence involving Chief Justice John Marshall at McGuire's Hotel in Winchester, after he had encountered trouble with his carriage along the road:

The shafts of his ancient gig were broken and "held together by switches formed from the bark of a hickory sapling"; he was negligently dressed, his knee buckles loosened. In the tavern a discussion arose among some young men concerning "the merits of the Christian religion." The debate grew warm and lasted "from six o'clock until eleven." No one knew Marshall, who sat quietly listening.

Finally one of the youthful combatants turned to him and said: Well, my old gentleman, what think you of these things?"

Marshall responded with a "most eloquent and unanswerable appeal." He talked for an hour, answering "every argument urged against" the teachings of Jesus. "In the whole lecture, there was so much simplicity and energy, pathos and sublimity, that not another word was uttered."

The listeners wondered who the old man could be. Some thought him a preacher; and great was their surprise when they learned afterwards that he was the Chief Justice of the United States.

John Marshall, who had previously fought with Washington in the Revolutionary War and served with him at Valley Forge, described General Washington in these terms:

Without making ostentatious professions of religion, he was a sincere believer in the Christian faith, and a truly devout man.

John Marshall's daughter makes this statement regarding her father's religious views:

He told me that he believed in the truth of the Christian Revelation... during the last months of his life he read Keith on Prophecy, where our Saviour's divinity is incidentally treated, and was convinced by this work, and the fuller investigation to which it led, of the supreme divinity of our Saviour. He determined to apply to the communion of our Church, objecting to communion in private, because he thought it his duty to make a public confession of the Saviour.

John Marshall is recorded as stating:

No person, I believe, questions the importance of religion to the happiness of man even during his existence in this world....

The American population is entirely Christian, and with us, Christianity and religion are identified. It would be strange, indeed, if with such a people, our institutions did not presuppose Christianity, and did not often refer to it, and express relations with it.

In the case of McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheaton 316, 431, 1819, John Marshall stated:

The power to tax involves the power to destroy.

Mozart, Wolfgang Amadeus (January 27, 1756-December 5, 1791), was a master German musical composer and pianist. Living only till the age of 35, Mozart has forever earned a place as one the most renowned geniuses in the history of music. One of the events that influenced his work was meeting the composer, Franz Josef Haydn. Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart composed over 600 works for royalty all across Europe, including: symphonies, operas, concertos, sonatas, and choral and chamber pieces.

On July 3, 1778, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart wrote from Paris to a friend:

Mourn with me! This has been the most melancholy day of my life; I am now writing at two o'clock in the morning. I must tell you that my mother, my darling mother, is no more. God has called her to Himself; I clearly see that it was His will to take her from us, and I must learn to submit to the will of God. The Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away.... I am fully convinced that God has so ordained it.

All I would ask of you at present is, to act the part of a true friend, by preparing father by degrees for this sad intelligence.... May God give him strength and courage! My dear friend, I am consoled not only now, but I have been for some time past.

By the mercy of God, I have borne it with all firmness and composure. When the danger became imminent, I prayed my heavenly Father for only two things - a happy death for my mother, and strength and courage for myself, and our gracious God heard my prayer, and conferred those two boons fully upon me.

In a letter, Mozart wrote:

It is a great consolation for me to remember that the Lord, to whom I had drawn near in humble and child-like faith, has suffered and died for me, and that He will look on me in love and compassion.

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart insisted:

Neither a lofty degree of intelligence nor imagination nor both together go to the making of genius. Love, love, love, that is the soul of genius.

Johnson, Richard (b.1757) was the first chaplain to the Colony of New South Wales in Australia. Recommended to that position by William Wilberforce and the Rev. John Newton, Richard Johnson, and his wife, Mary Burton, sailed with the First Fleet on May 13, 1787.

On January 26, 1788, Governor Arthur Phillip and Captain John Hunter directed the Fleet up harbor to Sydney amidst warlike demonstrations by the natives from the shore. Upon their landing, they raised the British flag, toasted their Majesties and gave a gun salute.

On Sunday, February 3, 1788, Chaplain Richard Johnson preached his first sermon under a large tree to a congregation of convicts and troops:

"What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits towards me?" (Psalm 116:12)... Take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord.

In the first five years, he conducted 226 baptisms, 220 marriages and 851 funerals. In need of additional clergymen, Johnson requested:

A man of plain habits, and who humbly yet zealously devotes his time and talents in the discharge of his clerical duties, than on of more refined taste or profound learning, and who for this reason may not be so diligent in visiting them, which from experience I have found so important a part of a minister's duty, and as the most likely means of his being made useful.

Richard Johnson served under the authority of Admiral and Governor Arthur Phillips. The official instructions given to the governor stated that:

He was to enforce due observance of religion and good order among the inhabitants, and take such steps for the due celebration of public worship as circumstances would permit....

He was to grant full liberty of conscience, and the full exercise of all modes of religious worship not prohibited by law, provided his charges were content with a quiet and peaceable enjoyment of the same, not giving offence or scandal to government; he was to cause the laws against blasphemy, profaness, adultery, fornication, polygamy, incest, profanation of the Lord's Day, swearing, and drunkenness to be rigorously executed...

[The Governor] was to take care that the Book of Common Prayer as by law to read each Sunday and Holy Day, and that the Blessed Sacrament be administered according to the rites of the Church of England.

On October 4, 1791, in a letter to Henry Fricker, Esq.,

Richard Johnson wrote:

I trust I have not laboured wholly in vain, and I trust in time, in spite of all opposition and obstacles, God will make bare his holy arm in the conversion and salvation of the souls of men...

Last Sunday I preached I suppose to not less than six or eight hundred, and I have since heard that one at least went away sorrowful and heavy-hearted, and some others rejoicing in the Son of God manifested towards them.

In 1792, Richard Johnson stated in an address:

The gospel... proposes a free and gracious pardon to the guilty, cleansing to the polluted, healing to the sick, happiness to the miserable, light for those who sit in darkness, strength for the weak, food for the hungry, and even life for the dead.

In An Address to the Inhabitants of the Colonies, 1792, Richard Johnson stated he was:

Longing, hoping and waiting for the dawn of that happy day when the heathen shall be given to the Lord Jesus for His inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for His possession and when all the ends of the earth shall see, believe and rejoice in the salvation of God.

McGready, James (c. 1758-February 1817), was a pastor of a congregation in Orange County, North Carolina, 1790, and three small congregations in Logan County, Kentucky, 1796. His ministry contributed to the great revivals of 1797, 1798, and 1799, which preceded the Great Revival of 1800. In 1811, he pioneered churches in South Indiana. James McGready wrote A Short Narrative of the Revival of Religion in Logan County in the State of Kentucky and the Adjacent Settlements in the State of Tennessee from May 1797 until 1800.

In 1797, James McGready, together with others in Kentucky, agreed:

Therefore, we bind ourselves to observe the third Saturday of each month for one year as a day of fasting and prayer for the conversion of sinners in Logan County and throughout the world.

We also engage to spend one half hour every Saturday evening, beginning at the setting of the sun, and one half hour every Sabbath morning at the rising of the sun in pleading with God to revive His work.

In June of 1800, five hundred members of McGready's three congregations gathered at Red River for a "camp meeting" which lasted several days. On the final day:

"A mighty effusion of [the] Spirit" came on everyone "and the floor was soon covered with the slain; their screams for mercy pierced the heavens."

In July of 1800, the congregation planned another camp meeting at the Gaspar River. Surpassing their expectations, 8,000 people arrived, some from over 100 miles away. Presbyterian, Baptist and Methodist ministers all worked together. On the third night:

The power of God seemed to shake the whole assembly. Towards the close of the sermon, the cries of the distressed arose almost as loud as his voice. After the congregation was dismissed the solemnity increased, till the greater part of the multitude seemed engaged in the most solemn manner.

No person seemed to wish to go home - hunger and sleep seemed to affect nobody - eternal things were the vast concern. Here awakening and converting work was to be found in every part of the multitude; and even some things strangely and wonderfully new to me.

In August of 1801, Barton W. Stone (1772-1844), together with numerous Methodist, Baptist and Presbyterian ministers, planned a camp meeting at Cane Ridge, Kentucky. Over 25,000 people attended from as far away as Ohio and Tennessee. The immensity of this crowd is appreciated when viewed in light of the fact that Lexington, the largest town in Kentucky, had only 1,800 inhabitants. Reverend Moses Hoge described the gathering:

The careless fall down, cry out, tremble, and not infrequently are affected with convulsive twitches. . . .

Nothing that imagination can paint, can make a stronger impression upon the mind, than one of those scenes. Sinners dropping down on every hand, shrieking, groaning, crying for mercy, convulsed; professors praying, agonizing, fainting, falling down in distress, for sinners or in raptures of joy! . . .

As to the work in general there can be no question but it is of God. The subjects of it, for the most part are deeply wounded for their sins, and can give a clear and rational account of their conversion.

Ames, Fisher (April 9, 1758-July 4, 1808), was an American founder and politician. He was a U. S. Representative from Massachusetts, 1789-97, who help formulate the Bill of Rights in the First Session of the U. S. Congress. He graduated from Harvard, 1774, and became of member of the Massachusetts House of Representatives in 1788, where he participated in the state's ratification of the U. S. Constitution. He was chosen a member of the Governor's Council, 1798, and served until 1800, the year he was honored by the Massachusetts Legislature to deliver the message upon the occasion of George Washington's death. In 1804, he was offered the presidency of Harvard University, but declined due to ill health.

On August 20, 1789, Fisher Ames' suggested wording of the First Amendment was adopted by the House:

Congress shall make no law establishing religion, or to prevent the free exercise thereof, or to infringe the rights of conscience.

Fisher Ames stated:

Should not the Bible regain the place it once held as a school book? Its morals are pure, its examples are captivating and noble. . . .

The reverence for the sacred book that is thus early impressed lasts long; and, probably, if not impressed in infancy, never takes firm hold of the mind....

In no Book is there so good English, so pure and so elegant, and by teaching all the same they will speak alike, and the Bible will justly remain the standard of language as well as of faith.

On September 20, 1789, in an article published in the Palladium magazine, Fisher Ames stated:

We have a dangerous trend beginning to take place in our education. We're starting to put more and more textbooks into our schools....

We've become accustomed of late of putting little books into the hands of children containing fables and moral lessons....

We are spending less time in the classroom on the Bible, which should be the principal text in our schools.... The Bible states these great moral lessons better than any other manmade book.

Monroe, James (April 28, 1758-July 4, 1831), was the 5th President of the United States, 1817-25, having served in public office for fifty years; acquired Florida from Spain, 1819; added Maine, Illinois, Missouri, Alabama and Mississippi to the Union; proclaimed the Monroe Doctrine, 1823, which forbade European powers from interfering with the independent nations of the Western Hemisphere; Regent of University of Virginia, 1826-31; Secretary of State under James Madison, 1811-17; Secretary of War, 1814-15; Governor of Virginia, 1811; U. S. Minister to Great Britain and Spain, 1803-07; helped negotiate the Louisiana Purchase from Napoleon, 1803, which doubled the size of the United States; Governor of Virginia, 1799-1802; U. S. Minister to France, 1794-96; U. S. Senator, 1790-94; member of the Virginia State Convention, 1788; served in the Virginia Assembly, 1786-88; married Eliza Kortwright, 1786; delegate to the Continental Congress, 1783; Officer in the Continental Army, 1776-79; graduated from the College of William and Mary, 1776; and home-schooled as a child by the Reverend William Douglas, being fellow-students with John Marshall, who became the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

On Tuesday, March 4, 1817, in his First Inaugural Address, President James Monroe stated:

Under this Constitution... the States, respectively protected by the National Government under a mild, parental system against foreign dangers, and enjoying within their separate spheres, by a wise partition of power, a just proportion of the sovereignty... are the best proofs of wholesome laws well administered....

And if we look to the condition of individuals what a proud spectacle does it exhibit! On whom has oppression fallen in any quarter of our Union? Who has been deprived of any right of person or property? Who restrained from offering his vows in the mode which he prefers to the Divine Author of his being? It is well known that all these blessings have been enjoyed in their fullest extent....

If we persevere in the career in which we have advanced so far and in the path already traced, we can not fail, under the favor of a gracious Providence, to attain the high destiny which seems to await us....

American Quotations.txt

I enter on the trust to which I have been called by the suffrages of my fellow-citizens with my fervent prayers to the Almighty that He will be graciously pleased to continue to us that protection which He has already so conspicuously displayed in our favor.

On December 2, 1817, in his First Annual Message to Congress, President James Monroe stated:

For advantages so numerous and highly important it is our duty to unite in grateful acknowledgments to that Omnipotent Being from whom they are derived, and in unceasing prayer that He will endow us with virtue and strength to maintain and hand them down in their utmost purity to our latest posterity.

On November 16, 1818, in his Second Annual Message to Congress, President James Monroe stated:

For these inestimable blessings we can not but be grateful to that Providence which watches over the destiny of nations. . . .

When we view the blessings with which our country has been favored, those which we now enjoy, and the means which we possess of handing them down unimpaired to our latest posterity, our attention is irresistibly drawn to the source from whence they flow. Let us then, unite in offering our most grateful acknowledgements for these blessings to the Divine Author of All Good.

On Tuesday, November 14, 1820, in his Fourth Annual Message to Congress, President James Monroe stated:

When, then, we take into view the prosperous and happy condition of our country. . . it is impossible to behold so gratifying, so glorious a spectacle without being penetrated with the most profound and grateful acknowledgements to the Supreme Author of All Good for such manifold and inestimable blessings. . . . And more especially by the multiplied proofs which it has accumulated of the great perfection of our most excellent system of government, the powerful instrument in the hands of our All-merciful Creator in securing to us these blessings.

On Monday, March 5, 1821, in his Second Inaugural Address, President James Monroe stated:

That these powerful causes exist, and that they are permanent, is my fixed opinion; that they may produce a like accord in all questions touching, however remotely, the liberty, prosperity, and happiness of our country will always be the object of my most fervent prayers to the Supreme Author of All Good. . . .

With full confidence in the continuance of that candor and generous indulgence from my fellow-citizens at large which I have heretofore experienced, and with a firm reliance on the protection of Almighty God, I shall forthwith commence the duties of the high trust to which you have called me.

On December 3, 1821, in his Fifth Annual Message to Congress, President James Monroe stated:

Deeply impressed with the blessings which we enjoy, and of which we have such manifold proofs, my mind is irresistibly drawn to that Almighty Being, the great source from whence they proceed and to whom our most grateful acknowledgments are due.

On Tuesday, December 7, 1824, in his Eighth Annual Message to Congress, President James Monroe stated:

The view which I have now to present to you of our affairs, foreign and domestic, realizes the most sanguine anticipations which have been entertained of the public prosperity. . . . For these blessings we owe to Almighty God, from whom we derive them, and with profound reverence, our most grateful and unceasing acknowledgments. . . .

Having commenced my service in early youth, and continued it since with few and short intervals, I have witnessed the great difficulties to which our Union has been exposed, and admired the virtue and intelligence with which they have been surmounted. From the present prosperous and happy state I derive a gratification which I can not express. That these blessings may be preserved and perpetuated will be the object of my fervent and unceasing prayers to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe.

President James Monroe, who was a member of the Episcopalian Church, admonished:

The establishment of our institutions forms the most important epoch that history hath recorded. . . . To preserve and hand them down in their utmost purity to the remotest ages will require the existence and practice of the virtues and talents equal to those which were displayed in acquiring them.

Nelson, Horatio, Viscount (September 29, 1758-October 21, 1805), was a British Admiral. He defeated Napoleon's French fleet at the Battle of the Nile, August 1, 1798, and the combined Spanish and French fleets at the Battle of Trafalgar, October 21, 1805. Although he was victorious in one of the most decisive battles in naval history, Lord Nelson was fatally wounded. Carried below deck, his last words were:

Thank God I have done my duty.

Webster, Noah (October 16, 1758-May 28, 1843), was a statesman, educator and lexicographer. He was noted for compiling the Webster's Dictionary. "The Schoolmaster of the Nation," he published the first edition of his American Dictionary of the English Language in November of 1828, containing the greatest number of biblical definitions in any secular volume.

Noah Webster had served as a soldier in the Revolutionary War; was elected to the Connecticut General Assembly for nine terms; the Legislature of Massachusetts for three terms; and served as a judge. His efforts contributed to the addition of Article I, Section 8, to the United States Constitution. In the Massachusetts Legislature, he labored to have funds appropriated for education.

Noah Webster declared government was responsible to:

Discipline our youth in early life in sound maxims of moral, political, and religious duties.

Noah Webster's American Spelling Book, originally written in the 1780's while teaching in New York, became the most popular book in American education. His "blue-backed speller" set a publishing record of a million copies a year for one hundred years. Early editions even contained a "Moral Catechism" with rules from the scriptures upon which to base moral conduct. Nearly all Americans during this period learned their letters, morality and patriotism from Webster's dictionaries, spellers, catechisms, history books, etc...

In 1788, Noah Webster's essay, "On the Education of Youth in America" was printed in the Webster's American Magazine:

Select passages of [Scripture]...may be read in schools, to great advantage. In some countries the common people are not permitted to read the Bible at all.

In ours, it is as common as a newspaper and in schools is read with nearly the same degree of respect...My wish is not to see the Bible excluded from schools but to see it used as a system of religion and morality.

In 1790, in his American Spelling Book - Containing an easy Standard of Pronunciation, being the first part of a Grammatical Institute of the English Language, Noah Webster wrote:

This first part of a Grammatical Institute of the English Language, is, with permission, most humbly inscribed, as a testimony of my veneration, for the superior talents, piety and patriotism, which enable him to preside over that seat of literature, with distinguished reputation, which render him an ornament to the Christian Profession, and give him an eminent rank among the illustrious characters that adorn the revolution.

In an article published in The American Minerva, September 21, 1796, entitled "Political Fanaticism, No. III," Noah Webster wrote:

The reason why severe laws are necessary in France, is, that the people have not been educated republicans - they do not know how to govern themselves [and so] must be governed by severe laws and penalties, and a most rigid administration.

Noah Webster stated:

Education is useless without the Bible.

The Bible was America's basic text book in all fields.

God's Word, contained in the Bible, has furnished all necessary rules to direct our conduct.

On December 20, 1808, in a letter Thomas Dawes, Noah Webster stated:

About a year ago, an unusual revival of religion took place in New Haven...and I was led by a spontaneous impulse of repentance, prayer, and entire submission and surrender of myself to my Maker and Redeemer...In the month of April last I made a profession of faith.

In 1823, in an article entitled, Letters to a Young Gentleman Commencing His Education, published in New Haven, Noah Webster wrote:

In selecting men for office, let principle be your guide...It is alleged by men of loose principles, or defective views of the subject, that religion and morality are not necessary or important qualifications for political stations.

But the Scriptures teach a different doctrine. They direct that rulers should be men who rule in the fear of God, able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness.

But if we had no divine instruction on the subject, our own interest would demand of us a strict observance of the principle of these injunctions.

And it is to the neglect of this rule of conduct in our citizens, that we must ascribe the multiplied frauds, breeches of trust, peculations and embezzlements of public property which astonish even ourselves; which tarnish the character of our country; which disgrace a republican government; and which will tend to reconcile men to monarchs in other countries and even our own.

When a citizen gives his suffrage [vote] to a man of known immorality, he abuses his trust; he sacrifices not only his own interest, but that of his neighbor, and he betrays the interest of his country.

In 1828, Noah Webster completed his work, An American Dictionary of the English Language - with pronouncing vocabularies of Scripture, classical and geographical names. This 26-year project contained 70,000 entries and 12,000 new definitions. For the first time in the history of the English language a standardized spelling for vocabulary words was provided. Noah Webster stated in the preface:

In my view, the Christian religion is the most important and one of the first things in which all children, under a free government ought to be instructed...

No truth is more evident to my mind than that the Christian religion must be the basis of any government intended to secure the rights and privileges of a free people.

To that great and benevolent Being, who, during the preparation of this work, has sustained a feeble constitution amidst obstacles and toils, disappointments, infirmities and depression; who has borne me and my manuscripts in safety across the Atlantic, and given me strength and resolution to bring the work to a close, I would present the tribute of my most grateful acknowledgements.

And if the talent which He entrusted to my care, has not been put to the most profitable use in his service, I hope it has not been "kept laid up in a napkin" and that any misapplication of it may be graciously forgiven.

New Haven

Noah Webster's 1828 edition of the American Dictionary of the English Language contained numerous Scripture verses from the Old and New Testaments to clarify the context in which a word was to be used. The word Faith had the definition:

Faith... That firm belief of God's testimony, and of the truth of the gospel, which influences the will, and leads to an entire reliance on Christ for salvation.

Being justified by faith. Rom. v.
Without faith it is impossible to please God.

Heb. xi.

For we walk by faith, not by sight. 2Cor. v.
With the heart man believeth to righteousness. Rom. x.

Your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world. Rom. i.

Hast thou faith? Have it to thyself before

God. Rom. xi v.

Children in whom is no faith. Deut. xxxi i.

The word Property had the definition:

Property... The exclusive right of possessing, enjoying and disposing of a thing; ownership. In the beginning of the world, the Creator gave to man dominion over the earth, over the fish of the sea and the fowls of the air, and over every living thing. This is the foundation of man's property in the earth and all its productions... The labor of inventing, making or producing any thing constitutes one of the highest titles to property... It is one of the greatest blessings of civil society that the property of citizens is well secured.

The word Providence had the definition:

Providence... The care and superintendence which God exercises over his creatures... Some persons admit a general providence, but deny a particular providence, not considering that a general providence consists of particulars. A belief in divine providence is a source of great consolation to good men. By divine providence is understood God himself.

The word Law had the definition:

Law of Nature... is a rule or conduct arising out of the natural relations of human beings established by the Creator, and existing prior to any positive precept. Thus it is a law of nature, that one man should not injure another, and murder and fraud would be crimes, independent of any prohibition from a supreme power.... A rule of direction; a directory; as reason and natural conscience. "These, having not the law, are a law to themselves." Rom.ii.

The word Religion had the definition:

Religion.... In its most comprehensive sense, includes a belief in the being and perfection of God, in the revelation of his will to man, and in man's obligation to obey his commands, in a state of rewards and punishment, and in man's accountableness to God; and also true godliness or piety of life, with the practice of all moral duties.... The practice of moral duties without belief in a divine lawgiver, and without reference to his will or commands, is not religion.

In the American Dictionary of the English Language, 1828, Noah Webster stated:

The Bible should be the standard of language as well as of faith.

On October 16, 1829, Noah Webster wrote to James Madison:

The Christian religion, in its purity, is the basis or rather the source of all genuine freedom in government....

I am persuaded that no civil government of a republican form can exist & be durable, in which the principles of that religion have not a controlling influence.

In 1832, in his History of the United States, Noah Webster wrote:

The brief exposition of the constitution of the United States, will unfold to young persons the principles of republican government; and it is the sincere desire of the writer that our citizens should early understand that the genuine source of correct republican principles is the Bible, particularly the New Testament or the Christian religion.

Almost all the civil liberty now enjoyed in the world owes its origin to the principles of the Christian religion....

The religion which has introduced civil liberty is the religion of Christ and His apostles, which enjoins humility, piety, and benevolence; which acknowledges in every person a brother, or a sister, and a citizen with equal rights. This is genuine Christianity, and to this we owe our free Constitutions of Government.

The moral principles and precepts contained in the Scriptures ought to form the basis of all of our civil constitutions and laws....

All the miseries and evils which men suffer from vice, crime, ambition, injustice, oppression, slavery and war, proceed from their despising or neglecting the precepts contained in the Bible.

When you become entitled to exercise the right of voting for public officers, let it be impressed on your mind that God commands you to choose for rulers "just men who will rule in the fear of God." The preservation of a republican government depends on the faithful discharge of this duty;

If the citizens neglect their duty and place unprincipled men in office, the government will soon be corrupted; laws will be made not for the public good so much as for the selfish or local purposes;

Corrupt or incompetent men will be appointed to execute the laws; the public revenues will be squandered on unworthy men; and the rights of the citizens will be violated or disregarded.

If a republican government fails to secure public prosperity and happiness, it must be because the citizens neglect the divine commands, and elect bad men to make and administer the laws.

In an article entitled "Advice to the Young," included in his History of the United States, 1832, Noah Webster stated:

The brief exposition of the Constitution of the United States, will unfold to young persons the principles of republican government; and it is the sincere desire of the writer that our citizens should early understand that the genuine source of correct republican principles is the Bible, particularly the New Testament or the Christian religion....

The 'Advice to the Young,'...will be useful in enlightening the minds of youth in religious and moral principles, and serve...to restrain some of the common vices of our country....

Republican government loses half of its value, where the moral and social duties are imperfectly understood, or negligently practised.

To exterminate our popular vices is a work of far more importance to the character and happiness of our citizens than any other improvements in our system of education.

The preface of Noah Webster's 1833 translation of the Common Version of the Holy Bible, containing the Old and New Testament, with Amendments of the Language, reads:

The Bible is the Chief moral cause of all that is good, and the best corrector of all that is evil, in human society; the best book for regulating the temporal concerns of men, and the only book that can serve as an infallible guide to future felicity....

It is extremely important to our nation, in a political as well as religious view, that all possible authority and influence should be given to the scriptures, for these furnish the best principles of civil liberty, and the most effectual support of republican government.

The principles of genuine liberty, and of wise laws and administrations, are to be drawn from the Bible and sustained by its authority. The man, therefore, who weakens or destroys the divine authority of that Book may be accessory to all the public disorders which society is doomed to suffer....

There are two powers only, sufficient to control men and secure the rights of individuals and a peaceable administration; these are the combined force of religion and law, and the force or fear of the bayonet.

Noah Webster
New Haven 1833.

In his 1834 work entitled, Value of the Bible and Excellence of the Christian Religion, Noah Webster wrote:

The Bible must be considered as the great source of all the truths by which men are to be guided in government, as well as in all social transactions....The Bible [is] the instrument of all reformation in morals and religion.

Moral evils constitute or produce most of the miseries of mankind and these may be prevented or avoided. Be it remembered then that disobedience to God's law, or sin is the procuring cause of almost all the sufferings of mankind.

God has so formed the moral system of this world, that a conformity to His will by men produces peace, prosperity and happiness; and disobedience to His will or laws inevitably produces misery.

If men are wretched, it is because they reject the government of God, and seek temporary good in that which certainly produces evil.

Men may devise and adopt new forms of government; they may amend old forms, repair breaches, and punish violators of the constitution; but there is, there can be, no effectual remedy, but obedience to the divine law.

In the preface of his American Dictionary of the English Language, republished 1841, Noah Webster wrote:

If the language can be improved in regularity, so as to be more easily acquired by our own citizens and by foreigners, and thus be rendered a more useful instrument for the propagation of science, arts, civilization and Christianity.

The liberty of the press, trial by jury, the Habeas Corpus writ, even Magna Carta itself, although justly deemed the palladia of freedom, are all inferior considerations, when compared with a general distribution of real property among every class of people.

The power of entailing estates is more dangerous to liberty and republican government than all the constitutions that can be written on paper, or even than a standing army.

Let the people have property and they will have power - a power that will forever be exerted to prevent a restriction of the press, and abolition of trial by jury, or the abridgement of any other privilege....

The production of genius and the imagination are if possible more really and exclusively property than houses and lands, and are equally entitled to legal security.

Noah Webster stated:

For this reason society requires that the education of youth should be watched with the most scrupulous attention. Education, in a great measure, forms the moral characters of men, and morals are the basis of government.

Education should therefore be the first care of a legislature; not merely the institution of schools, but the furnishing of them with the best men for teachers.

A good system of education should be the first article in the code of political regulations; for it is much easier to introduce and establish an effectual system for preserving morals, than to correct by penal statutes the ill effects of a bad system.

The goodness of a heart is of infinitely more consequence to society than an elegance of manners; nor will any superficial accomplishments repair the want of principle in the mind. It is always better to be vulgarly right than politely wrong....

The education of youth [is] an employment of more consequence than making laws and preaching the gospel, because it lays the foundation on which both law and gospel rest for success.

Republican government loses half of its value, where the moral and social duties are...negligently practised. To exterminate our popular vices is a work of far more importance to the character and happiness of our citizens, than any other improvements in our system of education.

To give children a good education in manners, arts and science, is important; to give them a religious education is indispensable; and an immense responsibility rests on parents and guardians who neglect these duties.

By taking revenge, a man is even with his enemy, but by passing it over, he is superior.

[I]n the lapse of two or three centuries, changes have taken place which in particular passages...obscure the sense of the original languages...The effect of these changes is that some words are...being now used in a sense different from that which they had...[and] present wrong signification or false ideas. Whenever words are understood in a sense different from that which they had when introduced...mistakes may be very injurious.

In A Collection of Papers on Political, Literary and Moral Subjects, published in New York, 1843, Noah Webster stated:

The virtue which is necessary to preserve a just administration and render a government stable, is Christian virtue, which consists in the uniform practice of moral and religious duties, in conformity with the laws of both of God and man.

This virtue must be based on a reverence for the authority of God, which shall counteract and control ambition and selfish views, and subject them to the precepts of divine authority.

The effect of such a virtue would be, to bring the citizens of a state to vote and act for the good of the state, whether that should coincide with their private interests or not.

In A Manual of Useful Studies, published in New Haven, 1839, Noah Webster stated:

In the family are formed the elements of civil governments; the family discipline is the model of all social order;... the respect for the law and the magistrate begins in the respect for parents....

Families are the nurseries of good and bad citizens. The parent who neglects to restrain and govern his child, or who, by his example, corrupts him, is the enemy of the community to which he belongs; the parent who instructs his child in good principles, and subjects him to correct discipline, is the guardian angel of his child, and the best benefactor of society.

Practical truths in religion, in morals, and in all civil and social concerns, ought to be among the first and most prominent objects of instruction. Without a competent knowledge of legal and social rights and duties, persons are often liable to suffer in property or reputation, by neglect or mistakes.

Without religious and moral principles deeply impressed on the mind, and controlling the whole conduct, science and literature will not make men what the laws of God require them to be; and without both kinds of knowledge, citizens can not enjoy the blessings which they seek, and which a strict conformity to rules of duty will enable them to obtain.

Just prior to his death in 1843, Noah Webster professed:

I know whom I have believed, and that He is able to keep that which I have committed to Him against that day.

Armstrong, John (November 25, 1758-April 1, 1843), was an American politician and diplomat. He served as a U. S. Representative; U. S. Senator; Secretary of War, 1813; U. S. Minister to Spain, 1806-10; U. S. Minister to France, 1804-06; and a U. S. Military General. He published the works: Notices of the War of 1812; and Memoirs of Montgomery and Wayne, in Sparks' American Biographies. John Armstrong stated:

Nor is this spiritual and moral disease to be healed by a better education, a few external, transient thoughts.

It requires the hand of the great Physician, the Lord Jesus Christ, by His Holy Spirit, and belief of the truth renewing the state of the mind and disposition of the heart as well, thereby leading the soul from a sense of fear of the wrath of God, the penalty of this broken law, and helpless in itself, to flee to the merits of Jesus, that only refuge or foundation which God hath laid in His Church, and who was made sin for us (that is, a sin-offering), that all "believers be made the righteousness of God by Him."

Swift, Zephaniah (February 27, 1759-September 27, 1823), was an jurist, politician and author. He was U.S. Representative, 1793-97; Connecticut State Representative, 1787-93, 1820-22; member of the Abolition Society, 1795; Chief-Justice of the Connecticut Superior Court, 1806-19; Connecticut Superior Court Judge, 1801-06; and helped frame the Connecticut State Constitution, 1814.

In 1793, in his work The Correspondent, Zephaniah Swift stated:

Christians of different denominations ought to consider that the law knows no distinction among them; that they are all established upon the broad basis of equal liberty, that they have a right to think, speak, and worship as they please, and that no sect has power to injure and oppress another. When they reflect that they are equally under the protection of the law, all will revere and love the constitution, and feel interested in the support of the government. No denomination can pride themselves in the enjoyment of superior and exclusive powers and immunities.

Kirby, William (September 19, 1759-July 4, 1850), was a noted English entomologist. He wrote many significant scientific works, including one by the title of:

On the Power and Wisdom of God and His Goodness as Manifested in the Creation of Animals.

Holy Bible (during the period 1760-1805), was the source for 34 % of all quotations cited by our Founding Fathers. After reviewing an estimated 15,000 items, including newspaper articles, pamphlets, books, monographs, etc., Professors Donald S. Lutz and Charles S. Hyneman, in their work "The Relative Influence of European Writers on Late Eighteenth-Century American Political Thought" published in the American Political Science Review, revealed that the Bible, especially the book of Deuteronomy, contributed 34 % of all quotations used by our Founding Fathers.

The other main sources cited include: Baron Charles Montesquieu 8.3 %, Sir William Blackstone 7.9 %, John Locke 2.9 %, David Hume 2.7 %, Plutarch 1.5 %, Beccaria 1.5 %, Trenchard and Gordon 1.4 %, Delolme 1.4 %, Samuel von Pufendorf 1.3 %, Cicero 1.2 %, Hugo Grotius .9 %, Shakespeare .8 %, Vattel .5 %, etc. These additional sources as well took 60 % of their quotes directly from the Bible. Direct and indirect citations combined reveal that 94 % of all quotations referenced by the Founding Fathers are derived from the Bible.

Dayton, Jonathan (October 16, 1760-October 9, 1824), was the youngest signer of the Constitution of the United States. He was a delegate from New Jersey, a U.S. Senator and the Speaker of the House. The city of Dayton, Ohio, was named after him.

On June 28, 1787, at the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia, Jonathan Dayton wrote down the effects on Congress of Dr. Benjamin Franklin's monumental speech calling for Congress to be opened with prayer every day:

The Doctor sat down; and never did I behold a countenance at once so dignified and delighted as was that of Washington at the close of the address; nor were the members of the convention generally less affected. The words of the venerable Franklin fell upon our ears with a weight and authority, even greater than we may suppose an oracle to have had in a Roman senate!

Morse, Jedediah (August 23, 1761-June 9, 1826), was a pioneer American educator and geographer. Called the "Father of American Geography," his son was Samuel F. B. Morse, the inventor of the telegraph and the Morse Code. Jedediah Morse taught in the New Haven schools for several years, compiled his notes and published them in a successful work entitled, Geography Made Easy, 1784. He set a standard for American Geography, authoring numerous books, including: The American Geography, 1789; Elements of Geography, 1795; The American Gazetteer, 1797; A New Gazetteer of the Eastern Continent, 1802; A Compendious History of New England, 1804; and Annals of the American Revolution. He also founded the New England Tract Society, 1814; The American Bible Society, 1816; and was a member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, 1811-19.

In an "Election Sermon" given at Charleston, Massachusetts, April 25, 1799, Jedediah Morse stated:

To the kindly influence of Christianity we owe that degree of civil freedom, and political and social happiness which mankind now enjoys. In proportion as the genuine effects of Christianity are diminished in any nation, either through unbelief, or the corruption of its doctrines, or the neglect of its institutions; in the same proportion will the people of that nation recede from the blessings of genuine freedom, and approximate the miseries of complete despotism.

I hold this to be a truth confirmed by experience. If so, it follows, that all efforts to destroy the foundations of our holy religion, ultimately tend to the subversion also of our political freedom and happiness.

Whenever the pillars of Christianity shall be overthrown, our present republican forms of government, and all the blessings which flow from them, must fall with them.

Brown University (1763), was founded in Providence, Rhode Island, under the name Rhode Island College. The seventh oldest college in America, it was renamed after the generous benefactors, Nicholas and Moses Brown. Successful manufacturers, they forged cannons in their furnaces and imported ammunition, greatly aiding the Revolutionary Army.

The Charter of Rhode Island College, 1763, stated:

And that the number of the trustees shall, and may be thirty-six; of which twenty-two shall forever be elected of the denomination called Baptists, or Antipedobaptists; five shall forever be elected of the denomination called friends, or Quakers; four shall forever be elected of the denomination called Congregationalists; and five shall forever be elected of the denomination called Episcopalians.

The motto of Brown University stated:

In Deo Speramus (In God We Trust).

Kent, James (July 31, 1763-December 12, 1847), was the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of New York, 1804. He was the Head of the New York Court of Chancery, 1814-23; professor of law at Columbia College, 1793; member of the New York Legislature; admitted to the bar, 1785; graduated from Yale, 1781, and after his death he was elected to the American Hall of Fame, 1900. Considered the premier jurist in the development of the legal practice in the United States, James Kent is known for having compiled the work, Commentaries on American Law, 1826-30. In the case of The People v. Ruggles, 1811, James Kent rendered the opinion of the Court:

The defendant was indicted... in December, 1810, for that he did, on the 2nd day of September, 1810... wickedly, maliciously, and blasphemously, utter, and with a loud voice publish, in the presence and hearing of divers good and Christian people, of and concerning the Christian religion, and of and concerning Jesus Christ, the false, scandalous, malicious, wicked and blasphemous words following: "Jesus Christ was a bastard, and his mother must be a whore," in contempt of the Christian religion... the defendant was tried and found guilty, and was sentenced by the court to be imprisoned for three months, and to pay a fine of $500.

Such words uttered with such a disposition were an offense at common law. In Taylor's case the defendant was convicted upon information of speaking similar words, and the Court... said that Christianity was parcel of the law, and to cast contumelious reproaches upon it, tended to weaken the foundation of moral obligation, and the efficacy of oaths.

And in the case of Rex v. Woolston, on a like conviction, the Court said... that whatever strikes at the root of Christianity tends manifestly to the dissolution of civil government... The authorities show that blasphemy against God and... profane ridicule of Christ or the Holy Scriptures (which are equally treated as blasphemy), are offenses punishable at common law, whether uttered by words or writings... because it tends to corrupt the morals of the people, and to destroy good order.

Such offenses have always been considered independent of any religious establishment or the rights of the Church. They are treated as affecting the essential interests of civil society....

We stand equally in need, now as formerly, of all the moral discipline, and of those principles of virtue, which help to bind society together.

The people of this State, in common with the people of this country, profess the general doctrines of Christianity, as the rule of their faith and practice; and to scandalize the author of these doctrines is not only... impious, but... is a gross violation of decency and good order.

Nothing could be more injurious to the tender morals of the young, than to declare such profanity lawful....

The free, equal, and undisturbed enjoyment of religious opinion, whatever it may be, and free and decent discussions on any religious subject, is granted and secured; but to revile... the religion professed by almost the whole community, is an abuse of that right....

We are a Christian people, and the morality of the country is deeply engrafted upon Christianity, and not upon the doctrines or worship of those impostors [other religions]....

[We are] people whose manners are refined and whose morals have been elevated and inspired with a more enlarged benevolence, by means of the Christian religion. Though the constitution has discarded religious establishments, it does not forbid judicial cognizance of those offenses against religion and morality which have no reference to any such establishment....

This [constitutional] declaration (noble and magnanimous as it is, when duly understood) never meant to withdraw religion in general, and with it the best sanctions of moral and social obligation from all consideration and notice of the law....

To construe it as breaking down the common law barriers against licentious, wanton, and impious attacks upon Christianity itself, would be an enormous perversion of its meaning....

Christianity in its enlarged sense, as a religion revealed and taught in the Bible, is part and parcel of the law of the land....

Nor are we bound by any expression of the Constitution, as some have strangely supposed, either not to punish at all, or to punish indiscriminately like attacks upon the religion of Mahomet and the Grand Lama; and for this plain reason, that we are a Christian people, and the morality of the country is deeply engrafted upon Christianity, and not upon the doctrines or worship of these impostors....

The Court is accordingly of the opinion that the judgement... must be affirmed.

In an address before the American Bible Society, Chief Justice Kent expressed:

The Bible is equally adapted to the wants and infirmities of every human being....

It brings life and immortality to light, which until the publication of the Gospel, were hidden from the scrutiny of the ages. The gracious Revelation of a future state is calculated to solve the mysteries of Providence in the dispensations of this life, to reconcile us to the inequalities of our present condition, and to inspire unconquerable fortitude and the most animating consolations when all other consolations fail....

The Bible also unfolds the origin and deep foundations of depravity and guilt, and the means and hopes of salvation through the mediation of our Redeemer. Its doctrines, its discoveries, its code of morals, and its means of grace are not only overwhelming evidence of its Divine origin, but they confound the pretensions of all other systems by showing the narrow range of and the feeble efforts of human reason, even when under the sway of the most exalted understanding, and enlightened by the accumulated treasures of science and learning.

Massachusetts, Colony of (1765), in the City of Boston, Jonathan Mayhew served as the Congregational minister of West Church. His patriotic sermon reflected the Colonists' feelings toward King George III's hated Stamp Act:

The king is as much bound by his oath not to infringe the legal rights of the people, as the people are bound to yield subjection to him. From whence it follows that as soon as the prince sets himself above the law, he loses the king in the tyrant. He does, to all intents and purposes, un-king himself.

Rutgers University (1766), was founded in New Jersey as "Queen's College" by the efforts of the Dutch minister, Rev. Theodore Jacobus Frelinghuysen (1692-1747). Initially a Pietist minister in Germany, he was schooled in Holland, and later emigrated to New Jersey. Rev. Theodore Frelinghuysen stated:

The largest portion of the faithful have been poor and of little account in the world.

In 1825, Queen's College was changed to Rutgers University, in honor of Henry Rutgers. He had served as a captain in the 1st Regiment of the New York Militia, was a member of the New York Assembly, and gave land for the 2nd Free School for the city's poor. He was a regent for the University of the State of New York, and a trustee of Princeton University and Queen's College. Henry Rutgers was the president of the board of the Dutch Reformed Church, and gave the land for the Rutgers Street Presbyterian Church.

In 1776, inspired by the motto of the University of Utrecht, Netherlands, which was "Sun of Righteousness, Shine upon Us," Rutgers University chose for its official motto:

Son of Righteousness, Shine upon the West

Also.

Bridge, Ebenezer (1767), a well-known clergyman in Chelmsford, Massachusetts, delivered his "Election Sermon," in which he stated:

The Supreme ruler and governor of the universe hath so adjusted things in the moral world, that order and government are necessary for advancement his own glory, and promoting the good of his rational, intelligent creatures.

And it is very obvious that anarchy and confusion must terminate in the destruction of men's lives, as well as of their liberty and property.

Jackson, Andrew (March 15, 1767-June 8, 1845), was the 7th President of the United States, 1829-37; U. S. Senator, 1823-25; Governor of Florida Territory, 1821; U. S. Army Major General, 1814-21, where he became famous for winning the Battle of New Orleans, 1815, and the Seminole War, 1818; Major General of Tennessee Militia, 1802-12; Tennessee Supreme Court Justice, 1798-1804; U.S. Senator, 1797-98; U.S. Representative, 1796-97; credited with proposing the name "Tennessee" at the State's first convention, 1796; married Rachel Donelson Robards, 1791; Judge advocate of Davidson County Militia, 1791; Attorney General of Western District of North Carolina, 1790; admitted to bar, 1787; and served as a messenger in the Revolutionary War, 1780-81.

Known as "Old Hickory," Major General Andrew Jackson commented to Major Dravezac on the confidence he had before the Battle of New Orleans in 1815:

I was sure of success, for I knew that God would not give me provisions of disaster, but signs of victory. He said this ditch can never be passed. It cannot be done.

On January 8, 1815, Andrew Jackson wrote to his friend Robert Hays regarding the victorious Battle of New Orleans, during the War of 1812:

It appears that the unerring hand of Providence shielded my men from the shower of balls, bombs, and rockets, when every ball and bomb from our guns carried with them a mission of death.

Concerning that same battle, Andrew Jackson wrote to Secretary of War James Monroe:

Heaven, to be sure, has interposed most wonderfully in our behalf, and I am filled with gratitude, when I look back to what we have escaped.

Shortly after his election, Andrew Jackson's wife, Rachel died of a heart attack. The tremendous stress on her was a result of malicious campaign gossip which revived the circumstances of their marriage, 37 years prior. Political enemies made much of the matter that Rachel's first husband had divorced her, though unknowns to the Jacksons, it was not official until after their wedding. The Jacksons then remarried after it was official. Andrew Jackson stated:

May God Almighty forgive her murderers, as I know she forgave them. I never can.

On Wednesday, March 4, 1829, less than three months after his beloved wife died, President Andrew Jackson delivered his First Inaugural Address, which concluded:

Considering standing armies as dangerous to free governments in time of peace, I shall not seek to enlarge our present establishment, nor disregard that salutary lesson of political experience which teaches that the military should be held subordinate to the civil power....

But the bulwark of our defense is the national militia, which in the present state of our intelligence and population must render us invincible.

As long as our Government is administered for the good of the people, and is regulated by their will; as long as it secures to us the rights of person and of property, liberty of conscience and of the press, it will be worth defending; and so long as it is worth defending a patriotic militia will cover it with an impenetrable aegis. Partial injuries and occasional mortifications we may be subjected to, but a million of armed freemen, possessed of the means of war, can never be conquered by a foreign foe. To any just system, therefor, calculated to strengthen this natural safeguard of the country I shall cheerfully lend all the aid in my power....

And a firm reliance on the goodness of that Power whose providence mercifully protected our national infancy, and has since upheld our liberties in various vicissitudes, encourages me to offer up my ardent supplications that He will continue to make our beloved country the object of His divine care and gracious benediction.

On December 8, 1829, in his First Annual Message to Congress, President Jackson explained:

In communicating with you for the first time it is to me a source of unfeigned satisfaction, calling for mutual gratulation and devout thanks to a benign Providence, that we are at peace with all mankind, and that our country exhibits the most cheering evidence of general welfare and progressive improvement. Turning our eyes to other nations, our great desire is to see our brethren of the human race secured in the blessings enjoyed by ourselves, and advancing in knowledge, in freedom, and in social happiness....

In discharging the responsible trust confided to the Executive in this respect it is my settled purpose to ask nothing that is not clearly right and to submit to nothing that is wrong; and I flatter myself that, supported by the other branches of the Government and by the intelligence and patriotism of the people, we shall be able, under the protection of Providence, to cause all our just rights to be respected....

Upon this country more than any other has, in the providence of God, been cast the special guardianship of the great principle of adherence to written constitutions. If it fail here, all hope in regard to it will be extinguished. That this was intended to be a government of limited and specific, and not general powers must be admitted by all, and it is our duty to preserve for it the character intended by its framers....

The charter of the Bank of the United States expires in 1836, and its stockholders will most probably apply for a renewal of their privileges. In order to avoid the evils resulting from precipitancy in a measure involving such important principles and such deep pecuniary interests, I feel that I can not, in justice to the parties interested, too soon present it to the deliberate consideration of the Legislature and the people. Both the constitutionality and the expediency of the law creating this bank are well questioned by a large portion of our fellow-citizens, and it must be admitted by all that it has failed in the great end of establishing a uniform and sound currency....

I now commend you, fellow-citizens, to the guidance of Almighty God, with a full reliance on His merciful providence for the maintenance of our free institutions, and with an earnest supplication that whatever errors it may be my lot to commit in discharging the arduous duties which have devolved on me will find a remedy in the harmony and wisdom of your counsels.

On Wednesday, January 20, 1830, in a message to Congress, President Andrew Jackson stated:

Gentlemen: I respectfully submit to your consideration the accompanying communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, showing that according to the terms of an agreement between the United States and the United Society of Christian Indians the latter have a claim to an annuity of $400, commencing from the 1st of October, 1826, for which an appropriation by law for this amount, as long as they are entitled to receive it, will be proper.

On May 27, 1830, in a Veto Message to Congress, President Andrew Jackson stated:

Through the favor of an overruling and indulgent Providence our country is blessed with general prosperity and our citizens exempted from the pressure of taxation, which other less favored portions of the human family are obliged to bear.

On December 6, 1830, in his Second Annual Message to Congress, President Andrew Jackson stated:

The beneficent Author of All Good has granted to us during the present year health, peace, and plenty, and numerous causes for joy in the wonderful success which attends the progress of our free institutions....

From a people exercising in the most unlimited degree the right of self-government, and enjoying, as derived from this proud characteristic, under the favor of Heaven, much of the happiness with which they are blessed... from such a people the deepest sympathy was to be expected in a struggle for the sacred principles of liberty....

Our country, by the blessing of God, is not in a situation to invite aggression....

The Indians... gradually, under the protection of the Government and through the influence of good counsels, to cast off their savage habits and become an interesting, civilized, and Christian community....

Under an overruling and merciful Providence the agency of this spirit has thus far been signalized in the prosperity and glory of our beloved country. May its influence be eternal.

On December 6, 1831, in his Third Annual Message to Congress, President Andrew Jackson stated:

As you have been called on to be grateful for the bounties of Providence, at few periods have they been more abundantly or extensively bestowed than at the present....

If from the satisfactory view of our agriculture, manufactures, and internal improvements we turn to the state of our navigation and trade with foreign nations and between States, we shall scarcely find less cause for gratulation. A beneficent Providence has provided for their exercise and encouragement an extensive coast, indented by capacious bays, noble rivers, inland seas; with a country productive of every material for shipping....

Let us be grateful for these blessings to the beneficent Being who has conferred them, and who suffers us to indulge a reasonable hope of their continuance, while we neglect not the means by which they may be preserved. If we may dare to judge of His future designs by the manner in which His past favors have been bestowed, He has made our national prosperity to depend on the preservation of our liberties, our national force on our Federal Union, and our individual happiness on the maintenance of our State rights and wise institutions. If we are prosperous at home and respected abroad, it is because we are free, united, industrious, and obedient to the laws. While we continue so we shall by the blessing of Heaven go on in the happy career we have begun....

A comparatively small sum is stipulated on our part to go to the extinction of all claims by French citizens on our Government.... The frank acknowledgement and provision for the payment of those which were addressed to our equity, although unsupported by legal proof, affords a practical illustration of our submission to the divine rule of doing to others what we desire they should do unto us....

The removal of the Indians beyond the limits and jurisdiction of the States does not place them beyond the reach of philanthropic aid and Christian instruction....

In conclusion permit me to invoke that Power which superintends all governments to infuse into your deliberations at this important crisis of our history a spirit of mutual forbearance and conciliation.

On July 10, 1832, President Andrew Jackson vetoed the Bank Renewal Bill, preventing the rechartering of the Bank of the United States:

Deeply impressed with the belief that some of powers and privileges possessed by the existing bank are unauthorized by the Constitution, subversive to the rights of the States, and dangerous to the liberties of the people, I felt it was my duty at an early period of my Administration to call the attention of Congress....

In another of its bearings this provision is fraught with danger.... It is easy to conceive that great evils to our country and its institutions might flow from such a concentration of power in the hands of a few men irresponsible to the people....

Their power would be great whenever they might choose to exert it... to influence elections or control the affairs of the nation. But if any private citizen or public functionary should interpose to curtail its powers or prevent a renewal of its privileges, it can not be doubted that he would be made to feel its influence....

Controlling our currency, receiving our public moneys, and holding thousands of our citizens in dependence, it would be more formidable and dangerous than the naval and military power of the enemy...

To this conclusion I can not assent. Mere precedent is a dangerous source of authority, and should not be regarded as deciding questions of constitutional power....

It is to be regretted that the rich and powerful too often bend the acts of government to their selfish purposes....

In the full enjoyment of the gifts of Heaven and the fruits of superior industry, economy, and virtue, every man is equally entitled to protection by law; but when the laws undertake to add to these natural and just advantages artificial distinctions, to grant titles, gratuities, and exclusive privileges, to make the rich richer and the potent more powerful, the humble members of society - the farmers, mechanics, and laborers - who have neither the time nor the means of securing like favors to themselves, have a right to complain of the injustice of their Government.

There are no necessary evils in government. Its evils exist only in its abuses. If it would confine itself to equal protection, and, as Heaven does its rains, shower its favors alike on the high and the low, the rich and the poor, it would be an unqualified blessing. In the act before me there seems to be a wide and unnecessary departure from these just principles....

Many of our rich men have not been content with equal protection and equal benefits, but have besought us to make them richer by act of Congress. By attempting to gratify their desires we have in the results of our legislation arrayed section against section, interest against interest, and man against man, in a fearful commotion which threatens to shake the foundations of our Union....

If we can not at once, in justice to interests vested under improvident legislation, make our Government what it ought to be, we can at least take a stand against all new grants of monopolies and exclusive privileges, against any prostitution of our Government to the advancement of the few at the expense of the many....

For relief and deliverance let us firmly rely on that kind Providence which I am sure watches with peculiar care over the destinies of our Republic, and on the intelligence and wisdom of our countrymen. Through His abundant goodness and their patriotic devotion our liberty and Union will be preserved.

On December 4, 1832, in his Fourth Annual Message to Congress, President Andrew Jackson stated:

Although the pestilence which had traversed the Old World has entered our limits and extended its ravages over much of our land, it has pleased Almighty God to mitigate its severity and lessen the number of its victims compared with those who have fallen in most other countries over which it has spread its terrors. Notwithstanding this visitation, our country presents on every side marks of prosperity and happiness unequalled, perhaps, in any other portion of the world. If we fully appreciate our comparative condition, existing causes of discontent will appear unworthy of attention, and, with hearts of thankfulness to that divine Being who has filled our cup of prosperity, we shall feel our resolution strengthened to preserve and hand down to posterity that liberty and that union which we have received from our fathers, and which constitute the sources and the shield of all our blessings....

That the Almighty Ruler of the Universe may so direct our deliberations and overrule our acts as to make us instrumental in securing a result so dear to mankind is my most earnest and sincere prayer.

On December 10, 1832, President Andrew Jackson issued a Proclamation Against Nullification to the People of South Carolina, which concluded:

That sacred Union, hitherto inviolate, which, perfected by our happy Constitution, has brought us, by the favor of Heaven, to a state of prosperity at home and high consideration abroad rarely, if ever, equalled in the history of nations....

We have looked to [the Federal Constitution] with sacred awe as the palladium of our liberties, and with all the solemnities of religion have pledged to each other our lives and fortunes here and our hopes of happiness hereafter in its defense and support....

May the Great Ruler of Nations grant that the signal blessings with which He has favored ours may not, by the madness of party or personal ambition, be disregarded and lost: and may His wise providence bring those who have produced this crisis to see the folly before they feel the misery of civil strife, and inspire returning veneration for that Union which, if we may dare to penetrate His designs, he has chosen as the only means of attaining the high destinies to which we man reasonably aspire.

On January 16, 1833, President Andrew Jackson delivered a Special Message to Congress regarding an attempt to nullify an Act of Congress:

The late chief magistrate of that State [South Carolina] in his address to the legislature... says that - "The occurrences of the past year, in connection with our domestic concerns, are to be reviewed with a sentiment of fervent gratitude to the Great Disposer of Human Events; that tributes of grateful acknowledgment are due for the various and multiplied blessings He has been pleased to bestow on our people; that abundant harvest in every quarter of the State have crowned the exertions of agricultural labor; that health almost beyond former precedent has blessed our homes, and that there is not less reason for thankfulness in surveying our social condition." It would indeed be difficult to imagine oppression where in the social condition of a people there was equal cause of thankfulness as for abundant harvests and varied and multiplied blessings with which a kind Providence had favored them....

I have so much cause to love, and for the American people, whose partiality honored me with their highest trust, I have determined to spare no effort to discharge the duty which in this conjuncture is devolved upon me. That a similar spirit will actuate the representatives of the American people is not to be questioned; and I fervently pray that the Great Ruler of Nations may so guide your deliberations and our joint measures as that they may prove salutary examples not only to the present but to future times, and solemnly proclaim that the Constitution and the Laws are supreme and the Union indissoluble.

On March 4, 1833, in his Second Inaugural Address, President Andrew Jackson stated:

Finally, it is my fervent prayer to that Almighty Being before whom I now stand, and who has kept us in His hands from the infancy of our Republic to the present day, that He will so overrule all my intentions and actions and inspire the hearts of my fellow-citizens that we may be preserved from dangers of all kinds and continue forever a united happy people.

On September 18, 1833, President Andrew Jackson's decision for the removal of Public Deposits from the Bank of the United States was read to his Cabinet:

The President has felt himself bound to examine the question carefully and deliberately in order to make up his judgement on the subject, and in his opinion the near approach of the termination of the charter and the public considerations heretofore mentioned are of themselves amply sufficient to justify the removal of the deposits, without reference to the conduct of the bank or their safety in its keeping. But in the conduct of the bank may be found other reasons, very imperative in their character, and which require prompt action. Developments have been made from time to time of its faithlessness as a public agent, its misapplication of public funds, its interference in elections, its efforts by the machinery of committees to deprive the Government directors of a full knowledge of its concerns....

It has long been known that the president of the bank, by his single will, originates and executes many of the most important measures connected with the management and credit of the bank....

The fact has been recently disclosed that an unlimited discretion has been and is now vested in the president of the bank to expend its funds in payment for preparing and circulating articles and purchasing pamphlets and newspapers, calculated by their contents to operate on elections and secure a renewal of its charter....

Not content with thus refusing to recall the obnoxious power or even to require such an account of the expenditure as would show whether the money of the bank had in fact been applied to the objects contemplated by these resolutions, as obnoxious as they were, the board renewed the power already conferred....

Taken in connection with the nature of the expenditures heretofore made, as recently disclosed, which the board not only tolerate, but approve, this resolution puts the funds of the bank at the disposition of the president for the purpose of employing the whole press of the country in the service of the bank, to hire writers and newspapers, and to pay out such sums as he pleases to what person and for what services he pleases without the responsibility of rendering any specific account. The bank is thus converted into a vast electioneering engine, with means to embroil the country in deadly feuds, and, under cover of expenditures in themselves improper, extend its corruption through all the ramifications of society....

The money has not been expended merely in the publication and distribution of speeches, reports of committees, or articles written for the purpose of showing the constitutionality or usefulness of the bank, but publications have been prepared and extensively circulated containing the grossest invectives... to degrade in public estimation those who were supposed to be instrumental in resisting the wishes of this grasping and dangerous institution....

With these facts before us can we be surprised at the torrent of abuse incessantly poured out against all who are supposed to stand in the way of the cupidity and ambition of the Bank of the United States? Can we be surprised at sudden and unexpected changes of opinion in favor of an institution which has millions to lavish and avows its determination not to spare its means when they are necessary to accomplish its purpose?...

With these facts before him in an official report from the Government directors, the President would feel that he was not only responsible for all the abuses and corruptions the bank has committed or may commit, but almost an accomplice in a conspiracy against that Government which he has sworn honestly to administer, if he did not take every step within his constitutional and legal power likely to be efficient in putting an end to these enormities. If it be possible within the scope of human affairs to find a reason for removing the Government deposits and leaving the bank to its own resource for the means of effecting its criminal designs, we have it here. Was it expected when the moneys of the United States were directed to be placed in that bank that they would be put under the control of one man empowered to spend millions without rendering a voucher or specifying the object? Can they be considered safe with the evidence before us that tens of thousands have been spent for highly improper, if not corrupt, purposes, and that the same motive may lead to the expenditure of hundreds of thousands, and even millions, more?...

If, indeed, this corporation now holds in its hands the happiness and prosperity of the American people, it is high time to take the alarm. If the despotism be already upon us and our only safety is in the mercy of the despot, recent developments in relation to his designs and the means he employs show how necessary it is to shake it off....

As one of the most serious objections to the Bank of the United States is the power which it concentrates, care must be taken in finding other agents for the service of the Treasury not to raise up another power equally formidable.

On December 3, 1833, in his Fifth Annual Message to Congress, President Andrew Jackson stated:

By the favor of Divine Providence health is again restored to us, peace reigns within our borders, abundance crowns the labors of our fields, commerce and domestic industry flourish and increase, and individual happiness rewards the private virtue and enterprise of our citizens. . . .

The extent of its [Bank of the United States] misconduct, however, although known to be great, was not at that time fully developed by proof. It was not until late in the month of August that I received from the Government directors an official report establishing beyond question that this great and powerful institution had been actively engaged in attempting to influence the elections of the public officers by means of its money, and that, in violation of the express provisions of its charter, it had by a formal resolutions placed its funds at the disposition of its president to be employed in sustaining the political power of the bank. A copy of this resolution is contained in the report of the Government directors before referred to, and however the object may be disguised by cautious language, no one can doubt that the money was in truth intended for electioneering purposes, and the particular uses to which it was proved to have been applied abundantly show it was so understood. Not only was the evidence complete as to the past application of the money and power of the bank to electioneering purposes, but that the resolution of the board of directors authorized the same course to be pursued in future. It being thus established by unquestionable proof that the Bank of the United States was converted into a permanent electioneering engine, it appeared to me that the path of duty which the executive department of the Government ought to pursue was not doubtful. . . .

At this time the efforts of the bank to control public opinion, through the distresses of some and the fears of others, are equally apparent, and, if possible, more objectionable. . . . Through presses known to have been sustained by its money it attempts by unfounded alarms to create a panic in all.

On Tuesday, April 15, 1834, in a Protest message to the Senate, President Andrew Jackson stated:

The Bank of the United States, a great moneyed monopoly, had attempted to obtain a renewal of its charter by controlling the elections of the people and the action of the Government. The use of its corporate funds and power in that attempt was fully disclosed, and it was made known to the President that the corporation was putting in train the same course of measures, with the view of making another vigorous effort, through an interference in the elections of the people, to control public opinion and force the Government to yield to its demands. This, with its corruption of the press, its violation of its charter, its exclusion of the Government directors from its proceedings, its neglect of duty and arrogant pretensions, made it, in the opinion of the President, incompatible with the public interest and the safety of our institutions that it should be longer employed as the fiscal agent of the Treasury. . . . By their character and tendency, to concentrate in the hands of a body not directly amenable to the people a degree of influence and power dangerous to their liberties and fatal to the Constitution of their choice....

The resolution to the Senate contains an imputation upon my private as well as upon my public character....If I had been ambitious, I should have sought an alliance with that powerful institution which even now aspires to no divided empire. If I had been venal, I should have sold myself to its designs. Had I preferred personal comfort and official ease to the performance of my arduous duty, I should have ceased to molest it. In the history of conquerors and usurpers, never in the fire of youth nor in the vigor of manhood could I find an attraction to lure me from the path of duty, and now I shall scarcely find an inducement to commence their career of ambition when gray hairs and a decaying frame, instead of inviting to toil and battle, call me to the contemplation of other worlds where conquerors cease to be honored and usurpers expiate their crimes.

The only ambition I can feel is to acquit myself to Him to whom I must soon render an account of my stewardship...to persuade my countrymen, so far as I may, that it is not in a splendid government supported by powerful monopolies and aristocratical establishments that they will find happiness or their liberties protection, but in a plain system, void of pomp, protecting all and granting favors to none, dispensing its blessings, like the dews of Heaven....If the Almighty Being who has hitherto sustained and protected me will but vouchsafe to make my feeble powers instrumental to such a result, I shall anticipate with pleasure the place to be assigned me in the history of my country, and die contented with the belief that I have contributed in some small degree to increase the value and prolong the duration of American liberty.

On June 21, 1834, in a message to Congress, President Andrew Jackson stated:

The afflicting intelligence of the death of the illustrious Lafayette has been received by me this morning. I have issued the general order inclosed to cause appropriate honors to be paid by the Army and Navy to the memory of one so highly venerated and beloved by my countrymen, and whom Providence has been pleased to remove so unexpectedly from the agitating scenes of life.

Andrew Jackson wrote to Mary and Andrew Jackson Hutchings on the death of their firstborn in 1834:

My dear Hutchings...I am truly happy to find that you both have met this severe bereavement with that Christian meekness and submission as was your duty. This charming babe was only given you from your Creator and benefactor....He has a right to take away, and we ought humbly to submit to His will and be always ready to say, blessed be His name. We have one consolation under this severe bereavement, that this babe is now in the bosom of its Saviour.

On September 11, 1834, Andrew Jackson wrote a letter to his son, Andrew, Jr.:

I nightly offer up my prayers to the Throne of Grace for the health and safety of you all, and that we ought all to rely with confidence on the promises of our dear Redeemer, and give Him our hearts. This is all He requires and all that we can do, and if we sincerely do this, we are sure of salvation through his atonement.

Andrew Jackson wrote a letter to comfort the family of General Coffee who had recently died:

Rely on our dear Saviour. He will be father to the fatherless and husband to the widow. Trust in the mercy and goodness of Christ, and always be ready to say with heartfelt resignation, "may the Lord's will be done."

On December 1, 1834, in his Sixth Annual Message to Congress, President Andrew Jackson stated:

Divine Providence has favored us with general health, with rich rewards in the fields of agriculture and in every branch of labor, and with peace to cultivate and extend the various resources which employ the virtue and enterprise of our citizens....

If [France] should continue to refuse that act of acknowledged justice and, in violation of the laws of nations, make reprisals on our part the occasion of hostilities against the United States, she would but add violence to injustice, and could not fail to expose herself to the just censure of civilized nations and to the retributive judgements of Heaven....

Events have satisfied my mind, and I think the minds of the American people, that the mischiefs and dangers which flow from a national bank far overbalance all its advantages. The bold effort the present bank has made to control the Government, the distresses it has wantonly produced, the violence of which it has been the occasion in one of our cities famed for its observance of law and order, are but premonitions of the fate which awaits the American people should they be deluded into a perpetuation of this institution or the establishment of another like it. It is fervently hoped that thus admonished those who have heretofore favored the establishment of a substitute for the present bank will be induced to abandon it, as it is evidently better to incur any inconvenience that may be reasonably expected than to concentrate the whole moneyed power of the Republic in any form whatsoever or under any restrictions.

In January of 1835, an assassination attempt was perpetrated on President Andrew Jackson. A bearded man, at point blank range, fired two pistols at him, but for some reason the guns failed to discharge. The King of England heard of the incident and expressed his concern. President Jackson wrote back, explaining:

A kind of Providence had been pleased to shield me against the recent attempt upon my life, and irresistibly carried many minds to the belief in a superintending Providence.

On March 25, 1835, Andrew Jackson wrote in a letter:

I was brought up a rigid Presbyterian, to which I have always adhered. Our excellent Constitution guarantees to every one freedom of religion, and charity tells us (and you know Charity is the real basis of all true religion)...judge the tree by its fruit.

All who profess Christianity believe in a Saviour, and that by and through Him we must be saved. We ought, therefore, to consider all good Christians whose walks correspond with their professions, be they Presbyterian, Episcopalian, Baptist, Methodist or Roman Catholic.

On December 7, 1835, in his Seventh Annual Message to Congress, President Andrew Jackson stated:

Never in any former period of our history have we had greater reason than we now have to be thankful to Divine Providence for the blessings of health and general prosperity. Every branch of labor we see crowned with the most abundant rewards....

We have felt but one class of these dangers exhibited in the contest waged by the Bank of the United States against the Government....The bank is, in fact, but one of the fruits of a system at war with the genius of all our institutions - a system founded upon a political creed the fundamental principle of which is a distrust of the popular will as a safe regulator of political power, and whose great ultimate object and inevitable result, should it prevail, is the consolidation of all power in our system in one central government. Lavish public disbursements and corporations with exclusive privileges would be its substitutes for the original and as yet sound checks and balances of the Constitution - the means by whose silent and secret operation a control would be exercised by the few over the political conduct of the many by first acquiring control over the labor and earnings of the great body of the people. Wherever this spirit has effected an alliance with political power, tyranny and despotism have been the fruit. If it is ever used for the ends of government, it has to be incessantly watched, or it corrupts....

All history tells us that a free people should be watchful of delegated power, and should never acquiesce in a practice which will diminish their control over it.

On July 9, 1836, on the occasion of the death of James Madison, President Andrew Jackson sent a letter to Mrs. Dorothy "Dolly" Payne Madison at Montpelier, Virginia:

Madam: It appearing to have been the intention of Congress to make me the organ of assuring you of the profound respect entertained by both its branches for your person and character, and of their sincere condolence in the late afflicting dispensation of Providence, which has at once deprived you of a beloved companion and your country of one of its most valued citizens, I perform that duty by transmitting the documents herewith enclosed.

On August 20, 1836, Mrs. Dorothy "Dolly" Payne Madison answered President Andrew Jackson, delivering to him her husband's records of the early Congress:

The best return I can make for the sympathy of my country is to fulfill the sacred trust his confidence reposed in me, that of placing before it and the world what his pen prepared for their use - a legacy of the importance of which is deeply impressed on my mind.

On September 4, 1836, in a letter to General Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna, President Andrew Jackson stated:

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th day of July last, which had been forwarded to me by General Samuel Houston... The Government of the United States is ever anxious to cultivate peace and friendship with all nations... If, however, Mexico should signify her willingness to avail herself of our good offices in bringing about the desirable result you have described, nothing could give me more pleasure than to devote my best services to it. To be instrumental in terminating the evils of civil war and in substituting in their stead the blessings of peace is a divine privilege...

Your letter, and that of General Samuel Houston, commander in chief of the Texan army, will be made the basis of an early interview with the Mexican minister at Washington... In the meantime I hope Mexico and Texas, feeling that war is the greatest of calamities, will pause before another campaign is undertaken and can add to the number of those scenes of bloodshed which have already marked the progress of their contest and have given so much pain to their Christian friends throughout the world.

On December 5, 1836, in his Eighth Annual Message to Congress, President Andrew Jackson stated:

Our gratitude is due to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, and I invite you to unite with me in offering to Him fervent supplications that His providential care may ever be extended to those who follow us, enabling them to avoid the dangers and the horrors of war consistently with a just and indispensable regard to the rights and honor of our country...

The experience of other nations admonished us to hasten the extinguishment of the public debt... No political maxim is better established than that which tells us that an improvident expenditure of money is the parent of profligacy, and that no people can hope to perpetuate their liberties who long acquiesce in a policy which taxes them for objects not necessary to the legitimate and real wants of their Government... The shortest reflection must satisfy everyone that to require the people to pay taxes to the Government merely that they may be paid back again is sporting with the substantial interests of the country, and no system which produces such a result can be expected to receive the public countenance. Nothing could be gained by it even if each individual who contributed a portion of the tax could receive back promptly the same portion. . . . The practical effect of such an attempt must ever be to burden the people with taxes, not for the purposes beneficial to them, but to swell the profits of deposit banks and support a band of useless public officers.

A distribution to the people is impracticable and unjust in other respects. It would be taking one man's property and giving it to another. Such would be the unavoidable result of a rule of equality. . . . We know that they contribute unequally, and a rule, therefore, that would distribute to them equally would be liable to all the objections which apply to the principle of an equal division of property. To make the General Government the instrument of carrying this odious principle into effect would be at once to destroy the means of its usefulness and change the character designed for it by the framers of the Constitution. . . .

The Government had without necessity received from the people a large surplus. . . . The banks proceeded to make loans upon this surplus, and thus converted it into banking capital, and in this manner it has tended to multiply bank charters and has had a great agency in producing a spirit of wild speculation. The possession and use of the property out of which this surplus was created belonged to the people, but the Government has transferred its possession to incorporated banks, whose interest and effort it is to make large profits out of its use. . . .

Congress is only authorized to levy taxes "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." There is no such provision as would authorize Congress to collect together the property of the country, under the name of revenue, for the purpose of dividing it equally or unequally among the States or the people. Indeed, it is not probable that such an idea ever occurred to the States when they adopted the Constitution. . . .

There would soon be but one taxing power, and that vested in a body of men far removed from the people, in which the farming and mechanic interests would scarcely be represented. The States would gradually lose their purity as well as their independence; they would not dare to murmur at the proceedings of the General Government, lest they should lose their supplies; all would be merged in a practical consolidation, cemented by widespread corruption, which could only be eradicated by one of those bloody revolutions which occasionally overthrow the despotic systems of the Old World. . . .

It was in view of these evils, together with the dangerous power wielded by the Bank of the United States and its repugnance to our Constitution, that I was induced to exert the power conferred upon me by the American people to prevent the continuance of that institution. . . . The lessons taught by the Bank of the United States can not well be lost upon the American people. They will take care never again to place so tremendous a power in irresponsible hands. . . .

And should I be spared to enter upon that retirement which is so suitable to my age and infirm health and so much desired by me in other respects, I shall not cease to invoke that beneficent Being to whose providence we are already so signally indebted for the continuance of His blessings on our beloved country.

On December 21, 1836, in a message to Congress, President Andrew Jackson stated:

Texas was once claimed as a part of our property, and there are those among our citizens who, always reluctant to abandon that claim, can not but regard with solicitude the prospect of the reunion of the territory to this country. A large proportion of its civilized inhabitants are emigrants from the United States, speak the same language with ourselves, cherish the same principles, political and religious.

On December 30, 1836, President Andrew Jackson wrote to Mr. Andrew Donelson after hearing that his wife, Emily, had died:

My dear Andrew, we cannot recall her, we are commanded by our dear Saviour, not to mourn for the dead, but for the living. I am sure from my dream that she is happy, she has changed a world of woe, for a world of eternal happiness, and we ought to prepare, as we too, must follow....

It becomes our duty to submit to this heavy bereavement with due submission, and control our passions, submit to the will of God who holds our lives in his hand and say with humble and contrite hearts, "The Lord's will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

On March 4, 1837, in his Farewell Address, President Jackson stated:

These cheering and grateful prospects and these multiplied favors we owe, under Providence, to the adoption of the Federal Constitution.... The necessity of watching with jealous anxiety for the preservation of the Union was earnestly pressed upon his fellow-citizens by the Father of his Country in his Farewell Address.... The lessons contained in this invaluable legacy of Washington to his countrymen should be cherished in the heart of every citizen.... When we look upon the scenes that are passing around us and dwell upon the pages of his parting address, his paternal counsels would seem to be not merely the offspring of wisdom and foresight, but the voice of prophecy, foretelling events and warning us of the evil to come....

It is well known that there have always been those amongst us who wish to enlarge the powers of the General Government... to overstep the boundaries marked out for it by the Constitution.... Every attempt to exercise power beyond these limits should be promptly and firmly opposed.... There is, perhaps, no one power conferred on the Federal Government so liable to abuse as the taxing power.... Plain as these principles appear to be, you will yet find there is a constant effort to induce the General Government to go beyond the limits of its taxing power and to impose unnecessary burdens upon the people.... to fasten upon the people this unjust and unequal system....

The distress and alarm which pervaded and agitated the whole country when the Bank of the United States waged war upon the people in order to compel them to submit to its demands can not yet be forgotten.... Yet, if you had not conquered, the Government would have passed from the hands of the many to the hands of the few, and this organized money power from its secret conclave would have dictated the choice of your highest officers and compelled you to make peace or war, as best suited their own wishes. The forms of your Government might for a time have remained, but its living spirit would have departed from it. The distress and sufferings inflicted on the people by the bank are some of the fruits of that system of policy which is continually striving to enlarge the authority of the Federal Government beyond the limits fixed by the Constitution.... The power which moneyed interest can exercise, when concentrated under a single head and with our present system of currency, was sufficiently demonstrated in the struggle made by the Bank of the United States.... The paper-money system and its natural associations - monopoly and exclusive privileges - have already struck their root too deep in the soil, and it will require all your efforts to check its further growth and to eradicate the evil. The men who profit by the abuses and desire to perpetuate them will continue to besiege the halls of legislation in the General Government... and will seek by every artifice to mislead and deceive the public servants....

You have no longer any cause to fear danger from abroad; your strength and power are well known throughout the civilized world, as well as the high and gallant bearing of your sons. It is from within, among yourselves - from cupidity, from corruption, from disappointed ambition and inordinate thirst for power - that factions will be formed and liberty endangered. It is against such designs, whatever disguise the actors may assume, that you have especially to guard yourselves.

You have the highest of human trusts committed to your care. Providence has showered on this favored land blessings without number, and has chosen you as the guardians of freedom, to preserve it for the benefit of the human race. May He who holds in His hands the destinies of nations, make you worthy of the favors He has bestowed, and enable you, with pure hearts and hands and sleepless vigilance, to guard and defend to the end of time, the great charge He has committed to your keeping.

My own race is nearly run; advanced age and failing health warns me that before long I must pass beyond the reach of human events and cease to feel the vicissitudes of human affairs. I thank God that my life has been spent in a land of liberty and that He has given me a heart to love my country with the affection of a son. And filled with gratitude for your constant and unwavering kindness, I bid you a last and affectionate farewell.

On September 20, 1838, Andrew Jackson wrote a letter upon receiving the news that his old friend, Ralph Earl, had suddenly died:

American Quotations.txt

I must soon follow him, and hope to meet him and those friends who have gone before me in the realms of bliss through the mediation of a dear Redeemer, Jesus Christ.

When Andrew Jackson was away in Washington, D.C., he wrote to his wife concerning his faith:

I trust that the God of Isaac and of Jacob will protect you, and give you health in my absence. In Him alone we ought to trust; He alone can preserve and guide us through this troublesome world, and I am sure He will hear your Prayers. We are told that the prayers of the righteous prevail much, and I add mine for your health and preservation until we meet again.

Andrew Jackson, on June 8, 1845, said in reference to the Bible:

That book, Sir, is the Rock upon which our republic rests.

Peter Cartwright, the Methodist circuit-riding preacher, was invited by Andrew Jackson to be a guest in his home for Sunday lunch. Another guest, a young lawyer from Nashville, attempted to draw Cartwright into an argument. He asked:

"Mr. Cartwright, do you believe there is any such place as hell, a place of torment?"

Cartwright replied, "Yes I do."

Laughing, the young lawyer responded, "Well, I thank God I have too much sense to believe in such a thing!"

Andrew Jackson was unable to hold his composure longer, and sternly addressed the lawyer, "Well, sir, I thank God that there is such a place of torment as hell!"

The astonished young lawyer responded, "Why, General Jackson, what do you want with such a place as hell?"

Jackson confronted him saying, "To put such damned rascals as you are in, that oppose and vilify the Christian religion!"

And the young man, embarrassed, left the room.

Andrew Jackson stated:

We who are frequently visited by this chastening rod, have the consolation to read in the Scriptures that whomever He chasteneth He loveth, and does it for their good to make them mindful of their mortality and that this earth is not our abiding place; and afflicts us that we may prepare for a better world, a happy immortality.

Go to the Scriptures... the joyful promises it contains will be a balsam to all your troubles.

On May 29, 1845, just a few weeks before he died, Andrew Jackson said:

Sir, I am in the hands of a merciful God. I have full confidence in his goodness and mercy. . . . The Bible is true. I have tried to conform to its spirit as near as possible. Upon that sacred volume I rest my hope for eternal salvation, through the merits and blood of our blessed Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ.

June 1, 1845, though in great pain, Jackson replied to those visiting him:

When I have suffered sufficiently, the Lord will then take me to Himself - but what are all my sufferings compared to those of the Blessed Saviour, who died upon that cursed tree for me? Mine are nothing.

On June 8, 1845, just moments before his death, Andrew Jackson called his family and servants to his bedside and told them:

My dear children, do not grieve for me; it is true, I am going to leave you; I am well aware of my situation. I have suffered much bodily pain, but my sufferings are but as nothing compared with that which our blessed Redeemer endured upon the accursed Cross, that all might be saved who put their trust in Him. . . .

God will take care of you for me. I am my God's. I belong to Him. I go but a short time before you, and. . . I hope and trust to meet you all in Heaven, both white and black.

As everyone began crying and weeping, Andrew Jackson, who was a member of the Presbyterian Church, exhorted with his last breath:

Oh, do not cry. Be good children, and we will all meet in Heaven.

The first clause of Andrew Jackson's Last Will and Testament stated:

The Bible is true. Upon that sacred Volume I rest my hope of eternal salvation through the merits of our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

First, I bequeath my body to the dust whence it comes, and my soul to God who gave it, hoping for a happy immortality through the atoning merits of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world.

Adams, John Quincy (July 11, 1767-February 23, 1848), was the 6th President of the United States, 1825-29; one of the few Presidents to re-enter politics after his term; U. S. Representative from Massachusetts, 1830-48, being nicknamed "The Hell-Hound of Slavery," as he singlehandedly led the fight to lift the Gag Rule which had prohibited discussion of slavery on the floor of Congress; Secretary of State for James Monroe, 1817-25, where he promulgated the Monroe Doctrine, 1823, and obtained Florida from Spain, 1819; U. S. Minister to Great Britain, 1815-17, where he negotiated the Treaty of Ghent, ending the War of 1812; U. S. Minister to Russia, 1809-14; Professor at Harvard, 1805; U. S. Senator, 1803-08; State Senator of Massachusetts, 1802; U. S. Minister to Prussia, 1797-1801; married Louisa Catherine Johnson, 1797; U. S. Minister to the Netherlands, 1794; admitted to the bar, 1791; graduated from Harvard College, 1788; Secretary to the U.S. Minister in the Court of Catherine the Great, St. Petersburg, Russia, 1781, receiving the Congressional appointment at the age of 14; his political career began at age 11, when he was sent to join his father, John Adams, who was serving as the U.S. Minister in France, 1778.

On September 26, 1810, in a diary entry, John Quincy Adams wrote:

I have made it a practice for several years to read the Bible through in the course of every year. I usually devote to this reading the first hour after I rise every morning. As, including the Apocrypha, it contains about fourteen hundred chapters, and as I meet with occasional interruptions, when this reading is for single days, and sometimes for weeks, or even months, suspended, my rule is to read five chapters every morning, which leaves an allowance of about one-fourth of the time for such interruptions.

Extraordinary pressure or business seldom interrupts more than one day's reading at a time, and sickness has frequently occasioned longer suspensions, and traveling still more and longer. During the present year, having lost very few days, I have finished this perusal earlier than usual. I closed the book yesterday.

As I do not wish to suspend the habit of allowing regularly time for this purpose, I have this morning commenced it anew, and for the sake of endeavoring to understand the book better, as well as giving some variety to the study, I have begun this time with Ostervald's French translation, which has the advantage of a few short reflections upon each chapter.

In September of 1811, John Quincy Adams wrote a letter to his son from St. Petersburg, Russia, while serving for the second time in the U.S. Ministry to that country:

My dear Son:

In your letter of the 18th January to your mother, you mentioned that you read to your aunt a chapter in the Bible or a section of Doddridge's Annotations every evening.

This information gave me real pleasure; for so great is my veneration for the Bible, and so strong my belief, that when duly read and meditated on, it is of all books in the world, that which contributes most to make men good, wise, and happy - that the earlier my children begin to read it, the more steadily they pursue the practice of reading it throughout their lives, the more lively and confident will be my hopes that they will prove useful citizens of their country, respectable members of society, and a real blessing to their parents....

I have myself, for many years, made it a practice to read through the Bible once every year....

My custom is, to read four to five chapters every morning immediately after rising from my bed. It employs about an hour of my time....

It is essential, my son, in order that you may go through life with comfort to yourself, and usefulness to your fellow-creatures, that you should form and adopt certain rules or principles, for the government of your own conduct and temper....

It is in the Bible, you must learn them, and from the Bible how to practice them. Those duties are to God, to your fellow-creatures, and to yourself. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength, and thy neighbor as thy self." On these two commandments, Jesus Christ expressly says, "hang all the law and the prophets"; that is to say, the whole purpose of Divine Revelation is to inculcate them efficaciously upon the minds of men....

Let us, then, search the Scriptures.... The Bible contains the revelation of the will of God. It contains the history of the creation of the world, and of mankind; and afterward the history of one peculiar nation, certainly the most extraordinary nation that has ever appeared upon the earth.

It contains a system of religion, and of morality, which we may examine upon its own merits, independent of the sanction it receives from being the Word of God....

I shall number separately those letters that I mean to write you upon the subject of the Bible.... I wish that hereafter they may be useful to your brothers and sisters, as well as to you.

As you will receive them as a token of affection for you, during my absence.... From your affectionate Father,

John Quincy Adams

John Quincy Adams' correspondence to his son was compiled into a work, entitled, Letters of John Quincy Adams to his son, on the Bible and its Teachings, and was published after his death. In this work is the statement:

No book in the world deserves to be so unceasingly studied, and so profoundly meditated upon as the Bible.

On March 13, 1812, John Quincy Adams noted:

This morning I finished the perusal of the German Bible, which I began 20th June last. There are many differences of translation from either the English or the French translations - some of which I have compared in the three versions.

On December 31, 1812, John Quincy Adams penned this entry in his diary:

I offer to a merciful God at the close of this year my humble tribute of gratitude for the blessings with which He has, in the course of it, favored me and those dear to me....

My endeavors to quell the rebellion of the heart have been sincere, and have been assisted with the blessing from above. As I advance in life, its evils multiply, and the instances of mortality become more frequent and approach nearer to myself. The greater is the need for fortitude to encounter the woes that flesh is heir to, and of religion to support pains for which there is no other remedy.

In 1813, near the close of the year, John Quincy Adams recorded in his diary:

Religious sentiments become from day to day more constantly habitual to my mind.

After negotiating the Treaty of Ghent, on December 24, 1814, John Quincy Adams wrote several times from London regarding the false doctrines which were being promulgated among the intellectuals back in Boston:

I perceive that the Trinitarians and the Unitarians in Boston are sparring together... Most of the Boston Unitarians are my particular friends, but I never thought much of the eloquence or the theology of Priestly. His Socrates and Jesus Compared is a wretched performance. Socrates and Jesus! A farthing candle and the sun! I pray you to read Massillon's sermon on the divinity of Christ, and then the whole New Testament, after which be a Socinian if you can.

I find in the New Testament, Jesus Christ accosted in His own presence by one of His disciples as God, without disclaiming the appellation. I see Him explicitly declared by at least two other of the Apostles to be God, expressly and repeatedly announced, not only as having existed before the worlds, but as the Creator of the worlds without beginning of days or end of years. I see Him named in the great prophecy of Isaiah concerning him to be the mighty God!...

The texts are too numerous, they are from parts of the Scriptures too diversified, they are sometimes connected by too strong a chain of argument, and the inferences from them are, to my mind, too direct and irresistible, to admit of the explanations which the Unitarians sometimes attempt to give them, or the evasions by which, at others, they endeavor to escape from them.

You ask me what Bible I take as the standard of my faith - the Hebrew, the Samaritan, the old English translation, or what? I answer, the Bible containing the Sermon on the Mount - any Bible that I can... understand. The New Testament I have repeatedly read in the original Greek, in the Latin, in the Geneva Protestant, in Sacy's Catholic French translations, in Luther's German translation, in the common English Protestant, and in the Douay Catholic translations.

I take any one of them for my standard of faith... But the Sermon on the Mount commands me to lay up for myself treasures, not upon earth, but in Heaven. My hopes of a future life are all founded upon the Gospel of Christ... You think it blasphemous that the omnipotent Creator could be crucified. God is a spirit. The spirit was not crucified. The body of Jesus of Nazareth was crucified.

The Spirit, whether external or created, was beyond the reach of the cross. You see, my orthodoxy grows on me, and I still unite with you in the doctrine of toleration and benevolence.

John Wingate Thornton, in his book The Pulpit of the American Revolution, 1860, wrote:

American Quotations.txt

The highest glory of the American Revolution, said John Quincy Adams, was this: it connected, in one indissoluble bond, the principles of civil government with the principles of Christianity.

On February 10, 1825, in reply to the notification of his election, President-elect John Quincy Adams stated:

I shall therefore repair to the post assigned to me by the call of my country...confident in the trust that the wisdom of the legislative councils will guide and direct me in the path of my official duty, and relying above all upon the superintending providence of that Being in whose hands our breath is and whose are all our ways.

On Friday, March 4, 1825, in his Inaugural Address, President John Quincy Adams stated:

In compliance with an usage coeval with the existence of our Federal Constitution, and sanctioned by the example of my predecessors in the career upon which I am about to enter, I appear, my fellow-citizens, in your presence and in that of Heaven to bind myself by the solemnities of religious obligation to the faithful performance of the duties allotted to me in the station to which I have been called....

From evil - physical, moral, and political - it is not our claim to be exempt. We have suffered sometimes by the visitation of Heaven through disease; often by the wrongs and injustice of other nations, even to the extremities of war; and, lastly, by dissensions among ourselves....

Freedom of the press and of religious opinion should be inviolate; the policy of our country is peace and the ark of our salvation union are articles of faith upon which we are all now agreed....

To the guidance of the legislative councils, to the assistance of the executive and subordinate departments, to the friendly cooperation of the respective State governments, to the candid and liberal support of the people so far as it may be deserved by honest industry and zeal, I shall look for whatever success may attend my public service; and knowing that "Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh in vain," with fervent supplications for His favor, to His overruling providence I commit with humble but fearless confidence my own fate and the future destinies of my country.

On Tuesday, December 6, 1825, in his First Annual Message to Congress, President John Quincy Adams expressed:

In taking a general survey of the concerns of our beloved country, with reference to subjects interesting to the common welfare, the first sentiment which impresses itself upon the mind is of gratitude to the Omnipotent Disposer of All Good for the continuance of the signal blessings of His providence, and especially for that health which to an unusual extent has prevailed within our borders, and for that abundance which in the vicissitudes of the seasons has been scattered with profusion over the land. Nor ought we less to ascribe to Him the glory that we are permitted to enjoy the bounties of His hand in peace and tranquillity - in peace with all other nations of the earth, in tranquillity among ourselves. There has, indeed, rarely been a period in the history of civilized man in which the general condition of the Christian nations has been marked so extensively by peace and prosperity....

Moral, political, intellectual improvement are duties assigned by the Author of Our Existence to social no less than to individual man. For the fulfillment of those duties governments are invested with power, and to the attainment of the end - the progressive improvement of the governed - the exercise of delegated powers is a duty as sacred and indispensable as the usurpation of powers not granted is criminal and odious....

While dwelling with pleasing satisfaction upon the superior excellence of our political institutions, let us not be unmindful that liberty is power; that the nation blessed with the largest portion of liberty must in proportion to its numbers be the most powerful nation upon the earth, and that the tenure of power by man is, in the moral purposes of his Creator, upon condition that it shall be exercised to ends of beneficence, to improve the condition of himself and fellow-men. While foreign nations less blessed with that freedom which is power than ourselves are advancing with gigantic strides in the career of public improvement, were we to slumber in indolence or fold up our arms and proclaim to the world that we are palsied by the will of our constituents, would it not be to cast away the bounties of Providence and doom ourselves to perpetual inferiority?...

May He who searches the hearts of the children of men prosper your exertions to secure the blessings peace and promote the highest welfare of our country.

On December 26, 1825, in communicating with the Senate, President John Quincy Adams stated:

There is yet another subject upon which, without entering into any treaty, the moral influence of the United States may perhaps be exerted with beneficial consequences at such a meeting - the advancement of religious liberty. Some southern nations are even yet so far under the dominion of prejudice that they have incorporated with their political constitutions an exclusive church, without toleration of any other than the dominant sect. The abandonment of this last badge of religious bigotry and oppression may be pressed more effectually by the united exertions of those who concur in the principles of freedom of conscience.

On December 31, 1825, President John Quincy Adams wrote in his diary:

I rise usually between five and six - that is, at this time of year, from an hour and a half to two hours before the sun. I walk by the light of the moon or stars, or none, about four miles, usually returning home in time to see the sun rise from the eastern chamber of the House. I then make my fire, and read three chapters of the Bible with Scott's and Hewlett's Commentaries.

On March 15, 1826, in writing to the House of Representatives, President John Quincy Adams stated:

Objects of the highest importance, not only to the future welfare of the whole human race, but bearing directly upon the special interests of this Union, will engage the deliberations of the congress of Panama whether we are represented there or not. Others, if we are represented, may be offered by our plenipotentiaries for consideration having in view both of these great results - our own interests and the improvement of the condition of man upon the earth.

It may be that in the lapse of many centuries no other opportunity so favorable will be presented to the Government of the United States to subserve the benevolent purposes of Divine Providence; to dispense the promised blessings of the Redeemer of Mankind; to promote the prevalence in future ages of peace on earth and good will to man, as will not be placed in their power by participating in the deliberations of this congress....

Of the same enumerated topics are the preparation of a manifesto setting forth to the world the justice of their cause and the relations they desire to hold with other Christian powers....

The Congress of Panama is believed to present a fair occasion for urging upon all the new nations of the south the just and liberal principles of religious liberty; not by any interference whatever in their internal concerns, but by claiming for our citizens whose occupations or interests may call them to occasional residence in their territories the inestimable privilege of worshipping their Creator according to the dictates of their own consciences.... The blessing of Heaven may turn it to the account of human improvement.

On July 11, 1826, in an Executive Order, President John Quincy Adams stated:

The President with deep regret announces to the Army that it has pleased the Disposer of All Human Events, in whose hands are the issues of life, to remove from the scene of earthly existence our illustrious venerated fellow-citizen, Thomas Jefferson. This dispensation of Divine Providence, afflicting to us, but the consummation of glory to him, occurred on the 4th of the present month - on the fiftieth anniversary of that Independence the Declaration of which, emanating from his mind, at once proclaimed the birth of a free nation and offered motives of hope and consolation to the whole family of man....

It has become the painful duty... to announce to the Army the death of another distinguished and venerated citizen. John Adams departed this life on the 4th of this month. Like his compatriot Jefferson, he aided in drawing and ably supporting the Declaration of Independence. With a prophetic eye he looked through the impending difficulties of the Revolution and foretold with what demonstrations of joy the anniversary of the birth of American freedom would be hailed. He was permitted to behold the verification of his prophecy, and died, as did Jefferson, on the day of the jubilee.

A coincidence of circumstances so wonderful gives confidence to the belief that the patriotic efforts of these illustrious men were Heaven directed, and furnishes a new seal to the hope that the prosperity of these States is under the special protection of a kind Providence.

On Tuesday, December 5, 1826, in his Second Annual Message to Congress, President John Quincy Adams stated:

The assemblage of the representatives of our Union in both Houses of the Congress at this time occurs under circumstances calling for the renewed homage of our grateful acknowledgements to the Giver of All Good... We are, as a people, increasing with unabated rapidity in population, wealth, and national resources, and whatever differences of opinion exist among us with regard to the mode and the means by which we shall turn the beneficence of Heaven to the improvement of our own condition, there is yet a spirit animating us all which will not suffer the bounties of Providence to be showered upon us in vain, but will receive them with grateful hearts, and apply them with unwearied hands to the advancement of the general good...

Since your last meeting at this place, the fiftieth anniversary of the day when our independence was declared... two of the principal actors in that solemn scene - the hand that penned the ever-memorable Declaration and the voice that sustained it in debate - were by one summons, at the distance of 700 miles from each other, called before the Judge of All to account for their deeds done upon earth. They departed cheered by the benedictions of their country, to whom they left the inheritance of their fame and the memory of their bright example... In the pledge of their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor to the cause of freedom and of mankind; and on the last extended to bed of death, with but sense and sensibility left to breathe a last aspiration to Heaven of blessing upon their country, may we not humbly hope that to them too it was a pledge of transition from gloom to glory, and that while their mortal vestments were sinking into the clod of the valley their emancipated spirits were ascending to the bosom of their God!

On December 24, 1827, in his Third Annual Message to Congress, President John Quincy Adams stated:

A revolution of the seasons has nearly been completed... In that interval the never-slumbering eye of a wise and beneficent Providence has continued its guardian care over the welfare of our beloved country... the productions of the soil, the exchanges of commerce, the vivifying labors of human industry, have combined to mingle in our cup a portion of enjoyment as large and liberal as the indulgence of Heaven has perhaps ever granted to the imperfect state of man upon earth; and as the purest of human felicity consists in its participation with others, it is no small addition to the sum of our national happiness at this time that peace and prosperity prevail to a degree seldom experienced over the whole habitable globe, presenting, though as yet with painful exceptions, a foretaste of that blessed period of promise when the lion shall lie down with the lamb and wars shall be no more.

On Tuesday, December 2, 1828, in his Fourth Annual Message to Congress, President John Quincy Adams stated:

If the enjoyment in profusion of the bounties of Providence forms a suitable subject of mutual gratulation and grateful acknowledgment, we are admonished at this return of the season when the representatives of the nation are assembled to deliberate upon their concerns to offer up the tribute of fervent and grateful hearts for the never-failing mercies of Him who ruleth over all. He has again favored us with healthful seasons and abundant harvests; He has sustained us in peace with foreign countries and in tranquillity within our borders; He has preserved us in the quiet and undisturbed possession of civil and religious liberty; He has crowned the year with His goodness, imposing on us no other condition than of improving for our own happiness the blessings bestowed by His hands, and, in the fruition of all His favors, of devoting the faculties with which we have been endowed by Him to His glory and to our own temporal and eternal welfare....

Proceeding from a cause which humanity will view with concern, the suffering of scarcity in distant lands, it yields a consolatory reflection that this scarcity is in no respect attributable to us; that it comes from the dispensation of Him who ordains all in wisdom and goodness, and who permits evil itself only as an instrument of good; that, far from contributing to this scarcity, and that in pouring forth from the abundance of our own garner the supplies which will partially restore plenty to those who are in need we shall ourselves reduce our stores and add to the price of our own bread, so as in some degree to participate in the wants which it will be the good fortune of our country to relieve....

They were, moreover, considered as savages, whom it was our policy and our duty to use our influence in converting to Christianity and in bringing within the pale of civilization.... As brethren of the human race, rude and ignorant, we endeavored to bring them to the knowledge of religion and of letters. The ultimate design was to incorporate in our own institutions that portion of them which could be converted to the state of civilization.... We have had the rare good fortune of teaching them the arts of civilization and the doctrines of Christianity.

On November 13, 1831, John Quincy Adams recorded:

Since I left Quincy [for Washington] I have composed twenty-three stanzas of versions of the Psalms - all bad, but as good as I could make them.

American Quotations.txt

John Quincy Adams composed the poem:

Almighty Father! Look in mercy down:

O! grant me virtue, to perform any part -
The patriot's fervour, and the statesman's art
In thought, word, deed, preserve me from thy frown.

Direct me to the paths of bright renown -
Guide my frail bark, by truth's unerring chart, Inspire my soul, and purify my heart;
and with success my steadfast purpose crown.

My country's weal - that be my polar star -
Justice, thou Rock of Ages, is thy law -
And when thy summons calls me to thy bar,
Be this my plea, thy gracious smile to draw -
That all my ways to justice were inclin'd -
And all my aims - the blessings of mankind.

On January 1, 1837, at age 71, John Quincy Adams entered in his diary:

Whether I am or shall be saved is all unknown to me; I know that I have been, and am, a sinner...but I cannot, if I would, divest myself of the belief that my Maker is a being whose tender mercies are over all His works...

On July 4, 1837, in An Oration Delivered Before the Inhabitants of the Town of Newburyport at their Request on the Sixty-First Anniversary of the Declaration of Independence, John Quincy Adams proclaimed:

Why is it that, next to the birthday of the Saviour of the World, your most joyous and most venerated festival returns on this day.
Is it not that, in the chain of human events, the birthday of the nation is indissolubly linked with the birthday of the Savior? That it forms a leading event in the Progress of the Gospel dispensation?
Is it not that the Declaration of Independence first organized the social compact on the foundation of the Redeemer's mission upon earth?
That it laid the cornerstone of human government upon the first precepts of Christianity and gave to the world the first irrevocable pledge of the fulfillment of the prophecies announced directly from Heaven at the birth of the Saviour and predicted by the greatest of the Hebrew prophets 600 years before.

In 1838, in a speech before Congress, John Quincy Adams spoke:

Sir, I might go through the whole of the sacred history of the Jews to the advent of our Saviour and find innumerable examples of women who not only took an active part in politics of their times, but who are held up with honor to posterity for doing so. Our Savior himself, while on earth, performed that most stupendous miracle, of raising of Lazarus from the dead, at the petition of a woman.

On May 27, 1838, in Washington, D.C., John Quincy Adams entered into his diary:

The neglect of public worship in this city is an increasing evil, and the indifference to all religion throughout the whole country portends no good. There is in the clergy of all the Christian denominations a time-serving, cringing, subservient morality, as wide from the Gospel as it is from the intrepid assertion and indication of truth.

The counterfeit character of a very large portion of the Christian ministry in this country is disclosed in the dissension growing up in all the Protestant churches on the subject of slavery....

In his diary which he kept meticulously, John Quincy Adams made note of his church attendance:

Scarcely a Sunday passes [that I fail to] hear something of which a pointed application to my own situation and circumstances occurs to my thoughts. It is often consolation, support, encouragement - sometimes warning and admonition, sometimes keen and trying remembrance of deep distress. The lines [of Isaac Watts' hymn sung] are of the cheering kind.

On April 30, 1839, John Quincy Adams spoke to the New York Historical Society on the fiftieth anniversary of Washington's inauguration:

The signers of the Declaration further averred that the one people of the united colonies were then precisely in that situation - with a government degenerated into tyranny and called upon by the laws of nature and of nature's God to dissolve that government and to institute another.

And thus was consummated the work commenced by the Declaration of Independence - a work in which the people of the North American Union, acting under the deepest sense of responsibility to the Supreme Ruler of the universe, has achieved the most transcendent act of power that social man in his mortal condition can perform.

Now the virtue which had been infused into the Constitution of the United States, and was to give to its vital existence the stability and duration to which it was destined, was no other than the consecration of those abstract principles which had been first proclaimed in the Declaration of Independence; namely, the self-evident truths of the natural and unalienable rights of man, of the indefeasible constituent and dissolvent sovereignty of the people, always subordinate to a rule of right and wrong, and always responsible to the Supreme Ruler of the universe for the rightful exercise of that sovereign, constituent, and dissolvent power.

In writing of Ralph Waldo Emerson, John Quincy Adams stated:

For many years since the establishment of the theological school at Andover, the Calvinists and Unitarians have been battling with each other upon the atonement, the divinity of Jesus Christ and the Trinity. This has now very much subsided; but other wanderings of mind takes the place of that, and equally lets the wolf into the fold. A young man, named Ralph Waldo Emerson, and a classmate of my lamented son George, after failing in the everyday avocation of a Unitarian preacher and schoolmaster, starts a new doctrine of transcendentalism, declared all the old revelations superannuated and worn out, and announces the approach of new revelations and prophecies.

Ralph Waldo Emerson commented concerning John Quincy Adams:

No man could read the Bible with such powerful effect, even with the cracked and winded voice of old age.

On July 11, 1841, his seventy-fourth birthday, John Quincy Adams wrote in his diary:

My birthday happens this day upon the Sabbath. Every return of the day comes with a weight of solemnity more and more awful. How peculiarly impressive ought it then be when the annual warning of the shortening thread sounds in tones deepened by the church bell of the Lord's Day! The question comes with yearly aggravation upon my conscience, "What have I done with the seventy-four years that I have been indulged with the blessings of life!"

In 1843, at seventy-six years of age, John Quincy Adams officiated at the laying of the cornerstone for an astronomical observatory in Cincinnati:

The hand of God himself has furnished me this opportunity to do good. But, oh how much will depend upon my manner of performing the tasks! And with what agony of soul must I implore the aid of the Almighty Wisdom for powers of conception, energy of execution, and unconquerable will to accomplish my design.

On February 27, 1844, at the age of 77, John Quincy Adams was not only a U.S. Representative, but also the chairman of the American Bible Society. In addressing that organization, he proclaimed:

I deem myself fortunate in having the opportunity, at a stage of a long life drawing rapidly to its close, to bear at this place, the capital of our National Union, in the Hall of representatives of the North American people, in the chair of the presiding officer of the assembly representing the whole people, the personification of the great and mighty nation - to bear my solemn testimonial of reverence and gratitude to that book of books, the Holy Bible....

The Bible carries with it the history of the creation, the fall and redemption of man, and discloses to him, in the infant born at Bethlehem, the Legislator and Saviour of the world.

Returning to politics after having served as the nation's sixth president, John Quincy Adams spoke to the House of Representatives, where he led the fight against slavery for nearly fourteen years before seeing results:

Oh, if but one man could arise with a genius capable of supporting, and an utterance capable of communicating those eternal truths that belong to this question, to lay bare in all its nakedness that outrage upon the goodness of God, human slavery! Now is the time, and this is the occasion, upon which such a man would perform the duties of an angel upon earth!

When asked why he never seemed discouraged or depressed over championing the unpopular fight against slavery, John Quincy Adams replied:

Duty is ours; results are God's.

On December 3, 1844, after years of struggle against the powerful slavery interests, John Quincy Adams' motion succeeded to rescind the infamous Gag Rule, which had forbidden the discussion of slavery in the Congress. After hearing the progress of his long and lonely anti-slavery crusade, John Quincy Adams wrote in his diary:

Blessed, forever blessed, be the name of God!

On July 11, 1846, his 80th birthday, John Quincy Adams entered in his diary:

I enter upon my eightieth year, with thanksgiving to God for all the blessings and mercies which His providence has bestowed upon me throughout a life extended now to the longest term allotted to the life of man; with supplication for the continuance of those blessings and mercies to me and mine, as long as it shall suit the dispensations of His wise providence, and for resignation to His will when my appointed time shall come.

John Quincy Adams revealed his convictions and philosophy in the following quotations:

The first and almost the only Book deserving of universal attention is the Bible.

I speak as a man of the world to men of the world; and I say to you, Search the Scriptures! The Bible is the book of all others, to be read at all ages, and in all conditions of human life; not to be read once or twice or thrice through, and then laid aside, but to be read in small portions of one or two chapters every day, and never to be intermitted, unless by some overruling necessity.

In what light soever we regard the Bible, whether with reference to revelation, to history, or to morality, it is an invaluable and inexhaustible mine of knowledge and virtue.

It is no slight testimonial, both to the merit and worth of Christianity, that in all ages since its promulgation the great mass of those who have risen to eminence by their profound wisdom and integrity have recognized and revered Jesus of Nazareth as the Son of the living God.

Posterity - you will never know how much it has cost my generation to preserve your freedom. I hope you will make good use of it.

My own deliberate opinion is, that the more of pure moral principles is carried into the policy and conduct of a Government, the wiser and more profound that policy will be.

From the day of the Declaration... they (the American people) were bound by the laws of God, which they all, and by the laws of The Gospel, which they nearly all, acknowledge as the rules of their conduct.

All that I am, my mother made me.

In an article published in The Churchman, June 14, 1890, John Quincy Adams stated:

There are two prayers that I love to say - the first is the Lord's Prayer, and because the Lord taught it; and the other is what seems to be a child's prayer: "Now I lay me down to sleep," and I love to say that because it suits me. I have been repeating it every night for many years past, and I say it yet, and I expect to say it my last night on earth if I am conscious. But I have added a few words more to the prayer so as to express my trust in Christ, and also to acknowledge what I ask, for I ask as a favor, and not because I deserve it. This is it:

"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep;
If I should die before I wake,
I pray the Lord my soul to take;
For Jesus' sake. Amen."

Near the end of his life, John Quincy Adams entered in his diary:

May I never cease to be grateful for the numberless blessings received through life at His hands, never repine at what He has denied, never murmur at the dispensations of Providence, and implore His forgiveness for all the errors and delinquencies of my life!

On February 21, 1848, John Quincy Adams stated:

Fortune, by which I understand Providence, has showered blessings upon me profusely. But they have been blessings unforseen and unsought. Non nobis, Domine, non nobis, sed nomini tuo do gloriam. [Not to us, Lord, not to us, but to your name be the glory.]

Chateaubriand, Francois Rene' de (1768-1848), was a French writer. He helped begin the literary style known as Romanticism, which emphasized man's emotion in a rather flowery style. In 1802, writing on his conversion to Christianity in Le Genie du Christianisme, Chateaubriand declared:

J' ai pleure' et j' ai cru. (I wept and I believed.)

Boston Gazette (September 1768), carried an article which read:

If an army should be sent to reduce us to slavery, we will put our lives in our hands and cry to the Judge of all the earth... Behold, how they come to cast us out of this possession which Thou hast given us to inherit. Help us, Lord, our God, for we rest on Thee, and in Thy name we go against this multitude.

Bonaparte, Napoleon, I (August 15, 1769-May 5, 1821), was the Emperor of France, 1804-15. He was first given command of the French army in Italy, 1796, where he turned near defeat by the Austrians into victory over Milan, Mantua, Sardinia and Naples, followed by the papacy suing for peace. He obtained the Directory's support for conquering Egypt and India and, in 1799, he became the first consul in the French government formed after the Roman model. In 1802, Napoleon defeated the Austrians and was made consul for life. In 1804, he proclaimed himself emperor, and renewed the war with Italy, Germany and Switzerland.

It was during this time that Napoleon, needing money for his military campaigns, gave up the idea of a colony in America. In 1803, Napoleon sold the Louisiana Territory for $15,000,000.00 to the United States. This single purchase of nearly a million square miles, at about 2 cents an acre, more than doubled the size of the United States of America.

Napoleon was defeated on the sea by the British Lord Horatio Nelson at Trafalgar, but commenced tremendous victories on land at Austerlitz, Jena and Friedland. In 1812, Napoleon invaded Russia with over half a million men, but nearly 400,000 of them died in the brutal Russian winter. In 1813, he was defeated at Leipzig, forced to abdicate and exiled to Elba.

Napoleon escaped Elba in 1815 and returned to a hero's welcome in Paris, where he led France for the famous Hundred Days in an attempt to regain his former power. On June 18, 1815, in one of the most decisive battles in history, Napoleon was defeated at Waterloo by the British Duke of Wellington. He was then captured and banished to the island of St. Helena, off the west coast of Africa, where he lived for the remainder of his life.

At Paris, January 23, 1814, Napoleon remarked:

France is invaded; I am leaving to take command of my troops, and, with God's help and their valor, I hope soon to drive the enemy beyond the frontier.

In the writing On St. Helena, 1816, Napoleon is reported to have stated to General H.G. Bertrand while exiled on the island of St. Helena:

The Gospel possesses a secret virtue, a mysterious efficacy, a warmth which penetrates and soothes the heart. One finds in meditating upon it that which one experiences in contemplating the heavens.

The Gospel is not a book; it is a living being, with an action, a power, which invades everything that opposes its extension.

Behold it upon this table, this book surpassing all others (here the Emperor solemnly placed his hand upon it): I never omit to read it, and every day with new pleasure.

Nowhere is to be found such a series of beautiful ideas, and admirable moral maxims, which pass before us like the battalions of a celestial army... The soul can never go astray with this book for its guide....

Everything in Christ astonishes me. His spirit overawes me, and His will confounds me. Between Him and whoever else in the world there is no possible term of comparison; He is truly a Being by Himself. His ideas and His sentiments, the truth which He announces, His manner of convincing, are not explained either by human organization or by the nature of things.

Truth should embrace the universe. Such is Christianity, the only religion which destroys sectional prejudices, the only one which proclaims the unity and the absolute brotherhood of the whole human family, the only one which is purely spiritual; in fine, the only one which assigns to all, without distinction, for a true country, the bosom of the Creator, God.

Christ proved that He was the Son of the Eternal by His disregard of time. All His doctrines signify one only and the same thing - eternity. What a proof of the divinity of Christ! With an empire so absolute, he has but one single end - the spiritual melioration of individuals, the purity of the conscience, the union to that which is true, the holiness of the soul....

Not only is our mind absorbed, it is controlled; and the soul can never go astray with this book for its guide. Once master of our spirit, the faithful Gospel loves us. God even is our friend, our father, and truly our God. The mother has no greater care for the infant whom she nurses....

If you do not perceive that Jesus Christ is God, very well: then I did wrong to make you a general.

Napoleon's statement, in another rendering from the French language, declares:

The Bible is no mere book, but a Living Creature, with a power that conquers all that oppose it.

Napoleon I, in a discussion with Count de Motholon, stated:

I know men; and I tell you that Jesus Christ is not a man. Superficial minds see a resemblance between Christ and the founders of empires, and the gods of other religions. That resemblance does not exist.

There is between Christianity and whatever other religions the distance of infinity... His religion is a revelation from an intelligence which certainly is not that of man.

The religion of Christ is a mystery which subsists by its own force, and proceeds from a mind which is not a human mind. We find in it a marked individuality, which originated a train of words and actions unknown before.

Jesus is not a philosopher, for His proofs are miracles, and from the first His disciples adored Him.

Alexander, Caesar, Charlemagne, and myself founded empires; but upon what foundation did we rest the creations of our genius? Upon force! But Jesus Christ founded His upon Love; and at this hour millions of men would die for Him.

Emperor Napoleon Bonaparte I stated:

All systems of morality are fine. The Gospel alone has exhibited a complete assemblage of the principles of morality, divested of all absurdity. It is not composed, like your creed, of a few commonplace sentences put into bad verse. Do you wish to see that which is really sublime? Repeat the Lord's Prayer.

The nature of Christ's existence is mysterious, I admit; ... Reject it and the world is an inexplicable riddle; believe it and the history of our race is satisfactorily explained.

The loftiest intellects since the advent of Christianity have had faith, a practical faith, in the doctrines of the Gospel: ... Descartes and Newton, Leibnitz and Pascal, Racine and Corneille, Charlemagne and Louis XIV.

Upon receiving a copy of Pierre Simon de Laplace's book, Mecanique Celeste, Napoleon Bonaparte remarked:

You have written this huge book on the system of the world without once mentioning the author of the universe.

Napoleon remarked:

All things proclaim the existence of God.

Wordsworth, William (April 7, 1770-April 23, 1850), was one of the first English Romantic poets. He published his Lyrical Ballads in 1798; and Poems in Two Volumes in 1807. Other works include: The Excursion; The White Doe of Rylstone; Memorials of a Tour of the Continent; and Eccelesiastical Sketches. Greatly criticized at first, his works gradually became recognized, and in 1843, Queen Victoria appointed him Poet-Laureate of England:

Trust in the Saviour

But Thou art true, Incarnate Lord!
Who didst vouchsafe for man to die;
Thy smile is sure, Thy plighted Word
No charge can falsify.

Hymn for the Boatman

Jesus, bless our slender boat,
By the current swept along!
Loud its threatenings - let them not Drown the music of a song
Breathed Thy mercy to implore,
Where the troubled waters roar.

Saviour, for our warning, seen

Bleeding on that precious rood;
If, while through the meadows green
Gently wound the peaceful flood,
We forget Thee, do not Thou
Disregard Thy suppliants now.

Translation of the Bible

But to outweigh all harm, the sacred Book,
In dusty sequestration wrapt too long,
Assumes the accents of our native tongue;
And he who guides the plow or wields the crook
With understanding spirit now may look Upon her records, listen to her song,
And sift her laws - much wondering that the wrong
Which Faith hath suffered, Heaven could calmly brook.

Transcendent boon! Noblest that earthly king
Ever bestowed to equalize and bless
Under the weight of mortal wretchedness.

William Wordsworth stated:

The best part of a good man's life is the little unremembered acts of kindness and love.

Beethoven, Ludwig van (baptized December 17, 1770-March 26, 1827), was a Prussian composer who ranks among the greatest in history. He was a contemporary of Mozart and Haydn. Beethoven began losing his hearing at the age of 28 and eventually became totally deaf. Incredibly, though, he continued writing music, creating some of the greatest symphonies, concertos, sonatas, string quartets and choral masterpieces that the world has ever known. Beethoven wrote:

Today happens to be the Lord's Day, so I will quote you something from my Bible: "See that ye love one another as I have loved you."

No friend have I. I must live by myself alone; but I know well that God is nearer to me than others in my art, so I will walk fearlessly with Him. I have always known and understood Him.

Smith, Sydney (June 3, 1771-February 22, 1845), was a English humorist, known for his wit and satirical humor. He is best known for his Peter Plymley Letters, which were highly instrumental in forwarding the cause of granting Catholics in England the right to vote. In his 1855 work, entitled Lady Holland's Memoir, Sydney Smith wrote:

Take short views, hope for the best, and trust in God.

Sydney Smith wrote:

Truth is Justice' handmaid, freedom is its child, peace is its companion, safety walks in its steps, victory follows in its train; it is the brightest emanation from the Gospel; it is the attribute of God.

Scott, Sir Walter (August 15, 1771-September 21, 1832), was a Scottish novelist and poet. His works include: The Lay of the Last Minstrel, 1805; Lady of the Lake, 1810; Ivanhoe, 1819; and The Talisman, 1825.

In chapter XII of The Monastery, 1820, Sir Walter Scott wrote:

Oh, on that day, that wrathful day,
When man to judgment wakes from clay,
Be Thou, O Christ, the sinner's stay
Though heaven and earth shall pass away.
Within this awful Volume lies
The mystery of mysteries.
Happiest they, of human race,
To whom our God has granted grace
To read, to fear, to hope, to pray,
To lift the latch, and force the way;
And better had they ne'er been born
Who read to doubt, or read to scorn.

In commenting on the Scriptures, Sir Walter Scott expounded:

The most learned, acute, and diligent student cannot, in the longest life, obtain an entire knowledge of this one Volume. The most deeply he works the mine, the richer and more abundant he finds the ore; new light continually beams from this source of heavenly knowledge to direct the conduct, and illustrate the work of God and the ways of men; and he will at last leave the world confessing that the more he studied the Scriptures the fuller conviction he had of his own ignorance, and of their inestimable value.

During his final illness he expressed a desire that someone should read to him. When asked what book, he replied:

Need you ask? There is but one! - St. John's Gospel.

Montgomery, James (November 4, 1771-April 30, 1854), was a well-known Scottish newspaperman and poet. He edited the Sheffield Iris, and wrote many hymns, including What Is Prayer?, in which he penned:

Prayer is the soul's sincere desire
Uttered or unexpressed;
The motion of a hidden fire
That trembles in the breast.

Ka'ahumanu (1772-1832), was the wife of King Kamehameha the Great of Hawaii. She served as queen regent-prime minister (kahina nui) after her husband's death in 1819. Queen Ka'ahumanu, along with her son, King Kamehameha II (Liholiho), commanded the cessation of the social taboos, idolatry and human sacrifice, known as kapu, that had controlled Hawaii for centuries. Their edict, issued in 1819, went out to all the islands, causing the destruction of numerous idols and temples (heiaus).

The following year, Hiram Bingham and a group of Protestant missionaries came to Hawaii on the brig, Thaddeus. Queen Ka'ahumanu received Christ and helped spread the Gospel throughout the islands, resulting in "The Great Awakening" of the 1830's and 1840's. Just prior to her death, Queen Ka'ahumanu was presented with the newly completed version of the New Testament in the Hawaiian language. She declared it good (maika), and then spoke her last words to Rev. Bingham:

I am going where the mansions are ready.

The High Chiefess Kapiolani of Kealekekua Bay was baptized by the early Christian missionaries, and proceeded to introduce her village of Kaawaloa to Christ. In helping the Hilo missionaries win the people from ancient superstitions and human sacrifice to Pele (the volcano goddess), Kapiolani traveled a hundred miles to the rim of the volcano Kilauea, descended into the crater and defied Pele by eating some of the goddess' sacred ohelo berries. She then praised "the one true God" and proclaimed:

Jehovah is my God. He kindled these fires. I fear not Pele. All the gods of Hawaii are vain.

This courageous act of the High Chiefess Kapiolani greatly advanced Christianity in Hawaii, leading many Hawaiians to become missionaries to other islands, such as Rev. Kauwealoha, who stopped the ritual of cannibalism and planted numerous churches and schools.

The State Motto of Hawaii, "Ua mau ke ea o ka 'aina i ka pono" (The Life of the Land is Perpetuated in Righteousness), was first uttered by Queen Ke'opuolani, wife of King Kamehameha II, as she was baptized into the Christian faith before her death in 1825. King Kamehameha III reiterated his mother's dying words, "Ua mau ke ea o ka 'aina i ka pono," as he gave thanks to God at Kawaiaha'o Church for the return of his kingdom in 1843.

King, Cyrus (1772-1817), was a member of the United States Congress. He was on the Senate and House Joint Committee. He was brother of Rufus King, a signer of the Constitution of the United States. Cyrus King served as Major-General of the 6th Division of the Massachusetts Militia, and founded Thorton Academy.

In response to Thomas Jefferson announcing his plans to donate his personal library of 6,487 books to the Library of Congress, Cyrus King motioned to the committee:

To report a new section authorizing the Library Committee, as soon as said library shall be received at Washington, to select there from all books of an atheistical, irreligious, and immoral tendency, if any such there be, and send the same back to Mr. Jefferson without any expense to him.

Coleridge, Samuel Taylor (October 21, 1772-July 25, 1834), was an English poet, philosopher and critic. His works, which began the "Romantic Period" of English Literature, include: Kubla Khan, 1797; The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, 1797-98; and Christabel, 1797-1800. Samuel Taylor Coleridge stated:

I know the Bible is inspired because it finds me at greater depths of my being than any other book.

Is it fitting to run Jesus Christ in a silly parallel with Socrates - the Being whom thousands of millions of intellectual creatures, of whom I am a humble unit, take to be their Redeemer - with an Athenian philosopher, of whom we know nothing except his glorification in Plato and Socrates?

In 1798, writing in his work The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, Samuel Taylor Coleridge composed the lines:

He prayeth best who loveth best
All things both great and small;
For the dear God who loveth us,
He made and loveth all.

In an autographed letter to Mr. Colson, kept in the Wellesley College Library, Coleridge wrote:

But, above all things, I entreat you, my dear Colson, to preserve your faith in Christ. It is my wealth in poverty, my joy in sorrow, my peace amid tumult. For all the evil I have committed, I have found it to be so. I can smile with pity at the infidel whose vanity makes him dream that I should barter such a blessing for the few subtleties from the school of the cold-blooded sophists.

As recorded in Studies in Poetry and Philosophy, Coleridge wrote:

I receive, with full and grateful faith, the assurance of Revelation, that the Word, which is from eternity with God, and is God, assumed human nature, in order to redeem me and all mankind from our connate corruption. I believe that the assumption of humanity by the Son of God was revealed to us by the Word made flesh, and manifested to us in Jesus Christ, and that His miraculous birth, His agony, His crucifixion, resurrection and ascension were all both symbols of redemption and necessary parts of that awful process.

Samuel Taylor Coleridge wrote:

There is one art of which every man should be a master - the art of reflection.

William Henry (February 9, 1773-April 4, 1841), was the 9th President of the United States, 1841, serving only one month before dying; U.S. Minister to Columbia, 1828-29; U.S. Senator, 1825-28; Ohio State Senator, 1819; U.S. Representative, 1816-19; Major General, appointed supreme commander in the Northwest, winning the Battle of Tippecanoe, 1811, and the Battle of the Thames, 1813; and Governor of Indiana Territory, 1800; U.S. Representative from the Northwest Territory, 1799; Secretary of the Northwest Territory, 1798; married Anna Symmes, 1795; enlisted in the U.S. Infantry, 1791; graduated from Hampden-Sidney College, 1790; and the son of Benjamin Harrison, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, as well as the grandfather of Benjamin Harrison, the 23rd President of the United States.

In 1840, just prior to his election, William Henry Harrison commented to the pastor of a Methodist Church in Cincinnati:

I know there are some of my political opponents who will be ready to impugn my motives in attending this revival-meeting at this peculiar time; but I care not for the smiles or frowns of my fellow-countrymen. God knows my heart and understands my motives. A deep and an abiding sense of my inward spiritual necessities brings me to this hallowed place night after night.

On Thursday, March 4, 1841, in his Inaugural Address, President William Henry Harrison stated:

However strong may be my present purpose to realize the expectations of a magnanimous and confiding people, I too well understand the dangerous temptations to which I shall be exposed from the magnitude of the power which it has been the pleasure of the people to commit to my hands not to place my chief confidence upon the aid of that Almighty Power which has hitherto protected me and enabled me....

We admit of no government by divine right, believing that so far as power is concerned the Beneficent Creator has made no distinction amongst men; that all are upon an equality, and that the only legitimate right to govern is an express grant of power from the governed....

There are certain rights possessed by each individual American citizen which in his compact with the others he has never surrendered. Some of them, indeed, he is unable to surrender, being, in the language of our system, unalienable....

The American citizen... claims them because he is himself a man, fashioned by the same Almighty hand as the rest of his species and entitled to a full share of the blessings with which He has endowed them....

The great danger to our institutions does... appear to me to be... the accumulation in one of the departments of that which was assigned to others. Limited as are the powers which have been granted, still enough have been granted to constitute a despotism if concentrated in one of the departments... more particularly... the Executive branch... The tendency of power to increase itself, particularly when exercised by a single individual... would terminate in virtual monarchy....

Republics can commit no greater error than to adopt or continue any feature in their systems of government which may be calculated to create or increase the love of power in the bosoms of those to whom necessity obliges them to commit the management of their affairs; and surely nothing is more likely to produce such a state of mind than the long continuance of an office of high trust... When this corrupting passion once takes possession of the human mind, like the love of gold it becomes insatiable. It is the never-dying worm in his bosom, grows with his growth and strengthens with the declining years of its victim. If this is true, it is the part of wisdom for a republic to limit the service of that officer at least to whom she has intrusted the management of her foreign relations, the execution of her laws, and the command of her armies and navies to a period so short as to prevent his forgetting that he is the accountable agent, not the principle; the servant, not the master....

The great dread... seems to have been that the reserved powers of the States would be absorbed by those of the Federal Government and a consolidated power established, leaving to the States the shadow only of that independent action for which they had so zealously contended.... There is still an undercurrent at work by which, if not seasonably checked, the worst apprehensions of our anti-federal patriots will be realized, and not only will the State authorities be overshadowed by the great increase of power in the Executive department of the General Government, but the character of that Government, if not its designation, be essentially and radically changed. This state of things has been in part effected by... the never-failing tendency of political power to increase itself....

It is not by the extent of its patronage alone that the Executive department has become dangerous, but by the use which it appears may be made of the appointing power to bring under its control the whole revenues of the country.... There was wanting no other addition to the powers of our Chief Magistrate to stamp monarchical character on our Government but the control of the public finances.... The first Roman Emperor, in his attempt to seize the sacred treasure, silenced the opposition of the officer to whose charge it had been committed by a significant allusion to his sword.... I know the importance which has been attached by men of great abilities and patriotism to the divorce, as it is called, of the Treasury from the banking institutions.... It was certainly a great error in the framers of the Constitution not to have made the officer at the head of the Treasury Department entirely independent of the Executive....

The maxim which our ancestors derived from the mother country that "freedom of the press is the great bulwark of civil and religious liberty" is one of the most precious legacies which they have left us.... A decent and manly examination of the acts of the Government should be not only tolerated, but encouraged....

As long as the love of power is a dominant passion of the human bosom, and as long as the understanding of men can be warped and their affections changed by operations upon their passions and prejudices, so long will the liberties of a people depend on their constant attention to its preservation. The danger to all well-established free governments arises from the unwillingness of the people to believe in its existence or from the influence of designing men diverting their attention from the quarter whence it approaches to a source from which it can never come. This is the old trick of those who would usurp the government of their country. In the name of democracy they speak, warning the people against the influence of wealth and the danger of aristocracy.

History, ancient and modern, is full of such examples. Caesar became the master of the Roman people and the senate under the pretense of supporting the democratic claims of the former against the aristocracy of the latter; Cromwell, in the character of the protector of the liberties of the people, became the dictator of England, and Bolivar possessed himself of unlimited power with the title of his country's liberator...The tendencies of all such governments in their decline is to monarchy, and the antagonist principle to liberty there is the spirit of faction - a spirit which assumes the character and in times of great excitement imposes itself upon the people as the genuine spirit of freedom, and, like the false Christs whose coming was foretold by the Savior, seeks to, and were it possible would, impose upon the true and most faithful disciples of liberty. It is in periods like this that it behooves the people to be most watchful of those to whom they have intrusted power.

And although there is at times much difficulty in distinguishing the false from the true spirit, a calm and dispassionate investigation will detect the counterfeit, as well by the character of its operations as the results that are produced. The true spirit of liberty, although devoted, persevering, bold, and uncompromising in principle, that secured is mild and tolerant and scrupulous as to the means it employs, whilst the spirit of party, assuming to be that of liberty, is harsh, vindictive, and intolerant, and totally reckless as to the character of the allies which it brings to the aid of its cause...The reign of an intolerant spirit of party amongst a free people seldom fails to result in a dangerous accession to the Executive power introduced and established amidst unusual professions of devotion to democracy...

I can conceive of no more sublime spectacle, none more likely to propitiate an impartial and common Creator, than a rigid adherence to the principles of justice on the part of a powerful nation in its transactions with a weaker and uncivilized people whom circumstances have placed at its disposal....

I deem the present occasion sufficiently important and solemn to justify me in expressing to my fellow citizens a profound reverence for the Christian religion, and a thorough conviction that sound morals, religious liberty, and a just sense of religious responsibility are essentially connected with all true and lasting happiness;

And to that good Being who has blessed us by the gifts of civil and religious freedom, who watched over and prospered the labors of our fathers and has hitherto preserved to us institutions far exceeding in excellence those of any other people, let us unite in fervently commending every interest of our beloved country in all future time.

In writing to his wife, Anna, President William H. Harrison stated:

I retired into the presence of my Maker, and implored his gracious guidance in the faithful discharge of the duties of my high station.

In honor of the Sabbath, President William H. Harrison stated to visitors:

We shall be happy to see you at any time except on the Sabbath.

In commenting to the Presbyterian pastor near his home in Indiana, President William H. Harrison stated:

I think I enjoy religion and delight in the duties of a child of God, and have concluded to unite with the Church of God as soon as my health will permit me to go out.

On April 4, 1841, President William Henry Harrison died, after having been in office only one month. The same day, as recorded in the official records in the State Department, Daniel Webster, Secretary of State, issued the official arrangements for the funeral:

Having consulted with the family and personal friends of the deceased, we have concluded that the funeral be solemnized on Wednesday, the 7th instant, at 12 o'clock. The religious services to be performed according to the usage of the Episcopal Church, in which church the deceased most usually worshipped.

The Acting Secretary of the Navy, J.D. Simms, issued the General Order, April 5, 1841:

The Department announces to the officers of the Navy and Marine Corps the death of William Henry Harrison, late President of the United States... and directs that, uniting with their fellow-citizens in the manifestations of their respect for the exalted character and eminent public services of the illustrious deceased, and of their sense of the bereavement the country has sustained by this afflicting dispensation of Providence, they wear the usual badge of mourning for six months.

On April 13, 1841, President John Tyler, who had been Vice-President under William Henry Harrison, issued the Proclamation:

When a Christian people feel themselves to be overtaken by a great public calamity, it becomes them to humble themselves under the dispensation of Divine Providence, to recognize His righteous government over the children of men, to acknowledge His goodness in time past, as well as their own unworthiness, and to supplicate His merciful protection for the future.

The death of William Henry Harrison, late President of the United States, so soon after his elevation to that high office, is a bereavement peculiarly calculated to be regarded as a heavy affliction and to impress all minds with a sense of the uncertainty of human things and of the dependence of nations, as well as individuals, upon our Heavenly Parent.

I have thought, therefore, that I should be acting in conformity with the general expectations and feelings of the community in recommending, as I now do, to the people of the United States of every religious denomination that, according to their several modes and forms of worship, they observe a day of fasting and prayer by such religious services as may be suitable on the occasion; and I recommend Friday, the 14th day on May next, for that purpose, to the end that on that day we may all with one accord join in humble and reverential approach to Him in whose hands we are, invoking Him to inspire us with a proper spirit and temper of heart and mind under these frowns of His providence and still to bestow His gracious benedictions upon our Government and our country.

Boston Tea Party (December 16, 1773), followed just three years after the Boston Massacre, where five Americans were killed by British soldiers who were commandeering homes. The British then began imposing on the Colonies taxation, which eventually became unbearable.

Early in the year of 1773, the men of Marlborough, Massachusetts, declared unanimously:

Death is more eligible than slavery. A free-born people are not required by the religion of Jesus Christ to submit to tyranny, but may make use of such power as God has given them to recover and support their laws and liberties... [We] implore the Ruler above the skies, that He would make bare His arm in defense of His Church and people, and let Israel go.

The Colonists in Boston responded to the intolerable taxes imposed by the British. A band of citizens, disguised as Indians, threw the cargo of 342 chests of tea from a British East India Company ship into the Boston Harbor.

In 1774, the Parliament of Great Britain decided to blockade the Boston harbor by passing the Boston Port Bill, thus destroying all trade and effectively starving the inhabitants of the city.

The Committee of Correspondence sent word of their plight to the rest of the Colonies, who responded by calling for a Day of Fasting and Prayer on June 1, 1774, (the day the blockade would begin). This was done in order:

... to seek divine direction and aid.

The towns, cities and surrounding Colonies began sending their support. In August of 1774, William Prescott led the men of Pepperell, Massachusetts, to deliver many loads of rye. He wrote to the men of Boston:

We heartily sympathize with you, and are always ready to do all in our power for your support, comfort and relief; knowing that Providence has placed you where you must stand the first shock. We consider we are all embarked in [the same ship] and must sink or swim together. We think if we submit to these regulations, all is gone.

Our forefathers passed the vast Atlantic, spent their blood and treasure, that they might enjoy their liberties, both civil and religious, and transmit them to their posterity... Now if we should give them up, can our children rise up and call us blessed?...

Let us all be of one heart, and stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free; and may he, of his infinite mercy grant us deliverance out of all our troubles.

The inhabitants of Boston responded to this encouraging support by declaring:

The Christian sympathy and generosity of our friends through the Continent cannot fail to inspire the inhabitants of this town with patience, resignation, and firmness, while we trust in the Supreme Ruler of the universe, that he will graciously hear our cries, and in his time free us from our present bondage and make us rejoice in his great salvation.
Page 433

Josiah Quincy, the American orator of freedom, voiced the Colonists' sentiments in 1774:

Blandishments will not fascinate us, nor will threats of a "halter" intimidate. For, under God, we are determined that wheresoever, whensoever, or howsoever we shall be called to make our exit, we will die free men.

The Colonists grew in their resilience and confidence in God, to the point where one Crown-appointed Governor wrote of the condition to the Board of Trade back in England:

If you ask an American, who is his master? He will tell you he has none, nor any governor but Jesus Christ.

The Committees of Correspondence soon began sounding the cry across the Colonies:

No King but King Jesus!

As a result of this crisis, the Colonies joined together in Philadelphia for the first Continental Congress on September 5, 1774.

On October 22, 1774, the Massachusetts Provincial Congress, which met in Boston, began to voice their serious concerns, as President John Hancock declared:

We think it is incumbent upon this people to humble themselves before God on account of their sins, for He hath been pleased in His righteous judgement to suffer a great calamity to befall us, as the present controversy between Great Britain and the Colonies.

[And] also to implore the Divine Blessing upon us, that by the assistance of His grace, we may be enabled to reform whatever is amiss among us, that so God may be pleased to continue to us the blessings we enjoy, and remove the tokens of His displeasure, by causing harmony and union to be restored between Great Britain and the Colonies.

In 1774, the Massachusetts Provincial Congress issued a Resolution to the inhabitants of Massachusetts Bay:

Resistance to tyranny becomes the Christian and social duty of each individual... Continue steadfast, and with a proper sense of your dependence on God, nobly defend those rights which heaven gave, and no man ought to take from us.

In 1774, the Massachusetts Provincial Congress reorganized the Massachusetts militia, providing that over one-third of all new regiments be made up of "Minutemen." The Minutemen, known as such because they would be ready to fight at a minute's notice, would drill as citizen soldiers on the parade-ground, then go to the church to hear exhortation and prayer. Many times the deacon of the church, or even the pastor, would lead the drill. They proclaimed, "Our cause is just" and believed it was their Christian duty to defend it. The Massachusetts Provincial Congress charged the minutemen:

You...are placed by Providence in the post of honor, because it is the post of danger...The eyes not only of North America and the whole British Empire, but of all Europe, are upon you. Let us be, therefore, altogether solicitous that no disorderly behavior, nothing unbecoming our characters as Americans, as citizens and Christians, be justly chargeable to us.

Continental Congress (September 6, 1774), made their first official act a call for prayer, as recorded in the Journals of the Continental Congress, after just receiving the news that the British troops had attacked Boston:

Tuesday, September 6, 1774. Resolved, That the Rev. Mr. Duche' be desired to open the Congress tomorrow morning with prayers, at the Carpenter's Hall, at 9 o'clock.

Continental Congress (September 7, 1774), as recorded in the Journals of the Continental Congress, invited Rev. Mr. Duche' to open the first Congress in Carpenter's Hall, Philadelphia, with prayer:

Wednesday, September 7, 1774, 9 o'clock a.m.
Agreeable to the resolve of yesterday, the meeting was opened with prayers by the Rev. Mr. Duche'. Voted, That the thanks of Congress be given to Mr. Duche'... for performing divine Service, and for the excellent prayer, which he composed and delivered on the occasion.

In a letter to his wife, Abigail, John Adams described that prayer:

When the Congress met, Mr. Cushing made a motion that it should be opened with Prayer. It was opposed by Mr. Jay of New York, and Mr. Rutledge of South Carolina because we were so divided in religious sentiments, some Episcopalians, some Quakers, some Anabaptists, some Presbyterians, and some Congregationalists, that we could not join in the same act of worship.

Mr. Samuel Adams arose and said that he was no bigot, and could hear a Prayer from any gentleman of Piety and virtue, who was at the same time a friend to his Country. He was a stranger in Philadelphia, but had heard that Mr. Duche' deserved that character and therefore he moved that Mr. Duche', an Episcopal clergyman might be desired to read Prayers to Congress tomorrow morning. The motion was seconded, and passed in the affirmative. Mr. Randolph, our president, vailed on Mr. Duche', and received for answer, that if his health would permit, he certainly would.

Accordingly, next morning [the Reverend Mr. Duche'] appeared with his clerk and in his pontificals, and read several prayers in the established form, and read the collect for the seventh day of September, which was the thirty-fifth Psalm. You must remember, this was the next morning after we heard the horrible rumor of the cannonade of Boston.

I never saw a greater effect upon an audience. It seem as if heaven had ordained that Psalm to be read on that morning. After this, Mr. Duche', unexpectedly to every body, struck out into an extemporary prayer, which filled the bosom of every man present. I must confess, I never heard a better prayer, or one so well pronounced.

Episcopalian as he is, Dr. Cooper himself [Adams' pastor] never prayed with such fervor, such ardor, such earnestness and pathos, and in language so elegant and sublime, for America, for the Congress, for the province of Massachusetts Bay, and especially the town of Boston. It has had an excellent effect upon everybody here. I must beg you to read that Psalm."

The 35th Psalm, the Psalter for September 7th, was read by Reverend Mr. Duche' in the first Continental Congress:

Plead my cause, Oh, Lord, with them that strive with me, fight against them that fight against me. Take hold of buckler and shield, and rise up for my help. Draw also the spear and the battle-axe to meet those who pursue me; Say to my soul, "I am your salvation." Let those be ashamed and dishonored who seek my life; Let those be turned back and humiliated who devise evil against me.

The First Prayer in Congress, offered extemporaneously by Rev. Mr. Duche' in Carpenter's Hall, Philadelphia, on September

7, 1774:

O Lord, our Heavenly Father, high and mighty, King of kings, and Lord of lords, who dost from Thy throne behold all the dwellers on earth, and reignest with power supreme and uncontrolled over all the Kingdoms, Empires, and Governments; look down in mercy, we beseech Thee, on these our American States, who have fled to Thee from the rod of the oppressor, and thrown themselves on Thy gracious protection, desiring to be henceforth dependent only on Thee; to Thee have they appealed for the righteousness of their cause; to Thee do they now look up for that countenance and support, which Thou alone canst give; take them, therefore, Heavenly Father, under Thy nurturing care; give them wisdom in Council and valor in the field; defeat the malicious designs of our cruel adversaries; convince them of the unrighteousness of their cause; and if they persist in their sanguinary purposes, O! let the voice of Thine own unerring justice, sounding in their hearts, constrain them to drop the weapons of war, from their unnerved hands in the day of battle!

Be Thou present O God of Wisdom and direct the counsel of this Honorable Assembly; enable them to settle all things on the best and surest foundations; that the scene of blood may be speedily closed; that Order, Harmony and Peace may be effectually restored, and the Truth and Justice, Religion and Piety, prevail and flourish among the people.

Preserve the health of their bodies, and the vigor of their minds, shower down on them, and the millions they here represent, such temporal Blessings as Thou seest expedient for them in this world, and crown them with everlasting Glory in the world to come. All this we ask in the name and through the merits of Jesus Christ, Thy Son and our Saviour, Amen.

The Library of Congress, from the collected reports of the various patriots, recorded on a historical placard the effect of that first prayer upon Congress:

Washington was kneeling there, and Henry, Randolph, Rutledge, Lee, and Jay, and by their side there stood, bowed in reverence, the Puritan Patriots of New England, who at that moment had reason to believe that an armed soldiery was wasting their humble households. It was believed that Boston had been bombarded and destroyed.

They prayed fervently "for America, for Congress, for the Province of Massachusetts Bay, and especially for the town of Boston," and who can realize the emotion with which they turned imploringly to Heaven for Divine interposition and - "It was enough" says Mr. Adams, "to melt a heart of stone. I saw the tears gush into the eyes of the old, grave, Pacific Quakers of Philadelphia."

Continental Congress (September 1774), passed the Articles of Association, as recorded in the Journals of Congress by Secretary Charles Thomson:

Article X. That the late Act of Parliament for establishing... the French Laws in that extensive country now called Quebec, is dangerous in an extreme degree to the Protestant Religion and to the civil rights and liberties of all America; and therefore as men and protestant Christians, we are indispensably obliged to take all proper measures for our security.
Page 437

Massachusetts Provincial Congress (October 22, 1774), concurred with the declaration of its President, John Hancock:

We think it is incumbent upon this people to humble themselves before God on account of their sins, for He hath been pleased in His righteous judgement to suffer a great calamity to befall us, as the present controversy between Great Britain and the Colonies.

[And] also to implore the Divine Blessing upon us, that by the assistance of His grace, we may be enabled to reform whatever is amiss among us, that so God may be pleased to continue to us the blessings we enjoy, and remove the tokens of His displeasure, by causing harmony and union to be restored between Great Britain and these Colonies.

Bell, Sir Charles (November 1774-April 28, 1842), was a great anatomist and surgeon. He was professor of Comparative Anatomy at the Royal College of Surgeons in England and author of numerous volumes. The title of one of his treatise was:

The Hand; Its Mechanism and Vital Endowments, and Evincing Design, and Illustrating the Power, Wisdom, and Goodness of God.

Ampere, Andre Marie (January 22, 1775-June 10, 1836), was a French electrician and scientific writer. He discovered the relationship between magnetism and electricity, and defined a unit to measure the strength of an electric current. (Amperes equals volts divided by ohms.) Ampere wrote on a piece of paper before his death:

Believe in God, in His providence, in a future life, in the recompense of the good; in the punishment of the wicked; in the sublimity and truth of the doctrines of Christ, in a revelation of this doctrine by a special divine inspiration for the salvation of the human race.

Landor, Walter Savage (January 30, 1775-September 17, 1864), was an English author and poet. His best-known work, Imaginary Conversations, was published between 1824-29. Walter Savage Landor declared:

To say nothing of its holiness or authority, the Bible contains more specimens of genius and taste than any other volume in existence.

Massachusetts Provincial Congress (April 15, 1775), just four days before the Battle of Lexington, declared a Day of Public Humiliation, Fasting and Prayer, signed by President of the Provincial Congress, John Hancock:

In circumstances dark as these, it becomes us, as Men and Christians, to reflect that, whilst every prudent Measure should be taken to ward off the impending Judgements... All confidence must be withheld from the Means we use; and reposed only on that GOD who rules in the Armies of Heaven, and without whose Blessing the best human Counsels are but Foolishness - and all created Power Vanity;

It is the Happiness of his Church that, when the Powers of Earth and Hell combine against it... that the Throne of Grace is of the easiest access - and its Appeal thither is graciously invited by the Father of Mercies, who has assured it, that when his Children ask Bread he will not give them a Stone...

RESOLVED, That it be, and hereby is recommended to the good People of this Colony of all Denominations, that THURSDAY the Eleventh Day of May next be set apart as a Day of Public Humiliation, Fasting and Prayer... to confess the sins... to implore the Forgiveness of all our Transgression... and a blessing on the Husbandry, Manufactures, and other lawful Employments of this People; and especially that the union of the American Colonies in Defence of their Rights (for hitherto we desire to thank Almighty GOD) may be preserved and confirmed... And that AMERICA may soon behold a gracious Interposition of Heaven.

By Order of the [Massachusetts] Provincial Congress,
John Hancock, President.

Mecklenburg County, N. C., Declaration of Independence of (May 20, 1775), written in Charlotte, North Carolina by a convention of Scotch-Irish Presbyterians. These county resolutions, prepared by the elder Ephraim Brevard, were sent by special courier to the Continental Congress. It reads:

We do hereby dissolve the political bands which have connected us with the mother-country, and hereby absolve ourselves from all allegiance to the British crown... Resolved, That we do hereby declare ourselves a free and independent people; are, and of a right ought to be, a sovereign and self-governing Association, under control of no power other than that of our God and the general government of Congress; to the maintenance of which we solemnly pledge to each other our mutual cooperation and our lives, our fortunes and our most sacred honor.

Massachusetts Provincial Congress (May 31, 1775), just three weeks after the victory of Fort Ticonderoga, invited Samuel Langdon, President of Harvard College, to address them. He declared:

We have rebelled against God. We have lost the true spirit of Christianity, though we retain the outward profession and form of it... By many, the Gospel is corrupted into a superficial system of moral philosophy, little better than ancient Platonism...

My brethren, let us repent and implore the divine mercy. Let us amend our ways and our doings, reform everything that has been provoking the Most High, and thus endeavor to obtain the gracious interpositions of providence for our deliverance. . . .

If God be for us, who can be against us? The enemy has reproached us for calling on His name and professing our trust in Him. They have made a mock of our solemn fasts and every appearance of serious Christianity in the Land. . . .

May our Land be purged from all its sins! Then the Lord will be our refuge and our strength, a very present help in trouble, and we will have no reason to be afraid, though thousands of enemies set themselves against us round about.

May the Lord hear us in this day of trouble. . . . We will rejoice in His salvation, and in the name of our God, we will set up our banners!

Continental Congress (June 12, 1775), less than two months after the Battles of Lexington and Concord, where "the shot heard 'round the world" was fired, declared Thursday, July 20, 1775, as a Day of Public Humiliation, Fasting, and Prayer:

As the Great Governor of the World, by his supreme and universal Providence, not only conducts the course of nature with unerring wisdom and rectitude, but frequently influences the minds of men to serve the wise and gracious purposes of His indispensable duty, devoutly to acknowledge His superintending Providence, especially in times of impending danger, and public calamity, to reverence and adore his immutable Justice, as well as to implore his merciful Interposition for our deliverance.

This Congress, therefore, considering the present critical, alarming and calamitous state of these Colonies, do earnestly recommend, that Thursday, the Twentieth of July next, be observed by the Inhabitants of all the English Colonies on this Continent, as a day of public HUMILIATION, FASTING, AND PRAYER, that we may with united hearts and voices, unfeignedly confess and deplore our many sins and offer up our joint supplications to the All-wise, Omnipotent and merciful Disposer of all Events, humbly beseeching Him to forgive our iniquities, to remove our present calamities, to avert the desolating judgments with which we are threatened, and to bless our rightful Sovereign King George the III^d. and inspire him with wisdom to discern and pursue the true interest of all his subjects - that a speedy end may be put to the civil discord between Great Britain and the American Colonies, without further effusion of blood - and that the British nation may be influenced in regard to the things that belong to her peace, before they are hid from her eyes - that these Colonies may be ever under the care and protection of a kind Providence, and be prospered in all their interests - that the divine Blessing may descend and rest upon all our civil Rulers, and upon the Representatives of the people in their several Assemblies and Conventions,

American Quotations.txt

that they may be directed to wise and effectual measures for preserving the Union and securing the just Rights and Privileges of the Colonies - that virtue and true religion may revive and flourish throughout our Land - and that America may soon behold a gracious interposition of Heaven for the redress of her many grievances, the restoration of her invaded Rights, a reconciliation with the parent State, on terms constitutional and honorable to both - and that her civil and religious Privileges may be secured to the latest posterity.

And it is recommended to Christians of all denominations to assemble for public worship and to abstain from servile Labour and Recreations of said day.

By order of the Congress, John Hancock,
President.

On July 12, 1775, John Adams wrote to his wife about the Continental Congress' decision to declare a Day of Public Humiliation, Fasting, and Prayer:

We have appointed a Continental fast. Millions will be upon their knees at once before their great Creator, imploring His forgiveness and blessing; His smiles on American Council and arms.

Farnsworth, Amos (June 17, 1775), was a corporal in the Massachusetts Militia during the Revolutionary War. Immediately after the Battle of Bunker Hill, he entered in his diary:

We within the entrenchment...having fired away all ammunition and having no reinforcements...were overpowered by numbers and obliged to leave....I did not leave the entrenchment until the enemy got in. I then retreated ten or fifteen rods.

Then I received a wound in my right arm, the ball going through a little below my elbow, breaking the little shellbone. Another ball struck my back, taking a piece of skin about as big as a penny.

But I got to Cambridge that night...Oh the goodness of God in preserving my life, although they fell on my right and on my left! O may this act of deliverance of thine, O God, lead me never to distrust thee; but may I ever trust in thee and put confidence in no arm of flesh!

Following a battle fought on one of the islands in Boston Harbor, Amos Farnsworth entered in his diary:

About fifteen of us squatted down in a ditch in the marsh and stood our ground. And there came a company of regulars on the other side of the river...and we had hot fire, until the regulars retreated.

But notwithstanding the bullets flew very thick, there was not a man of us killed. Surely God has a favor toward us...Thanks be unto God that so little hurt was done us, when the balls sang like bees round our heads.

Georgia Provincial Congress (July 4, 1775), stated:

The Congress being returned, a motion was made and seconded, that the thanks of this Congress be given to the Rev. Doctor Zubly, for the excellent Sermon he preached this day to the Members; which was unanimously agreed to.

Georgia Provincial Congress (July 5, 1775), in its request for a Day of Fasting and Prayer, stated:

A motion was made and seconded, that this Congress apply to his Excellency the Governour, by message, requesting him to appoint a day of Fasting and Prayer throughout this Province, on account of the disputes subsisting between America and the Parent State; which being unanimously passed in the affirmative.

Continental Congress (July 6, 1775), passed the Declaration of the Causes and Necessity for Taking Up Arms, composed by Thomas Jefferson, to explain to the British why militiamen from several Colonies began to gather near Boston:

But a reverence for our great Creator, principles of humanity, and the dictates of common sense, must convince all those who reflect upon the subject, that government was instituted to promote the welfare on mankind, and ought to be administered for the attainment of that end....

Our cause is just. Our union is perfect. Our internal resources are great, and if necessary, foreign assistance is undoubtedly attainable....

We gratefully acknowledge, as signal instances of the Divine favour towards us, that His Providence would not permit us to be called into this severe controversy, until we were grown up to our present strength, had been previously exercised in warlike operation, and possessed of the means of defending ourselves.

With hearts fortified with these animating reflections, we most solemnly, before God and the world, declare, that, exerting the utmost energy of those powers, which our beneficent Creator hath graciously bestowed upon us, the arms we have been compelled by our enemies to assume, we will, in defiance of every hazard, with unabating firmness and perseverance, employ for the preservation of our liberties; being with one mind resolved to die freemen rather than to live slaves....

With a humble confidence in the mercies of the Supreme and impartial Judge and Ruler of the Universe, we most devoutly implore His divine goodness to protect us happily through this great conflict, and to dispose our adversaries to reconciliation on reasonable terms, and thereby to relieve the empire from the calamities of civil war.

Georgia Provincial Congress (July 7, 1775), received from Savannah, the Provincial Governor's appointment of a Day of Fasting and Prayer:

Gentlemen: I have taken the opinion of His Majesty's Council relative to the request made by the gentlemen who have assembled together by the name of a Provincial Congress, and must premise, that I cannot consider that meeting as constitutional; but as the request is expressed in such loyal and dutiful terms, and the ends proposed being such as every good man must most ardently wish for, I will certainly appoint a day of Fasting and Prayer to be observed throughout this Province.

Jas. Wright.

Continental Congress (July 19, 1775), as recorded in the Journals of Congress, resolved:

Agreed, The Congress meet here to Morrow morning, at half after 9 o'clock, in order to attend divine service at Mr. Duche's' Church; and that in the afternoon they meet here to go from this place and attend divine service at Doctr Allison's church.

O'Connell, Daniel (August 6, 1775-May 15, 1847), was an Irish patriotic leader and member of the English Parliament, 1829-47. A famous orator, Daniel O'Connell was known as "The Liberator," as he was responsible for the Catholic Emancipation Act in England:

Nothing is politically right which is morally wrong.

Beecher, Lyman (October 12, 1775-January 10, 1863), was a renowned Presbyterian clergyman in New England. He preached in Boston and Cincinnati, where he later became President of Lane Theological Seminary. He was the father of both Henry Ward Beecher, one of the most eloquent preachers of his time, and Harriet Beecher Stowe, author of the book Uncle Tom's Cabin, which greatly precipitated the abolition of slavery.

In 1831, Lyman Beecher wrote in the newspaper, The Spirit of the Pilgrims:

The Government of God is the only government which will hold society, against depravity within and temptation without; and this it must do by the force of its own law written upon the heart.

This is that unity of the Spirit and that bond of peace which can alone perpetuate national purity and tranquility - that law of universal and impartial love by which alone nations can be kept back from ruin. There is no safety for republics but in self-government, under the influence of a holy heart, swayed by the government of God.

Commenting on the purpose of America, Lyman Beecher noted:

If this nation is, in the providence of God, destined to lead the way in the moral and political emancipation of the world, it is time she understood her high calling, and were harnessed for the work. For mighty causes, like floods from distant mountains, are rushing with accumulating power to their consummation of good or evil, and soon our character and destiny will be stereotyped forever.

As quoted in McGuffey's Eclectic Sixth Reader, 1907, Lyman Beecher stated:

We are called upon to cherish with high veneration and grateful recollections, the memory of our fathers....

Both the ties of nature and the dictates of policy demand this. And surely no nation had ever less occasion to be ashamed of its ancestry, or more occasion for the gratulation in that respect; for while most nations trace their origin to barbarians, the foundations of our nation were laid by civilized men, by Christians.

Many of them were men of distinguished families, of powerful talents, of great learning and of preeminent wisdom, of decision of character, and of most inflexible integrity. And yet not unfrequently they have been treated as if they had no virtues; while their sins and follies have been sedulously immortalized in satirical anecdote.

The influence of such treatment of our fathers is too manifest. It creates and lets loose upon their institutions the vandal spirit of innovation and overthrow; for after the memory of our fathers shall have been rendered contemptible, who will appreciate and sustain their institutions?

The memory of our fathers' should be the watchword of liberty throughout the land; for, imperfect as they were, the world before had not seen their like, nor will it soon, we fear, behold their like again.

Such models of moral excellence, such apostles of civil and religious liberty, such shades of the illustrious dead looking down upon their descendants with approbation or reproof, according as they follow or depart from the good way, constitute a censorship inferior only to the eye of God; and to ridicule them is national suicide.

The doctrines of our fathers have been represented as gloomy, superstitious, severe, irrational, and of a licentious tendency. But when other systems shall have produced a piety as devoted, a morality as pure, a patriotism as disinterested, and a state of society as happy, as have prevailed where their doctrines have been most prevalent, it may be in season to seek an answer to this objection.

The persecutions instituted by our fathers have been the occasion of ceaseless obloquy upon their fair fame. And truly, it was a fault of no ordinary magnitude, that sometimes they did persecute. But let him whose ancestors were not ten times more guilty, cast the first stone, and the ashes of our fathers will no more be disturbed.

Theirs was the fault of the age, and it will be easy to show that no class of men had, at that time, approximated so nearly to just apprehensions of religious liberty; and that it is to them that the world is now indebted for the more just and definite views which now prevail.

The superstition and bigotry of our fathers are themes on which some of their descendants, themselves far enough from superstition, if not from bigotry, have delighted to dwell.

But when we look abroad, and behold the condition of the world, compared with the condition of New England, we may justly exclaim, "Would to God that the ancestors of all the nations had been not only almost, but altogether such bigots as our fathers were."

Lyman Beecher wrote in his autobiography:

The enemy employs influential friends of Christ to wound one another, and to propagate distrust, alienation, and acrimony....

The strength of the Church depends upon our concentrated action....

Whatever, therefore, propagates suspicion and distrust among brethren who have long acted together, paralyzes their power....

Of this, the great enemy of the Church is perfectly aware, and has never failed, when the concentration of forces against him had become too formidable for direct resistance, to ease himself of his adversaries by dividing them.

Lyman Beecher commented concerning his life:

I was made for action. The Lord drove me, but I was ready. I have always been going at full speed...harnessed to the Chariot of Christ, whose wheels of fire have rolled onward, high and dreadful to His foes and glorious to His friends!

Liberty Tree Flag (1776), was adopted by the Massachusetts Council and became the original flag that the Sons of Liberty met under just before the Boston Tea Party. It derived its name from the elm tree in Hanover Square, Boston, where the patriots first met to protest the Stamp Act. The flag is a green tree on a white background, inscribed with the words Liberty Tree and:

Appeal to God.

Continental Congress (March 16, 1776), as recorded in the Journals of Congress, passed without dissent a resolution presented by General William Livingston declaring May 17, 1776, as a National Day of Humiliation, Fasting and Prayer:

The Congress...desirous...to have people of all ranks and degrees duly impressed with a solemn sense of God's superintending providence, and of their duty, devoutly to rely...on his aid and direction...

We do earnestly recommend Friday, the 17th day of May be observed by the colonies as a day of humiliation, fasting, and prayer; that we may, with united hearts, confess and bewail our manifold sins and transgressions, and, by sincere repentance and amendment of life, appease God's righteous displeasure, and, through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ, obtain this pardon and forgiveness.

Malden, Massachusetts, Instructions to Congress from (May 27, 1776), were given in response to the May 9th request by the Massachusetts House of Representatives for each town to give instructions to their representative on the matter of independence from Great Britain:

For these reasons, as well as many others which might be produced, we are confirmed in the opinion that the present age would be deficient in their duty to God, their posterity, and themselves, if they do not establish an American republic.

This is the only form of government which we wish to see established; for we can never be willingly subject to any other king than He who, being possessed of infinite wisdom, goodness and rectitude, is alone fit to possess unlimited power.

Continental Congress (July 1, 1776), heard John Adams declare his intentions to the delegates from the Thirteen Colonies:

Before God, I believe the hour has come. My judgement approves this measure, and my whole heart is in it. All that I have, and all that I am, and all that I hope in this life, I am now ready here to stake upon it. And I leave off as I began, that live or die, survive or perish, I am for the Declaration. It is my living sentiment, and by the blessing of God it shall be my dying sentiment. Independence now, and Independence for ever!

Continental Congress (July 2, 1776), approved the wording for the Declaration of Independence. On July 4, 1776, delegates of the Continental Congress voted to accept it. On July 8, 1776, the Declaration was read publicly for the first time outside of Independence Hall in Philadelphia, accompanied by the ringing of the Liberty Bell. On July 19, Congress ordered it engrossed in script on parchment and on August 2, 1776, the members of Congress signed the parchment copy.

On July 3, 1776, the day following the approval by Congress of the Declaration of Independence, John Adams wrote to his wife, Abigail:

I am apt to believe that it will be celebrated by succeeding generations as the great anniversary Festival. It ought to be commemorated, as the day of deliverance, by solemn acts of devotion to God Almighty.

As the parchment copy of the Declaration of Independence was being signed by the members of the Continental Congress, August 2, 1776, Samuel Adams declared:

We have this day restored the Sovereign to Whom all men ought to be obedient. He reigns in heaven and from the rising to the setting of the sun, let His kingdom come.

After each of the delegates had signed the Declaration of Independence Samuel Adams declared:

We have this day restored the Sovereign to Whom all men ought to be obedient. He reigns in heaven and from the rising to the setting of the sun, let His kingdom come.
Page 446

Continental Congress (July 3, 1776), recorded the statement of John Adams:

The second day of July, 1776, will be the most memorable epoch in the history of America, to be celebrated by succeeding generations as the great anniversary festival, commemorated as the day of deliverance by solemn acts of devotion to God Almighty from one end of the Continent to the other, from this time forward forevermore.

On July 3, 1776, the day after Congress approved the wording of the Declaration of Independence, John Adams wrote to his wife, Abigail:

I am apt to believe that it will be celebrated by succeeding generations as the great anniversary Festival. It ought to be commemorated, as the Day of Deliverance, by solemn acts of devotion to God Almighty. It ought to be solemnized with pomp and parade, with shows, games, sports, guns, bells, bonfires and illuminations, from one end of this continent to the other, from this time forward forever.

You will think me transported with enthusiasm, but I am not. I am well aware of the toil and blood and treasure that it will cost to maintain this Declaration, and support and defend these States. Yet through all the gloom I can see the rays of ravishing light and glory. I can see that the end is worth more than all the means; that posterity will triumph in that day's transaction, even though we [may regret] it, which I trust in God we shall not.

The 56 signers of the Declaration of Independence paid a tremendous price for our freedom: 5 were arrested by the British as traitors, 12 had their homes looted and burned by the enemy, 17 lost their fortunes, 2 lost sons in the Continental Army and 9 fought and died during the Revolutionary War.

Declaration of Independence (July 4, 1776), stated:

When in the Course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitles them...

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal. That they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty, and the Pursuit of Happiness...

We, Therefore, the Representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress, Assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions...

And for the support of this Declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our Lives, our Fortunes, and our sacred Honor.

Continental Congress (July 8, 1776), for the first time read the Declaration of Independence publicly, as the "Liberty Bell" was rung. Congress then established a three-man committee, consisting of Thomas Jefferson, John Adams and Benjamin Franklin, for the purpose of designing a great seal for the United States.

Benjamin Franklin's suggestions for a seal and motto, characterizing the spirit of this new nation, were:

Moses lifting up his wand, and dividing the red sea, and pharaoh in his chariot overwhelmed with the waters. This motto: "Rebellion to tyrants is obedience to God."

Thomas Jefferson proposed:

The children of Israel in the wilderness, led by a cloud by day, and a pillar of fire by night.

Continental Congress (July 9, 1776), on the day following the first public reading of the Declaration of Independence in Philadelphia and the ringing of the "Liberty Bell," moved to establish prayer as a daily part of this new nation:

Resolved, That the Rev. Mr. J. Duche' be appointed chaplain to Congress, and that he be desired to attend
every morning at 9 O'Clock.

On July 9, 1776, the Continental Congress authorized the Continental Army to provide chaplains for their troops to be paid the rate of pay for captains. On that same day, General George Washington, the Commander in Chief of the Continental Army, issued the order from his headquarters in New York to appoint chaplains to every regiment :

The Hon. Continental Congress having been pleased to allow a Chaplain to each Regiment, with the pay of Thirty-three Dollars and one third pr month -

The Colonels or commanding officers of each regiment are directed to procure Chaplains accordi ngly;
persons of good Characters and exemplary lives -

To see that all inferior officers and soldiers pay them a suitable respect and attend carefully upon religious exercises.

The blessing and protection of Heaven are at all times necessary but especially so in times of public distress and danger -

The General hopes and trusts, that every officer and man, will endeavour so to live, and act, as becomes a Christian Soldier, defending the dearest Rights and Liberties of his country.

The Hon. Continental Congress, impelled by the dictates of duty, policy and necessity, having been pleased to dissolve the Connection which subsisted between this Country, and Great Britain, and to declare the United Colonies of North America, free and independent States:

The several brigades are to be drawn up this evening on their respective Parades at six O' Clock, when the Declaration of Congress, shewing the grounds and reasons of this measure, is to be read with an audible voice.

The General hopes this important event will serve as a fresh incentive to every officer, and soldier, to act with Fidelity and Courage, as knowing that now the peace and safety of his Country depends (under God) solely on the success of our arms.

New Jersey Legislature (1777), issued instructions to the delegates from their State to the Continental Congress:

We hope you will habitually bear in mind that the success of the great cause in which the United States are engaged depends upon the favor and blessing of Almighty God; and therefore you will neglect nothing which is competent to the Assembly of the States for promoting piety and good morals among the people at large.

But especially we desire that you may give attention to this circumstances in the government of the army, taking care that such of the articles of war as forbid profaneness, riot, and debauchery be observed and enforced with al due strictness and severity.

This, we apprehend, is absolutely necessary for the encouragement and maintenance of good discipline, and will be the means of recruiting the army with men of credit and principle, - an object ardently to be wished, but not to be expected if the warmest friends of their country should be deterred from sending their sons and connections into the service, lest they should be tainted with impious and immoral notions and contract vicious habits.

Clay, Henry (April 12, 1777-June 29, 1852), was an American politician. He served as a U. S. Senator and Representative. He was elected Speaker of the House six times, and for nearly forty years was a leading American statesman. Clay was part of the "Great Triumvirate," with Daniel Webster and John Calhoun which dominated Congress during the early to mid-1800's. Known as The Great Compromiser, Clay was able to keep the Union between the North and the South together for many years. He was a Presidential Candidate several times but never elected.

In 1839, when he was about to give a speech in which he would declare himself against slavery, one of his friends warned him that this would ruin his chances to become President. To this, Henry Clay gave his reply:

I would rather be right than President.

In 1829, speaking to the Kentucky Colonization Society at Frankfort, Henry Clay proclaimed:

Eighteen hundred years have rolled away since the Son of God, our blessed Redeemer, offered Himself on Mount Calvary for the salvation of our species; and more than half of mankind still continue to deny His Divine mission and the truth of His sacred Word...

When we shall, as soon we must, be translated from this into another form of existence, is the hope presumptuous that we shall behold the common Father of the whites and blacks, the great Ruler of the Universe, cast his all-seeing eye upon civilized and regenerated Africa, its cultivated fields, its coasts studded with numerous cities, adorned with towering temples dedicated to the pure religion of his redeeming son?

In a conversation with Representative John C. Breckinridge, Henry Clay declared:

The vanity of the world, and its insufficiency to satisfy the soul of man, has been long a settled conviction of my mind. Man's inability to secure by his own merits the approbation of God, I feel to be true. I trust in the atonement of the Saviour of mercy, as the ground of my acceptance and of my hope of salvation.

Henry Clay stated:

That patriotism, which, catching its inspiration from the immortal God, animates and prompts to deeds of self-sacrifice, of valor, of devotion, and of death itself - that is public virtue, that is the sublimest of all public virtues.

In 1832, New York was gripped by an outbreak of Asiatic cholera. Henry Clay asked for a Joint Resolution of Congress to appoint a Committee to request the President to set a Day of:

Public humiliation, prayer and fasting to be observed by the people of the United States with religious solemnity.

In his speech introducing a resolution to the Senate, Henry Clay beseeched:

Think alone of our God, our country, our consciences, and our glorious Union - that Union without which we shall be torn into hostile fragments... [the bill's] fate is now committed to the Senate, and to those five or six votes to which I have referred....

It is possible that, for the chastisement of our sins and transgressions, the rod of Providence may be still applied to us, may be still suspended over us....

and I pray to Almighty God that it may not... lead to the most unhappy and disastrous consequences to our beloved country.

On January 29, 1850, Henry Clay, in his attempt to avert the coming national crisis, presented The Compromise of 1850. In his speech on the 5th and 6th of February, 1850, Henry Clay expressed:

I hope it will not be out of place to do here, what again and again I have done in my private chamber, to implore of Him who holds the destinies of nations and individuals in His hands, to bestow upon our country His blessing, to calm the violence and rage of party, to still passion, to allow reason once more to resume its empire.

And May I not ask of Him too, sir, to bestow on his humble servant, now before his, the blessing of his smiles, and of strength and ability to perform the work which now lies before him?...

Finally, Mr. President, and in conclusion, I implore, as the best blessing which Heaven can bestow upon me, upon earth, that if the direct event of the dissolution of this Union is to happen, I shall not survive to behold the sad and heart-rending spectacle.

Henry Clay confided with Representative Venable:

I am not afraid to die, sir; I have hope, faith, and some confidence; I have an abiding trust in the merits and mediation of our Saviour. The vanity of the world, and its insufficiency to satisfy the soul of man, has been long a settled conviction in my mind.

Man's inability to secure by his own merits the approbation of God, I feel to be true. I trust in the atonement of the Saviour of mercy, and the ground of my acceptance and of my hope of salvation.

Continental Congress (September 11, 1777), approved and recommended to the people that 20,000 copies of The Holy Bible be imported from sources other than England. This was in response to the shortage of Bibles in America caused by the Revolutionary War interrupting trade with the King's commissioned printers. The Chaplain of Congress, Patrick Allison, brought the matter to the attention of Congress, who assigned it to a special Congressional Committee, which reported:

The use of the Bible is so universal and its importance so great that your committee refers the above to the consideration of Congress, and if Congress shall not think it expedient to order the importation of types and paper, the Committee recommends that Congress will order the Committee of Commerce to import 20,000 Bibles from Holland, Scotland, or elsewhere, into the different parts of the States of the Union.

Whereupon it was resolved accordingly to direct said Committee of Commerce to import 20,000 copies of the Bible.

Continental Congress (November 1, 1777), issued a national Proclamation of Thanksgiving and Praise to all colonies, as a result of the victory at Saratoga:

Forasmuch as it is the indispensable duty of all men to adore the superintending Providence of Almighty God; to acknowledge with gratitude their obligation to Him for benefits received and to implore such further blessing as they stand in need of; and it having pleased Him in His abundant mercy not only to continue to us the innumerable bounties of His common Providence... to smile upon us as in the prosecution of a just and necessary war for the defense and establishment of our unalienable rights and liberties...

It is therefore recommended to the Legislative or executive powers of these United States, to set apart Thursday, the eighteenth day of December next, for the solemn thanksgiving and praise:

That with one heart and one voice the good people may express the grateful feelings of their hearts, and consecrate themselves to the service of their Divine Benefactor; and that together with their sincere acknowledgements and offerings, they may join the penitent confession of their manifold sins, whereby they had forfeited every favour, and their humble and earnest supplication that it may please God, through the merits of Jesus Christ, mercifully to forgive and blot them out of remembrance;

That it may please Him graciously to afford His blessings on the governments of these states respectively, and prosper the public council of the whole; to inspire our commanders both by land and sea, and all under them, with that wisdom and fortitude which may render them fit instruments, under the Providence of Almighty God, to secure for these United States, the greatest of all human blessings, independence and peace;

That it may please Him, to prosper the trade and manufactures of the people, and the labour of the husbandman, that our land may yet yield its increase; to take school and seminaries of education, so necessary for cultivating the principles of true liberty, virtue and piety, under His nurturing hand, and to prosper the means of religion for the promotion and enlargement of that kingdom which consisteth "in righteous, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost."

And it is further recommended, that servile labour, and such recreation as, though at other times innocent, may be unbecoming the purpose of this appointment, be omitted on so solemn an occasion.

Confederation, Articles of (November 15, 1777), proposed by the Continental Congress, constituted the government in America prior to the writing of the United States Constitution. It was signed July 9, 1778, and finally ratified by the states March 1, 1781:

Preamble. Whereas the delegates of the United States of America in Congress assembled did on the fifteenth day of November in the Year of Our Lord one thousand seven hundred and seventy seven, and in the second year of the independence of America agree on certain Articles of Confederation and perpetual union between the States...

Article I. The style of this confederation shall be "The United States of America."

Article II. Each state retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction and right, which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the united states, in Congress assembled.

Article III. The said states hereby severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other, for their common defense, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare, binding themselves to assist each other, against all force offered to, or attacks made upon them, or any of them, on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, or any other pretense....

And whereas it has pleased the Great Governor of the World to incline the hearts of the Legislatures we respectively represent in Congress, to approve of, and to authorize us to ratify the said Articles of Confederation and perpetual union.

In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands in Congress. Done at Philadelphia in the State of Pennsylvania the ninth day of July in the Year of Our Lord, 1778, and in the third year of the independence of America.

Key, Francis Scott (August 1, 1779-January 11, 1843), was an American lawyer and poet. He was on a diplomatic mission from Washington, D.C., to free a popular American doctor held captive aboard the British flagship in Chesapeake Bay. On the fateful night of September 14, 1814, the ship Francis Scott Key was aboard as commandeered by the British, and he was forced to watch as the British unmercifully bombarded the U.S. Fort McHenry. As the smoke of the night passed and the morning light dawned, Key saw "Old Glory" still waving. So inspired was he that he penned The Star Spangled Banner, later adding the music from the old hymn "To Anacreon in Heaven." Within weeks it was being sung all over the country, and on March 3, 1931, by official act of Congress (36 U.S.C. Sec. 170), it became the National Anthem of the United States. The fourth verse is as follows:

O! thus be it ever when free men shall stand
Between their loved home and the war's desolation;
Blest with vict'ry and peace, may the Heav'n-rescued land
Praise the Pow'r that hath made and preserved us a nation!
Then conquer we must, when our cause it is just;
And this be our motto, "In God is our trust!"
And the star spangled banner in triumph shall wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave!

As a poet, Frances Scott Key also expressed an unusual depth:

Praise for Pardonng Grace

Lord, with glowing heart I'd praise Thee
For the bliss Thy love bestows;
For the pardonng grace that saves me,
And the peace that from it flows.
Help, O God, my weak endeavor,
This dull soul to rapture raise;
Thou must light the flame, or never
Can my love be warmed to praise.

On February 22, 1812, to the Washington Society of Alexandria, Francis Scott Key stated:

The patriot who feels himself in the service of God, who acknowledges Him in all his ways, has the promise of Almighty direction, and will find His Word in his greatest darkness, 'a lantern to his feet and a lamp unto his paths'.... He will therefore seek to establish for his country in the eyes of the world, such a character as shall make her not unworthy of the name of a Christian nation.

Silliman, Benjamin (August 8, 1779-November 24, 1864), was an American physicist, chemist and geologist. He was a professor at Yale College, and in 1818, founded and edited the American Journal of Science and Arts. He also was an original member of the National Academy of Sciences in 1863. Benjamin Silliman published his research on the potential uses of crude oil in his respected Silliman Report, 1855, which was of significant importance in establishing the American oil industry. The mineral sillimanite, a form of aluminum silicate (Al_2SiO_5) is named for him. In 1807, Benjamin Silliman was the first in the United States to bottle and sell carbonated soda water.

Having been profoundly influenced by the faith of Yale President Timothy Dwight, Professor Benjamin Silliman wrote concerning the atmosphere on the Yale campus during Dwight's tenure, 1795-1817:

It would delight your heart to see how the trophies of the cross are multiplied in this institution. Yale College is a little temple: prayer and praise seem to be the delight of the greater part of the students.

Benjamin Silliman stated:

The relation of geology, as well as astronomy, to the Bible, when both are well understood, is that of perfect harmony. The Bible nowhere limits the age of the globe, while its chronology assigns a recent origin to the human race; and geology not only confirms that the Genesis presents a true statement of the progress of the terrestrial arrangements, and of the introduction of living beings in the order in which their fossil remains are found entombed in the strata.

The Word and the works of God cannot conflict, and the more they are studied the more perfect will their harmony appear.

On June 13, 1855, he concluded his course of college lectures with the prayer:

Thus, O Almighty God, hast Thou led me on in mercy almost to the close of a long life... For myself, in the evening of my life, may I be every day ready to die, trusting in Thy mercy through the Redeemer of men; and if power and opportunity to be useful are still continued to me, may I have a disposition, as well as ability, to honor Thee, and to benefit my fellow men.

For my salvation I depend entirely upon the Redeemer. In the sight of God I have no merits of my own, and feel deeply that if I am saved it will be of grace and not of works. I have none to offer that are worthy of Thine acceptance. And now, my Heavenly Father, I implore Thy blessing upon my dear children and their children, and upon the faithful and devoted companion whom Thou hast in mercy given me.

I implore it, also, for the precious youth who are about to go into the world. Bless them all in time and eternity through Christ our Lord and Redeemer.

Story, Joseph (September 18, 1779-September 10, 1845), was a Justice on the U. S. Supreme Court, appointed in 1811 by President James Madison ("The Chief Architect of the Constitution"). He was the youngest person ever to serve in that position and continued on the bench for 34 years, until his death. He had been a U.S. Representative, 1808-09, and son of one of the Boston Tea Party "Indians." He was instrumental in establishing federal supremacy in Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1816; and in establishing the illegality of the slave trade in the Amistad case.

The founder of Harvard Law School, 1821-45, Joseph Story wrote tremendously influential works, including: Bailments, 1832; Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, 1833; Equity Jurisprudence, 1836; and A Familiar Exposition of the Constitution of the United States, 1840.

In 1829, Justice Joseph Story explained in a speech at Harvard:

There never has been a period of history, in which the Common Law did not recognize Christianity as lying at its foundation.

In his work, A Familiar Exposition of the Constitution of the United States, 1840, Justice Joseph Story, stated:

We are not to attribute this prohibition of a national religious establishment [First Amendment] to an indifference to religion in general, and especially to Christianity (which none could hold in more reverence than the framers of the Constitution)....

Probably, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and of the Amendment to it now under consideration, the general, if not the universal, sentiment in America was, that Christianity ought to receive encouragement from the State so far as was not incompatible with the private rights of conscience and the freedom of religious worship.

An attempt to level all religions, and to make it a matter of state policy to hold all in utter indifference, would have created universal disapprobation, if not universal indignation.

But the duty of supporting religion, and especially the Christian religion, is very different from the right to force the consciences of other men or to punish them for worshipping God in the manner which they believe their accountability to Him requires... The rights of conscience are, indeed, beyond the just reach of any human power. They are given by God, and cannot be encroached upon by human authority without a criminal disobedience of the precepts of natural as well as of revealed religion.

The real object of the First Amendment was not to countenance, much less to advance Mohammedanism, or Judaism, or infidelity, by prostrating Christianity, but to exclude all rivalry among Christian sects and to prevent any national ecclesiastical establishment which should give to a hierarchy the exclusive patronage of the national government.

In 1833, in his Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, Justice Joseph Story stated:

It yet remains a problem to be solved in human affairs, whether any free government can be permanent, where the public worship of God, and the support of religion, constitute no part of the policy or duty of the state in any assignable shape.

The first and fundamental rule in the interpretation of all instruments is to construe them according to the sense of the terms and the intentions of the parties.

The whole power over the subject of religion is left exclusively to the State governments, to be acted upon according to their justice and the State Constitutions.

In the 1844 case of Vidal v. Girard's Executors, Justice Joseph Story delivered the U.S. Supreme Court's unanimous opinion:

Christianity... is not to be maliciously and openly reviled and blasphemed against, to the annoyance of believers or the injury of the public....

It is unnecessary for us, however, to consider the establishment of a school or college, for the propagation of... Deism, or any other form of infidelity. Such a case is not to be presumed to exist in a Christian country....

Why may not laymen instruct in the general principles of Christianity as well as ecclesiastics.... And we cannot overlook the blessings, which such [lay]men by their conduct, as well as their instructions, may, nay must, impart to their youthful pupils.

Why may not the Bible, and especially the New Testament, without note or comment, be read and taught as a Divine Revelation in the [school] - its general precepts expounded, its evidences explained and its glorious principles of morality inculcated?

What is there to prevent a work, not sectarian, upon the general evidences of Christianity, from being read and taught in the college by lay teachers? It may well be asked, what is there in all this, which is positively enjoined, inconsistent with the spirit or truths of the religion of Christ? Are not these truths all taught by Christianity, although it teaches much more?

Where can the purest principles of morality be learned so clearly or so perfectly as from the New Testament?

Justice Joseph Story insured:

There is not a truth to be gathered from history more certain, or more momentous, than this: that civil liberty cannot long be separated from religious liberty without danger, and ultimately without destruction to both.

Wherever religious liberty exists, it will, first or last, bring in and establish political liberty.

Continental Congress (October 18, 1780), issued a Proclamation for a Day of Public Thanksgiving and Prayer. This came after the revealing and subsequent deliverance from Benedict Arnold's plot to betray General George Washington and his troops to the British:

American Quotations.txt

Whereas it hath pleased Almighty God, the Father of all mercies, amidst the vicissitudes and calamities of war, to bestow blessings on the people of these states, which call for their devout and thankful acknowledgements, more especially in the late remarkable interposition of his watchful providence, in the rescuing the person of our Commander-in-Chief and the army from imminent dangers, at the moment when treason was ripened for execution....

It is therefore recommended to the several states... a day of public thanksgiving and prayer, that all the people may assemble on that day to celebrate the praises of our Divine Benefactor; to confess our unworthiness of the least of his favours, and to offer our fervent supplications to the God of all grace... to cause the knowledge of Christianity to spread over all the earth.

Gibson, John Bannister (November 8, 1780-May 3, 1853), was a jurist and the Chief Justice of Pennsylvania and jurist. He stated:

Give Christianity a common law trial; submit the evidence pro and con to an impartial jury under the direction of a competent court, and the verdict will assuredly be in its favor.

Confederation, Congress of the (March 1, 1781), formally began operating under the Articles of Confederation, as the thirteenth state, Maryland, finally granted ratification. The Articles of Confederation, which were proposed in the Continental Congress, November 15, 1777; and signed July 9, 1778; constituted the government in America prior to the writing of the United States Constitution, 1787:

Preamble. Whereas the delegates of the United States of America in Congress assembled did on the fifteenth day of November in the Year of Our Lord one thousand seven hundred and seventy seven, and in the second year of the independence of America agree on certain Articles of Confederation and perpetual union between the States...

Article I. The style of this confederation shall be "The United States of America."

Article II. Each state retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction and right, which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the united states, in Congress assembled.

Article III. The said states hereby severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other, for their common defense, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare, binding themselves to assist each other, against all force offered to, or attacks made upon them, or any of them, on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, or any other pretense....

And whereas it has pleased the Great Governor of the World to incline the hearts of the Legislatures we respectively represent in Congress, to approve of, and to authorize us to ratify the said Articles of Confederation and perpetual union.

In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands in Congress. Done at Philadelphia in the State of Pennsylvania the ninth day of July in the Year of Our Lord, 1778, and in the third year of the independence of America.

Berrien, John MacPherson (August 23, 1781-January 1, 1856), was a U.S. Senator, 1824-29, 1841-52; served in the War of 1812; was a Georgia State Senator, 1822-23; and was attorney general under President Jackson, 1829-31. He stated:

I have an abiding confidence that the God of our fathers will be the God of their children - that He will be our God; that He will graciously enable us to preserve that glorious fabric, which His mercy and His goodness, not the might of and strength of our ancestors, enabled them to construct; and that countless generations, enjoying the rich heritage which they have transmitted to us, and which, by His blessing, we will transmit to them, will in distant ages unite in the tribute of gratitude to their memories, which, in this our day, is our privilege to offer.

Brewster, Sir David (December 11, 1781-February 10, 1868), was a Scottish physicist. In 1817, he patented his invention of the kaleidoscope. He founded the science of optical mineralogy, involving light polarization, and was a founder and President of the British Association for the Advancement of Science. Sir David Brewster stated:

I shall see Jesus, and that will be grand!... Oh, is it not sad that all are not contented with the beautiful simple plan of salvation - Jesus Christ only - who has done so much for us.

"Notwithstanding his talents!" That disgusts me: merit for a man to bow his intellect to the Cross! Why, what can the highest intellect on earth do but to bow to God's Word and God's mind thankfully?

When I find a doctrine plainly stated in the Bible, that is enough, God knows. I can depend on God's Word. We should not expect in this world to be free from things obscure to us, and beyond our ability to explain....

To believe in the Lord Jesus Christ is to live; I trust Him and enjoy His peace.

Webster, Daniel (January 18, 1782-October 24, 1852), was an American politician and diplomat. His political career spanned almost four decades. Considered one of the greatest orators in American history, he served as Secretary of State for President William Henry Harrison, President John Tyler and President Millard Fillmore; was elected U.S. Senator, 1827; elected U.S. Representative, 1822; practiced law in Boston, 1816; elected U.S. Representative, 1812; admitted to the bar, 1805; and graduated from Dartmouth College, 1801. By a resolution of the Senate, Daniel Webster was esteemed as one of the five greatest senators in U.S. history.

Daniel Webster stated:

If there is anything in my thoughts or style to commend, the credit is due to my parents for instilling in me an early love of the Scriptures. If we abide by the principles taught in the Bible, our country will go on prospering and to prosper;

If we and our posterity shall be true to the Christian religion, if we and they shall live always in the fear of God and shall respect His Commandments... we may have the highest hopes of the future fortunes of our country;...

But if we and our posterity neglect religious instruction and authority; violate the rules of eternal justice, trifle with the injunctions of morality, and recklessly destroy the political constitution which holds us together, no man can tell how sudden a catastrophe may overwhelm us and bury all our glory in profound obscurity.

On December 22, 1820, in speaking at the Bicentennial Celebration of the Landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth Rock, Massachusetts, Daniel Webster declared:

Lastly, our ancestors established their system of government on morality and religious sentiment. Moral habits, they believed, cannot safely be trusted on any other foundation than religious principle, nor any government be secure which is not supported by moral habits... Whatever makes men good Christians, makes them good citizens.

Cultivated mind was to act on uncultivated nature; and more than all, a government and a country were to commence, with the very first foundations laid under the divine light of the Christian religion. Happy auspices of a happy futurity! Who would wish that his country's existence had otherwise begun?

Finally, let us not forget the religious character of our origin. Our fathers were brought hither by their high veneration for the Christian religion. They journeyed by its light, and labored in its hope. They sought to incorporate its principles with the elements of their society, and to diffuse its influence through all their institutions, civil, political, or literary.

Let us cherish these sentiments, and extend this influence still more widely; in full conviction that is the happiest society which partakes in the highest degree of the mild and peaceful spirit of Christianity.

[Plymouth is] the spot where the first scene of our history was laid; where the hearth and altars of new England were placed, where Christianity, and civilization, and letters made their first lodgement, in a vast extent of country.

On June 17, 1825, fifty years after the battle, the cornerstone for the Bunker Hill Monument was laid. As the guest speaker, Daniel Webster spoke to a crowd of twenty thousand people, including General Marquis de Lafayette and 200 Revolutionary War veterans:

We wish that this column, rising towards heaven among the pointed spires of so many temples dedicated to God, may contribute also to produce in all minds a pious feeling of dependence and gratitude.

Let us thank God that we live in an age when something has influence besides the bayonet.... Let our object be our country, our whole country, and nothing but our country. And by the blessing of God may that country itself become a vast and splendid monument, not of oppression and terror, but of Wisdom, of Peace, and of Liberty, upon which the world may gaze with admiration, forever.

All is peace; and God has granted you this sight of your country's happiness ere you slumber in the grave forever.

He has allowed you to behold and to partake the reward of your patriotic toils; and He has allowed to us, your sons and countrymen, to meet you here, and in the name of the present generation, in the name of your country, in the name of liberty to thank you!

On August 2, 1826, in a discourse commemorating Adams and Jefferson at Faneuil Hall, Boston, Daniel Webster declared:

It is my living sentiment, and by the blessing of God it shall be my dying sentiment - Independence now and Independence forever.

Daniel Webster delivered these words in his second speech on Foote's Resolution, January 26, 1830:

When my eyes shall be turned to behold for the last time the sun in heaven, may I not see him shining on the broken and dishonored fragments of a once glorious Union; on States dissevered, discordant, belligerent; on a land rent with civil feuds, or drenched, it may be, in fraternal blood.

Behold the gorgeous ensign of the Republic, now known and honored throughout the earth, still full high advanced, its arms and trophies streaming in their original luster, not a stripe erased or polluted, nor a single star obscured.... [The motto is not] "Liberty first and Union afterwards," but everywhere, spread all over in characters of living light, blazing on all its ample folds, as they float over the sea and over the land, and in every wind under the whole heavens, that other sentiment, dear to every true American heart - Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable!

On April 6, 1830, in presenting argument on the murder of Captain White, Daniel Webster spoke:

A sense of duty pursues us ever. It is omnipresent, like the Deity. If we take to ourselves the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, duty performed or duty violated is still with us, for our happiness or our misery. If we say the darkness shall cover us, in the darkness as in the light our obligations are yet with us.

In a speech on June 3, 1834, Daniel Webster exclaimed:

God grants liberty only to those who love it, and are always ready to guard and defend it.

In 1837, speaking on the Constitution, Daniel Webster gave an appeal for the Union:

I regard it as the work of the purest patriots and wisest statesmen that ever existed, aided by the smiles of a benignant Providence; for when we regard it as a system of government growing out of the discordant opinions and conflicting interests of thirteen independent States, it almost appears a Divine interposition in our behalf....

The hand that destroys the Constitution rends our Union asunder forever.

On June 17, 1843, Daniel Webster spoke of the founding father's regard for the Bible in an address celebrating the completion of the Bunker Hill Monument, Charleston, Massachusetts:

The Bible came with them. And it is not to be doubted, that to free and universal reading of the Bible, in that age, men were much indebted for right views of civil liberty.

The Bible is a book of faith, and a book of doctrine, and a book of morals, and a book of religion, of special revelation from God; but it is also a book which teaches man his own individual responsibility, his own dignity, and his equality with his fellow-man.

And let us remember that it is only religion, and morals, and knowledge, that can make men respectable and happy, under any form of government.

Thank God! I - I also - am an American!

Daniel Webster stated:

If religious books are not widely circulated among the masses in this country, I do not know what is going to become of us as a nation. If truth be not diffused, error will be;

If God and His Word are not known and received, the devil and his works will gain the ascendancy; If the evangelical volume does not reach every hamlet, the pages of a corrupt and licentious literature will;

If the power of the Gospel is not felt throughout the length and breadth of the land, anarchy and misrule, degradation and misery, corruption and darkness will reign without mitigation or end.... The thought is one to cause solemn reflection on the part of every patriot and Christian.

If we work on marble, it will perish; if on brass, time will efface it; if we rear up temples, they will crumble into dust; but if we work upon immortal minds and imbue them with principles, with the just fear of God and the love of our fellow men, we engrave on those tablets something that will brighten to all eternity.

The Lord's Day is the day on which the Gospel is preached... and although we live in a reading age and in a reading community, yet the preaching of the Gospel is the human agency which has been and still is most efficaciously employed for the spiritual good of men. That the poor had the Gospel preached to them was an evidence of His mission which the Author of Christianity Himself proclaimed.

I believe that the Bible is to be understood and received in the plain and obvious meaning of its passages; for I cannot persuade myself that a book intended for the instruction and conversion of the whole world should cover its true meaning in any such mystery and doubt that none but critics and philosophers can discover it.

The Bible is our only safe guide. So long as we take it as our instructor for conduct and character, we will go on prospering in the future as in the past. But the moment we relegate it from our lives a catastrophe will come to us such as we have never known.

I shall stand by the Union, and by all who stand by it. I shall do justice to the whole country... in all I say, and act for the good of the whole country in all I do. I mean to stand upon the Constitution. I need no other platform. I shall know but one country. The ends I aim at shall be my country's, my God's, and Truth's. I was born an American; I will live an American; I shall die an American; and I intend to perform the duties incumbent upon me in that character to the end of my career.

Political and professional fame cannot last forever, but a conscience void of offence before God and man is an inheritance for eternity.

Religion, therefore, is a necessity, an indispensable element in any great human character. There is no living without it. Religion is the tie that connects man with his Creator, and holds him to his throne.

If that tie is sundered or broken, he floats away a worthless atom in the universe, its proper attractions all gone, its destiny thwarted, and its whole future nothing but darkness, desolation and death.

In 1820, in the Convention of Massachusetts, Daniel Webster stated:

I am clearly of opinion that we should not strike out of the Constitution all recognition of the Christian religion. I am desirous, in so solemn a transaction as the establishment of a Constitution, that should keep in it an expression of our respect and attachment to Christianity, - not, indeed, to any of its peculiar forms, but to its general principles.

In a discussion as he sat in a drawing room, Daniel Webster laid his hand on a copy of the Holy Scriptures and proclaimed:

This is the Book. I have read the Bible through many times, and now make it a practice to read it through once every year. - It is a book of all others for lawyers, as well as divines; and I pity the man who cannot find in it a rich supply of thought and of rules for conduct. It fits man for life - it prepares him for death.

My brother knew the importance of Bible truths. The Bible led him to prayer, and prayer was his communion with God. On the day he died he was engaged in an important cause in the courts then in session. But this cause, important as it was, did not keep him from his duty to God. He found time for prayer; for on his desk which he had just left was found a prayer written by him on that day, which for fervent piety, a devotedness to his heavenly Master, and for expressions of humility I think was never excelled.

In stating his convictions, Daniel Webster declared:

The Gospel is either true history, or it is a consummate fraud; it is either a reality or an imposition. Christ was what He professed to be, or He was an imposter. There is no other alternative.

His spotless life in His earnest enforcement of the truth - His suffering in its defense, forbid us to suppose that He was suffering an illusion of a heated brain. Every act of His pure and holy life shows that He was the author of truth, the advocate of truth, the earnest defender of truth, and the uncompromising sufferer for truth.

Now, considering the purity of His doctrines, the simplicity of His life, and the sublimity of His death, is it possible that he would have died for an illusion? In all His preaching the Saviour made no popular appeals; His discourses were always directed to the individual.

Christ and His apostles sought to impress upon every man the conviction that he must stand or fall alone - he must live for himself, and die for himself, and give up his account to the omniscient God as though he were the only dependent creature in the universe.

The Gospel leaves the individual sinner alone with himself and his God. To his own Master he stands or falls. He has nothing to hope from the aid and sympathy of associates.

The deluded advocates of new doctrines do not so preach. Christ and His apostles, had they been deceivers, would not so have preached. If clergymen in our days would return to the simplicity of the Gospel, and preach more to individuals and less to the crowd, there would not be so much complaint of the decline of true religion.

Many of the ministers of the present day take their text from St. Paul, and preach from the newspapers. When they do so, I prefer to enjoy my own thoughts rather than to listen.

I want my Pastor to come to me in the spirit of the Gospel, saying: "You are mortal! Your probation is brief; your work must be done speedily; you are immortal, too. You are hastening to the bar of God; the Judge standeth at the door." When I am thus admonished, I have no disposition to muse or to sleep.

In a speech, July 4, 1851, Daniel Webster expounded:

Let the religious element in man's nature be neglected, let him be influenced by no higher motives than low self-interest, and subjected to no stronger restraint than the limits of civil authority, and he becomes the creature of selfish passion or blind fanaticism.

On the other hand, the cultivation of the religious sentiment represses licentiousness...inspires respect for law and order, and gives strength to the whole social fabric, at the same time that it conducts the human soul upward to the Author of its being.

When asked the question "What is the greatest thought that ever passed through your mind?" Daniel Webster responded:

My accountability to God.

On October 10, 1852, just two weeks before he died, Mr. Webster dictated what he desired to be engraved as an epitaph upon his tomb:

"LORD, I BELIEVE; HELP THOU MINE UNBELIEF."

Philosophical argument, especially that drawn from the vastness of the Universe in comparison with the apparent insignificance of this globe, has sometimes shaken my reason for the faith which is in me; but my heart has always assured and reassured me that the Gospel of Jesus Christ must be a Divine Reality. The Sermon on the Mount can not be a merely human production. This belief enters into the very depths of my conscience. The whole history of man proves it.

Daniel Webster

After executing his Last Will and Testament, Daniel Webster remarked:

I thank God for strength to perform a sensible act...And now unto God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, be praise for evermore. Peace on earth, and good will toward men. That is happiness - the essence - good will toward men.

On October 24, 1852, only a few hours before his death, Daniel Webster said slowly:

The great mystery is Jesus Christ - the Gospel. What would the condition of any of us be if we had not the hope of immortality?... Thank God, the Gospel of Jesus Christ brought life and immortality to light, rescued it - brought it to light.

Having begun to recite the Lord's Prayer, he said:

Hold me up; I do not wish to pray with a fainting voice. . . .

Daniel Webster's last coherent words were:

I still live.

In the Eulogy for Daniel Webster given in the U. S. Senate, Senator Lewis Cass stated:

And beyond all this he died in the faith of the Christian - humble, but hopeful - adding another to the long list of eminent men who have searched the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and have found it to be the word and the will of God.

Calhoun, John Caldwell (March 18, 1782-March 31, 1850), was U. S.
Representative and U. S. Senator from South Carolina. He was the Secretary of War under President James Monroe; Secretary of State under President John Tyler; and Vice-President under both Presidents John Quincy Adams and Andrew Jackson. He was a prominent supporter of "states rights," and in 1850, the year he died, he gave his last speech to the Senate regarding the Civil War that lay ahead:

The cords that bind the States together are not only many, but various in character. . . . The strongest of those of a spiritual and ecclesiastical nature, consisted in the unity of the great religious denominations, all of which originally embraced the whole Union. All these denominations, with the exception, perhaps, of the Catholics, were organized very much upon the principle of our political institutions.

Beginning with smaller meetings, corresponding with the political divisions of the country, their organization terminated in one great central assemblage, corresponding very much with the character of Congress. At these meetings the principal clergymen and lay members of the respective denominations, from all parts of the Union, met to transact business relating to their common concerns.

It was not confined to what appertained to the doctrines and discipline of the respective denominations, but extended to plans for disseminating the Bible, establishing missions, distributing tracts, and of establishing presses for the publications of tracts, newspapers, and periodicals, with a view of diffusing religious information, and for the support of their respective doctrines and creeds.

All this combined contributed greatly to strengthen the bonds of the Union. The ties which held each denomination together formed a strong cord to hold the whole Union together; but, powerful as they were, they have not been able to resist the explosive effect of slavery agitation. . . .

Confederation, Congress of the (September 10, 1782), in response to the need for Bibles which again arose, granted approval to print "a neat edition of the Holy Scriptures for the use of schools." The printing was contracted to Robert Aitken of Philadelphia, a bookseller and the publisher of The Pennsylvania Magazine, who had previously petitioned Congress on January 21, 1781. This edition has come to be known as the Bible of the Revolution. The following Endorsement of Congress was printed on its front page.

Whereupon, Resolved, That the United States in Congress assembled... recommend this edition of the Bible to the inhabitants of the United States, and hereby authorize [Robert Aitken] to publish this recommendation in the manner he shall think proper.

Cass, Lewis (October 9, 1782-June 17, 1866), was an American soldier, lawyer, politician and diplomat. After serving in the War of 1812, he became the Governor-General of the Territory of Michigan, where he made treaties with the Indians, organized townships and built roads. He was a U.S. Senator, 1845-48, 1849-57; Secretary of State under President James Buchanan, 1857-60; and the Democratic candidate for the Presidency in 1848. Lewis Cass stated:

Independent of its connection with human destiny hereafter, the fate of republican government is indissolubly bound up with the fate of the Christian religion, and a people who reject its holy faith will find themselves the slaves of their own evil passions and of arbitrary power.

In a letter dated from Washington, 1846, Lewis Cass wrote:

God, in His providence, has given us a Book of His revealed will to be with us at the commencement of our career in this life and at its termination; and to accompany us during all chances and changes of this trying and fitful progress, to control the passions, to enlighten the judgment, to guide the conscience, to teach us what we ought to do here, and what we shall be hereafter.

On December 14, 1852, Lewis Cass gave the obituary address for Daniel Webster in the U.S. Senate:

And beyond all this he died in the faith of the Christian - humble, but hopeful - adding another to the long list of eminent men who have searched the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and have found it to be the word and the will of God.

"How are the mighty fallen!" we may yet exclaim, when reft of our great and wisest; but they fall to rise again from death to life, when such quickening faith in the mercy of God and in the sacrifice of the Redeemer comes to shed upon them its happy influence this side of the grave and beyond it.

President of the United States, 1837-41; Vice-President under Andrew Jackson, 1832-36; U. S. Minister to Great Britain, 1831-32; Secretary of State under Andrew Jackson, 1829-31; Governor of New York, 1828-29; U. S. Senator, 1821-28; Attorney General of New York, 1815-21; Regent of the University of New York, 1815; New York State Senator, 1812-15; appointed Surrogate of Columbia County, New York, 1808; married Hannah Hoes, 1807, and admitted to bar, 1803.

On Saturday, March 4, 1837, in his Inaugural Address, President Martin Van Buren stated:

So sensibly, fellow-citizens, do these circumstances press themselves upon me that I should not dare to enter upon my path of duty did I not look for the generous aid of those who will be associated with me in the various and coordinate branches of the Government; did I not repose with unwavering reliance on the patriotism, the intelligence, and the kindness of a people who never yet deserted a public servant honestly laboring in their cause; and above all, did I not permit myself humbly to hope for the sustaining of an ever-watchful and beneficent Providence. . . .

I only look to the gracious protection of that Divine Being whose strengthening support I humbly solicit, and whom I fervently pray to look down upon us all. May it be among the dispensations of His Providence to bless our beloved country with honors and length of days; may her ways be pleasantness, and all her paths peace!

On Monday, September 4, 1837, in a Special Session Message to Congress, President Martin Van Buren stated:

Banking has become a political topic of the highest interest. . . . I felt it due to the people to apprise them distinctly that in the event of my election I would not be able to cooperate in the reestablishment of a national bank. To these sentiments I have now only to add the expression of an increased conviction that the reestablishment of such a bank in any form, whilst it would not accomplish the beneficial purpose promised by its advocates, would impair the rightful supremacy of the popular will, injure the character and diminish the influence of our political system, and bring once more into existence a concentrated moneyed power, hostile to the spirit and threatening the permanency of our republican institutions. . . .

Surely banks are not more able than the Government to secure the money in their possession against accident, violence, or fraud. The assertion that they are so must assume that a vault in a bank is stronger than a vault in the Treasury, and that directors, cashiers, and clerks not selected by the Government nor under its control are more worthy of confidence than officers selected from the people and responsible to the Government - officers bound by official oaths and bonds for a faithful performance of their duties, and constantly subject to the supervision of Congress. . . .

The great agricultural interest has in many parts of the country suffered comparatively little, and, as if Providence intended to display the munificence of its goodness at the moment of our greatest need, and in direct contrast to the evils occasioned by the waywardness of man, we have been blessed throughout our extended territory....

We can only feel more deeply the responsibility of the respective trusts that have been confided to us, and under the pressure of difficulties unite in invoking the guidance and aid of the Supreme Ruler of Nations.

On December 5, 1837, in his First Annual Message to Congress, President Martin Van Buren stated:

We have reason to renew the expression of our devout gratitude to the Giver of All Good for His benign protection. Our country presents on every side the evidences of that continued favor under whose auspices it has gradually risen from a few feeble and dependent colonies to a prosperous and powerful confederacy.

On December 3, 1838, in his Second Annual Message to Congress, President Martin Van Buren stated:

These blessings, which evince the care and beneficence of Providence, call for our devout and fervent gratitude. We have not less reason to be grateful for other bounties bestowed by the same Munificent Hand, and more exclusively our own.

On Monday, December 2, 1839, in his Third Annual Message to Congress, President Martin Van Buren stated:

The ravages of fire and disease have painfully afflicted otherwise flourishing portions of our country, and serious embarrassments yet derange the trade of many of our cities. But notwithstanding these adverse circumstances, that general prosperity which has been heretofore so bountifully bestowed upon us by the Author of All Good still continues to call for our warmest gratitude. Especially have we reason to rejoice in the exuberant harvests which have lavishly recompensed well-directed industry and given to it that sure reward which is vainly sought in visionary speculations....

By ceasing to run in debt and applying the surplus of our crops and incomes to the discharge of existing obligations...we shall see our country soon recover from a temporary depression....

Fortunately for us at this moment, when the balance of trade is greatly against us and the difficulty of meeting it enhanced by the disturbed state of our money affairs, the bounties of Providence have come to relieve us from the consequences of past errors....Our surplus profits, the energy and industry of our population, and the wonderful advantages which Providence has bestowed upon our country...will in due time afford abundant means....

Abuses as we are now encountering...seek to perpetuate their power by means of the influence they have been permitted to acquire....To gain for the few an ascendancy over the many by securing to them a monopoly of the currency...to nourish, in preference to the manly virtues that give dignity to human nature, a craving desire for luxurious enjoyment and sudden wealth, which renders those who seek them dependent on those who supply them; to substitute for republican simplicity and economical habits a sickly appetite for effeminate indulgence and an imitation of that reckless extravagance.

On December 5, 1840, in his Fourth Annual Message to Congress, President Martin Van Buren stated:

Our devout gratitude is due to the Supreme Being for having graciously continued to our beloved country through the vicissitudes of another year the invaluable blessings of health, plenty, and peace.

In the autumn of 1860, Martin Van Buren joined the Dutch Reformed Church. During his last illness he made this confession:

The atonement of Jesus Christ is the only remedy and rest for my soul.

Heber, Reginald (April 21, 1783-April 3, 1826), was an English missionary and hymn writer. He was the first Anglican bishop sent to India, where he baptized the first Christian convert in East India. In 1827, Reginald Heber wrote the immortal words to the hymn, Holy, Holy, Holy:

Holy, Holy, Holy! Lord God Almighty!
Early in the morning our song shall rise to Thee:
Holy, Holy, Holy! Merciful and Mighty!
God in Three Persons, Blessed Trinity.

Massachusetts, Commonwealth (State) of (November 8, 1783), issued A Proclamation for a Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer, signed by Governor John Hancock, to celebrate the victorious conclusion of the Revolutionary War:

John Hancock, Esquire
Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts
A Proclamation for a Day of Thanksgiving:

Whereas... these United States are not only happily rescued from the Danger and Calamities to which they have been so long exposed, but their Freedom, Sovereignty and Independence ultimately acknowledged.

And whereas... the Interposition of Divine Providence in our Favor hath been most abundantly and most graciously manifested, and the Citizens of these United States have every Reason for Praise and Gratitude to the God of their salvation.

Impressed therefore with an exalted Sense of the Blessings by which we are surrounded, and of our entire Dependence on that Almighty Being from whose Goodness and Bounty they are derived;

I do by and with the Advice of the Council appoint Thursday the Eleventh Day of December next (the Day recommended by the Congress to all the States) to be religiously observed as a Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer, that all the People may then assemble to celebrate... that he hath been pleased to continue to us the Light of the Blessed Gospel;.... That we also offer up fervent Supplications... to cause pure Religion and Virtue to flourish... and to fill the World with his glory.

Greenleaf, Simon (December 5, 1783-October 6, 1853), was the Royall Professor of Law at Harvard. He succeeded Justice Joseph Story as the Dane Professor of Law. To the efforts of Story and Greenleaf is to be ascribed the rise of the Harvard Law School to its eminent position among the legal schools of the United States.

Greenleaf produced a work entitled: A Treatise On the Law of Evidence, still considered to be the greatest single authority on "evidence" in all the literature on legal procedure. Chief Justice Fuller of the U.S. Supreme Court described Greenleaf by saying, "He is the highest authority in our courts."

In correspondence with the American Bible Society, Cambridge, November 6, 1852, Simon Greenleaf wrote:

Of the Divine character of the Bible, I think no man who deals honestly with his own mind and heart can entertain a reasonable doubt. For myself, I must say, that having for many years made the evidences of Christianity the subject of close study, the result has been a firm and increasing conviction of the authenticity and plenary inspiration of the Bible. It is indeed the Word of God.

In his A Treatise on the Law of Evidence, Simon Greenleaf propounded:

If a close examination of the evidences of Christianity may be expected of one class of men more than another, it would seem incumbent upon lawyers who make the law of evidence one of our peculiar studies. Our profession leads us to explore the mazes of falsehood, to detect its artifices, to pierce its thickest veils, to follow and expose its sophistries, to compare the statements of different witnesses with severity, to discover truth and separate it from error.

The religion of Jesus Christ... not only solicits the grave attention of all, to whom its doctrines are presented, but it demands their cordial belief as a matter of vital concernment. These are no ordinary claims; and it seems hardly possible for a rational being to regard them with even a subdued interest; much less to treat them with mere indifference and contempt.

If not true, they are little else than the pretensions of a bold imposter... but if they are well founded and just they can be no less than the high requirements of heaven, addressed by the voice of God to the reason and understanding of man... such was the estimate taken of religion, even the religion of pagan Rome, by one of the greatest lawyers of antiquity, when he argued that it was either nothing at all or everything. Aut undique religionem tolle, aut usqueque que conserva.

In reference to the apostles, Greenleaf said:

They had every possible motive to review carefully the grounds of their faith, and the evidences of the great facts and truths which they asserted. . . . And their writings show them to have been men of vigorous understandings. If then, their testimony was not true, there was no possible motive for this fabrication.

In his work entitled Examination of the Testimony of the Four Evangelists by the Rules of Evidence Administered in Courts of Justice, with an Account of the Trial of Jesus, Simon Greenleaf stated:

The character they portrayed is perfect. It is the character of a sinless Being - One supremely wise and supremely good. . . .

The doctrines and precepts of Jesus are in strict accordance with the attributes of God, agreeable to the most exalted ideas which we can form of them, from reason or revelation. They are strictly adapted to the capacities of mankind, and yet are delivered with a simplicity wholly Divine. "He spake as never man spake." He spake with authority, yet addressed Himself to the reason and understanding of men, and He spake with wisdom which men could neither gainsay nor resist.

Confederation, Congress of the (January 14, 1784), ratified the peace treaty with Great Britain, which had been signed in Paris on September 3, 1783, thereby officially ending the Revolutionary War. The treaty began:

In the name of the Most Holy and Undivided Trinity. It having pleased the Divine Providence to dispose the hearts of the most serene and most potent Prince George the Third, by the Grace of God, King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, . . . and of the United States of America, to forget all past misunderstandings and differences. . . . Done at Paris, this third day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three.

Taylor, Zachary (November 24, 1784-July 9, 1850), was the 12th President of the United States, 1849-50, famed as a national military hero; Major General during Mexican War, 1846-48; fought General Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna at Buena Vista, 1847; fought at Monterrey, Resaca de la Palma, Palo Alto, Matamoros, 1846; commanded Army of Occupation on Mexican border, 1845; took command of Fort Jesup, 1844; commanded Department of Florida, 1838; Brigadier General in Seminole War, 1836-37, fighting in the Battle of Okeehobee, 1837; Colonel in the Black Hawk War, 1832; took command of Fort Crawford, 1832, Fort Snelling, 1829; established Fort Jesup in Louisiana, 1822; Major during War of 1812; defended Fort Harrison against Indians, 1812; and as a Captain, took charge of Fort Knox, 1811; married Margaret Mackall Smith, 1810; and commissioned a Lieutenant in the U. S. Army, 1808.

On February 14, 1849, a delegation of Ladies from Frankfurt, Kentucky, presented General Zachary Taylor with a beautifully bound Bible and a copy of the Constitution of the United States.

He sent a message acknowledging their kindness, which was printed in the Frankfort Commonwealth, February 21, 1849:

I accept with gratitude and pleasure your gift of this inestimable Volume. It was for the love of the truths of this great Book that our fathers abandoned their native shores for the wilderness. Animated by its lofty principles they toiled and suffered till the desert blossomed as a rose.

The same truths sustained them in their resolutions to become a free nation; and guided by the wisdom of this Book they founded a government under which we have grown from three millions to more than twenty millions of people, and from being but a stock on the borders of this Continent we have spread from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

I trust that their principles of liberty may extend, if without bloodshed, from the northern to the southern extremities of the Continent. If there were in that Book nothing but its great precept, "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them," and if that precept were obeyed, our government might extend over the whole Continent.

Accept...my sincere thanks for the kind manner in which you have discharged this duty; and expressing again my hearty gratitude to the ladies for their beautiful gift, I pray that health, peace, and prosperity may long be continued to them.

Refusing to be inaugurated on the Sabbath, Zachary Taylor was sworn into office the following day, Monday, March 5, 1849. In the close of his brief Inaugural Address, President Zachary Taylor stated:

In all disputes between conflicting governments it is our interest not less than our duty to remain strictly neutral, while our geographical position, the genius of our institutions and our people, the advancing spirit of civilization, and, above all, the dictates of religion direct us to the cultivation of peaceful and friendly relations with all other powers....

In conclusion I congratulate you, my fellow-citizens, upon the high state of prosperity to which the goodness of Divine Providence has conducted our common country. Let us invoke a continuance of the same protecting care which has led us from small beginnings to the eminence we this day occupy.

On Tuesday, July 3, 1849, President Zachary Taylor issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Prayer so people of all denominations could pray for the health of the nation, as an epidemic of cholera had begun to spread:

At a season when the providence of God has manifested itself in the visitation of a fearful pestilence which is spreading itself throughout the land, it is fitting that a people whose reliance has ever been in His protection should humble themselves before His throne, and, while acknowledging past transgressions, ask a continuance of the Divine mercy.

It is therefore earnestly recommended that the first Friday in August be observed throughout the United States as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer. All business will be sustained in the various branches of the public service on that day; and it is recommended to persons of all religious denominations to abstain as far as practical from secular occupations and to assemble in their respective places of public worship, to acknowledge the Infinite Goodness which has watched over our existence as a nation, and so long crowned us with manifold blessings, and to implore the Almighty in His own good time to stay the destroying hand which is now lifted up against us.

On Wednesday, July 4, 1849, in an address delivered at a Sabbath-school celebration in the city of Washington, President Zachary Taylor stated:

The only ground of hope for the continuance of our free institutions is in the proper moral and religious training of the children, that they may be prepared to discharge aright the duties of men and citizens.

On Tuesday, December 4, 1849, in his First Annual Message to Congress, President Zachary Taylor stated:

During the past year we have been blessed by a kind Providence with an abundance of the fruits of the earth, and although the destroying angel for a time visited extensive portions of our territory with the ravages of a dreadful pestilence, yet the Almighty has at length deigned to stay His hand and to restore the inestimable blessing of general health to a people who acknowledged His power, deprecated His wrath, and implored His merciful protection.

While enjoying the benefits of amicable intercourse with foreign nations, we have not been insensible to the distractions and wars which have prevailed in other quarters of the world. It is a proper theme of thanksgiving to Him who rules the destinies of nations that we have been able to maintain amidst all these contests an independent and neutral position toward all belligerent powers...

By holding the representative responsible only to the people, and exempting him from all other influences, we elevate the character of the constituent and quicken his sense of responsibility to his country. It is under these circumstances only that the elector can feel that in the choice of the lawmaker he is himself truly a component part of the sovereign power of the nation... With the strict observance of this rule and the other injunctions of the Constitution, with a sedulous inculcation of that respect and love for the Union of the States which our fathers cherished and enjoined upon their children, and with the aid of that overruling Providence which has so long and so kindly guarded our liberties and institutions, we may reasonably expect to transmit them, with their innumerable blessings, to the remotest posterity.

On July 9, 1850, after an illness of only 5 days, President Zachary Taylor, who had been a member of the Episcopalian Church, died. Millard Fillmore, who had been Vice-President under President Taylor, informed Congress, July 10, 1850:

I have to perform the melancholy duty of announcing to you that it has pleased Almighty God to remove from this life Zachary Taylor, late President of the United States. He deceased last evening at the hour of half-past 10 o'clock, in the midst of his family and surrounded by affectionate friends, calmly and in the full possession of all his faculties. Among his last words were these: - "I have always done my duty. I am ready to die. My only regret is for the friends I leave behind me."

Having announced to you, fellow-citizens, this most afflicting bereavement, and assuring you that it has penetrated no heart with deeper grief than mine, it remains for me to say that I propose this day at 12 o'clock, in the Hall of the House of Representatives, in the presence of both Houses of Congress, to take the oath prescribed by the Constitution, to enable me to enter on the execution of the office which this event has devolved on me.

On July 11, 1850, Secretary of War, George W. Crawford, issued General Orders No. 21, relaying President Millard Fillmore's instructions:

The following order of the President of the United States announces to the Army the lamented death of the illustrious General Zachary Taylor, late President of the United States. . . .

The officers of the Army, of the Navy, and Marine Corps will, as a manifestation of their respect for the exalted dead, and of their sense of the calamity the country has sustained by this afflicting dispensation of Providence, wear crape on the left arm and upon the hilt of the sword for six months.

On July 11, 1850, the U. S. Senate passed the Resolution:

Whereas it has pleased Divine Providence to remove from this life Zachary Taylor, late President of the United States, the Senate, sharing in the general sorrow which this melancholy event must produce, is desirous of manifesting its sensibility on this occasion.

On July 11, 1850, the House of Representatives passed the Resolution:

Whereas it has pleased Divine Providence to remove from this life Zachary Taylor, late President of the United States, the House of Representatives, sharing in the general sorrow which this melancholy event must produce, is desirous of manifesting its sensibility on the occasion.

On July 13, 1850, the Daily National Intelligencer printed the official arrangements for the funeral:

The religious services to be performed by the Rev. Dr. Pyne at the Executive Mansion, according to the usage of the Episcopal Church, in which church the deceased most usually worshiped.

In a Resolution of Condolence for Mrs. Margaret S. Taylor, the Senate and House of Representatives stated:

That the President of the United States be requested to transmit a copy of the proceedings of the United States on 10th instant in relation to the death of the late President of the United States to Mrs. Margaret S. Taylor, and to assure her of the profound respect of the two Houses of Congress for her person and character and of their sincere condolence on the late afflicting dispensation of Providence.

Connecticut, State of (1785-1786), enacted in the Legislature the arrangement for the sale of the Western Reserve Lands, which included a provision that there should be reserved in each township: 500 acres for the gospel, 500 acres for schools and 240 acres:

To be granted in fee simple to the first gospel minister who shall settle in such town.

Georgia, University of (January 27, 1785), was founded by Abraham Baldwin, a signer of the Constitution of the United States. Through his far-sighted efforts, Baldwin secured for the university 40,000 acres of land. His expertise in law and ministry was manifest in his writing of the Charter of the College of Georgia:

An act for the more full and complete establishment of a public seat of learning in this State.

When the minds of the people in general are viciously disposed and unprincipled, and their conduct disorderly, a free government will be attended with greater confusions and evils more horrid than the wild, uncultivated state of nature....

As it is the distinguishing happiness of free governments that civil order should be the result of choice and not of necessity, and the common wishes of the people become the laws of the land, their public prosperity and even existence very much depend upon suitably forming the minds and morals of their citizens....

It can only be happy when the public principles and opinions are properly directed, and their manners regulated.

This is an influence beyond the reach of laws and punishments, and can be claimed only by religion and education.

It should therefore be among the first objects of those who wish well to the national prosperity to encourage and support the principles of religion and morality, and early to place the youth under the forming hand of society, that by instruction they may be molded to the love of virtue and good order.

Sending them abroad to other countries for their education will not answer these purposes, is too humiliating an acknowledgement of the ignorance or inferiority of our own, and will always be the cause of so great foreign attachments that upon principles of policy it is inadmissible.

McLean, John (March 11, 1785-April 4, 1861), was a Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, 1829-61. He had served as a U.S. Representative from Ohio, 1813-16; a justice on the Supreme Court of Ohio, 1816-22; and the U.S. Postmaster General, 1823-29.

On November 4, 1852, in a letter from Chapel Wood, John McLean wrote to the American Bible Society:

No one can estimate or describe the salutary influence of the Bible. What would the world be without it? Compare the dark places of the earth, where the light of the Gospel has not penetrated, with those where it has been proclaimed and embraced in all its purity. Life and immortality are brought to light by the Scriptures.

Aside from Revelation, darkness rests upon the world and upon the future. There is no ray of light to shine upon our pathway; there is no star of hope. We begin our speculations as to our destiny in conjecture, and they end in uncertainty. We know not that there is a God, a heaven, or a hell, or any day of general account, when the wicked and the righteous shall be judged.

The Bible has shed a glorious light upon the world. It shows us that in the coming day we must answer for the deeds done in the body. It has opened us to a new and living way, so plainly marked out that no one can mistake it. The price paid for our redemption shows the value of our immortal souls.

Perry, Oliver Hazard (August 20, 1785-August 23, 1819), was a U.S. Navy Captain. He was the brother of Commodore Matthew C. Perry. In the War of 1812, Captain Oliver Hazard Perry was responsible for the victory over the British fleet on Lake Erie, September 10, 1813. The sailors on deck with him heard him say:

The prayers of my wife are answered.

He then dispatched a message to the Secretary of the Navy, saying:

It has pleased the Almighty to give the arms of the United States a signal victory over their enemies on this lake. The British squadron, consisting of two ships, two brigs, one schooner, and one sloop have this moment surrendered to the force of my command after a sharp conflict.

Cartwright, Peter (September 1, 1785-September 25, 1872), was a Methodist circuit-riding preacher. He was one of the most famous evangelists and planters of new churches in the West. Peter Cartwright preached nearly 15,000 sermons and baptized almost 10,000 converts. In 1824, he left Kentucky and Tennessee because of his disdain for slavery, and moved to Illinois, where he ran for Congress. He lost his bid for Congress in 1846 to Abraham Lincoln. In recalling his own conversion, Peter Cartwright shared:

I went with weeping multitudes and bowed before the preaching stand, and earnestly prayed for mercy. In the midst of a solemn struggle of soul, an impression was made upon my mind, as though a voice said to me:

"Thy sins are all forgiven thee."

New Hampshire, State of (October 21, 1785), issued this official proclamation of the State, signed by President (Governor) John Langdon of New Hampshire:

A Proclamation For A General Thanksgiving
THE munificent Father of Mercies, and Sovereign Disposer of Events, having been graciously pleased to relieve the UNITED STATES of AMERICA from the Calamities of a long and dangerous war:
through the whole course of which, he continued to smile on the Labours of our Husbandmen, thereby preventing Famine (the almost inseparable Companion of War) from entering our Borders; - eventually restored to us the blessings of Peace, on Terms advantageous and honourable:

And since the happy Period, when he silenced the Noise of contending Armies, has graciously smiled on the Labours of our Hands, caused the Earth to bring forth her increase in plentiful Harvests, and crowned the present Year with new and additional Marks of his unlimited Goodness:

It therefore becomes our indispensable Duty, not only to acknowledge, in general with the rest of Mankind, our dependence on the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, but as a People peculiarly favoured, to testify our Gratitude to the Author of all our Mercies, in the most solemn and public manner.

I DO therefore, agreeably to a Vote of the General Court, appointing Thursday the 24th Day of November next, to be observed and kept as a Day of GENERAL THANKSGIVING throughout this State, by and with the Advice of Council, issue this Proclamation, recommending to the religious Societies of every Denomination, to assemble on that Day, to celebrate the Praises of our divine Benefactor;

to acknowledge our own Unworthiness, confess our manifold Transgressions, implore his Forgiveness, and intreat the continuance of those Favours which he had been graciously pleased to bestow upon us;

that he would inspire our Rulers with Wisdom, prosper our Trade and Commerce, smile upon our Husbandry, bless our Seminaries of Learning, and spread the Gospel of his Grace over all the Earth.

And all servile Labour is forbidden on said Day.

Virginia, Statute of Religious Liberty of (January 16, 1786), stated:

Well aware that Almighty God hath created the mind free; that all attempts to influence it by temporal punishments or burdens, or by civil incapacitations, tend not only to beget habits of hypocrisy and meanness, and are a departure from the plan of the Holy

Author of our Religion, who, being Lord both of the body and mind, yet chose not to propagate it by coercion on either, as was in His almighty power to do:

Be it, therefore, enacted by the General Assembly, That no man shall be compelled to frequent or support any religious worship, place, or ministry, whatsoever, nor shall be enforced, restrained, molested, or burdened in his body or goods, nor shall otherwise suffer, on account of his religious opinions or belief; but that all men shall be free to profess and by argument to maintain their opinions in matters of religion, and that the same shall in no wise diminish, enlarge, or affect their civil capacities.

New Hampshire, State of (February 21, 1786), under President (Governor) John Langdon of New Hampshire, made an official Proclamation for a Day of Public Fasting and Prayer:

A Proclamation For A Day of Public FASTING and PRAYER Throughout this State [1786]:

Vain is the acknowledgement of a Supreme Ruler of the Universe, unless such acknowledgements influence our practice, and call forth those expressions of homage and adoration that are due to his character and providential government, agreeably to the light of nature, enforced by revelation, and countenanced by the practice of civilized nations, in humble and fervent application to the throne for needed mercies, and gratitude for favors received.

It having been the laudable practice of this State, at the opening of the Spring, to set apart a day for such denomination, to assemble together on said day, in their respective places of public worship;

that the citizens of this State may with one heart and voice, penitently confess their manifold sins and transgressions, and fervently implore the divine benediction, that a true spirit of repentance and humiliation may be poured out upon all orders and degrees of men, and a compleat and universal reformation take place:

that he who gave wisdom and fortitude in the scenes of battle, would give prudence and direction to extricate us from succeeding embarrassments, build up, support and establish this rising Empire;

particularly, that he would be pleased to bless the great Council of the United States of America, and direct their deliberations to the wise and best determinations, succeed our embassies at foreign Courts, bless our Allies, and national Benefactors:

that he would always be pleased, to keep this State under his most holy protection: that all in the legislature, executive and judicial departments, may be guided and supported by wisdom, integrity and firmness, that all the people through this State, and through the land, may be animated by a true estimation of their privileges, and taught to secure, by their patriotism and virtue, what they have acquired by their valour:

that a spirit of emulation, industry, economy and frugality, may be diffused abroad, and that we may all be disposed to lead quiet and peaceable lives, in all godliness and honesty:

that he would be graciously pleased to bless us in the seasons of the year, and cause the earth to yield her increase, prosper our husbandry, merchandise, navigation and fishery, and all the labour of our hands, and give us to hear the voice of health in our habitations, and enjoy plenty of our borders:

that unanimity, peace and harmony, may be promoted and continue, and a spirit of universal philanthropy pervade the land: that he would be pleased to smile upon the means of education, and bless every institution of useful knowledge;

and above all, that he would rain down righteousness upon the earth, revive religion, and spread abroad the knowledge of the true GOD, the Saviour of man, throughout the world.

And all servile labour and recreations are forbidden on said day.

Federalist Papers (1787-1788), were a series of articles explaining the need for, and urging the ratification of the United States Constitution by the individual State governments. These articles, which were published in New York newspapers, were written by Alexander Hamilton, James Madison and John Jay under the pen name of "Publius." Without the powerful arguments presented in The Federalist Papers, the Constitution most likely would not have been ratified.

Federalist No. 47: When the legislative and executive powers are united in the same person or body, there can be no liberty, because apprehensions may arise lest the same monarch or senate should enact tyrannical laws, to execute them in a tyrannical manner. Were the power of judging joined with the legislative, the life and liberty of the subject would then be the legislator. Were it joined to the executive power, the judge might behave with all the violence of an oppressor.

Federalist No. 51: (James Madison) But the great security against a gradual concentration of the several powers in the same department, consists in giving to those who administer each department, the necessary constitutional means, and personal motives, to resist encroachments of the others.

The provisions for defense must in this, as in all other cases, be made commensurate to the danger of attack.

Ambition must be made to counteract ambition. The interest of the man must be connected with the constitutional rights of the place.

It may be a reflection on human nature that such devices should be necessary to control the abuses of government.

But what is government itself but the greatest of all reflections on human nature?

If angels were to govern men, neither external or internal controls on government would be necessary.

In framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: you must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place oblige it to control itself.

A dependence on the people is, no doubt, the primary control on the government; but experience has taught mankind the necessity of auxiliary precautions.

In republican government, the legislative authority necessarily predominates.

Federalist No. 81: (Alexander Hamilton): In the first place, there is not a syllable in the plan under consideration which directly empowers the national courts to construe the laws according to the spirit of the Constitution.

Frelinghuysen, Theodore (1787-1862), was an American politician and educator. He served as U. S. Senator, 1829-35; chancellor of the University of New York, 1839-50, and president of Rutgers College, 1850-61. Theodore Frelinghuysen corresponded with Presidential candidate Henry Clay after Clay had narrowly failed to be elected:

Let us look away to the brighter and better prospects and surer hopes in the promise and consolations of the Gospel of our Saviour. I pray, my honored sir, that your heart may seek this blessed refuge, stable as the everlasting hills, and let this be the occasion to prompt an earnest, prayerful, and, the Lord grant it may be, a joyful search after the truth as it is in Christ Jesus.

While serving in the office of the President of the American Bible Society, 1846-61, Theodore Frelinghuysen wrote in a letter:

The Bible has done it sir! Seal up this one Volume and in a half century all these hopes would wither and these prospects perish forever. These sacred temples would crumble or become the receptacles of pollution and crime....

The influence of this sacred Volume alone can achieve it. Let it find its way into every cottage until the whole mass of our population shall yield to its elevating power; and under the benignant smiles of Him who delights to bless the Word, our government, the last hope of liberty, will rest on foundations against which the winds and waves shall beat in vain.

Willard, Emma (February 23, 1787-April 15, 1870), was an American educator and historian. She was a leader in the movement to provide higher education among women. Emma Willard was born in Berlin, Connecticut and began teaching at the age of sixteen. She was married to John Willard in 1809 and with his help she established a girl's boarding school and later a girl's seminary at Middleton, Vermont. The seminary was moved to New York and became the Emma Willard School. She wrote many successful books and later built a school for women in Athens, Greece.

In 1843, American historian Emma Willard wrote:

The government of the United States is acknowledged by the wise and good of other nations, to be the most free, impartial, and righteous government of the world; but all agree, that for such a government to be sustained for many years, the principles of truth and righteousness, taught in the Holy Scriptures, must be practiced. The rulers must govern in the fear of God, and the people obey the laws.

In commenting on the United States, Emma Willard stated:

In observing the United States, there is much to convince us, that an Almighty, Overruling Providence, designed from the first, to place here a great, united people.

In 1857, Emma Willard published a book for children entitled, Morals for the Young: or, Good Principles Instilling Wisdom. In it she stated:

My Dear Children and Youth: -

Since, then, wisdom teaches us to rate everything at its just value, it is wise to seek the favor and fear the frown of God, rather than to seek the favor, and fear the frown of men. . . .

Look upon a Savior's cross. . . ask pardon. . . and the Holy Spirit's guidance. . . receive the Christian's armor.

Constitutional Convention (May 14, 1787), began at the State House (Independence Hall) for the purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation and formulating the Constitution. George Washington, who had been unanimously elected as President of the Convention, rose during the Convention and admonished the delegates:

If to please the people, we offer what we ourselves disapprove, how can we afterward defend our work? Let us raise a standard to which the wise and the honest can repair; the event is in the Hand of God!

Constitutional Convention (June 28, 1787), Thursday, was embroiled in a debate over how each state was to be represented in the new government. The hostile feelings created by the smaller states being pitted against the larger states, was so bitter that some delegates actually left the Convention.

Benjamin Franklin, being the President (Governor) of Pennsylvania, hosted the rest of the 55 delegates attending the Convention. Being the senior member of the convention at 81 years of age, he commanded the respect of all present, and, as recorded in James Madison's detailed records, rose to speak in this moment of crisis:

Mr. President:

The small progress we have made after 4 or 5 weeks close attendance & continual reasonings with each other - our different sentiments on almost every question, several of the last producing as many noes as ayes, is methinks a melancholy proof of the imperfection of the Human Understanding.

We indeed seem to feel our own want of political wisdom, since we have been running about in search of it. We have gone back to ancient history for models of Government, and examined the different forms of those Republics which, having been formed with the seeds of their own dissolution, now no longer exist. And we have viewed Modern States all round Europe, but find none of their Constitutions suitable to our circumstances.

In this situation of this Assembly, groping as it were in the dark to find political truth, and scarce able to distinguish it when presented to us, how has it happened, Sir, that we have not hitherto once thought of humbly applying to the Father of lights to illuminate our understanding?

In the beginning of the Contest with G. Britain, when we were sensible of danger, we had daily prayer in this room for Divine protection. - Our prayers, Sir, were heard, & they were graciously answered. All of us who were engaged in the struggle must have observed frequent instances of a Superintending Providence in our favor.

To that kind Providence we owe this happy opportunity of consulting in peace on the means of establishing our future national felicity. And have we now forgotten that powerful Friend? or do we imagine we no longer need His assistance?

I have lived, Sir, a long time, and the longer I live, the more convincing proofs I see of this truth - that God Governs in the affairs of men. And if a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without His notice, is it probable that an empire can rise without His aid?

We have been assured, Sir, in the Sacred Writings, that "except the Lord build the House, they labor in vain that build it." I firmly believe this; and I also believe that without his concurring aid we shall succeed in this political building no better than the Builders of Babel: We shall be divided by our partial local interests; our projects will be confounded, and we ourselves shall become a reproach and byword down to future ages.

And what is worse, mankind may hereafter from this unfortunate instance, despair of establishing Governments by Human wisdom and leave it to chance, war and conquest.

I therefore beg leave to move - that henceforth prayers imploring the assistance of Heaven, and its blessing on our deliberations, be held in this Assembly every morning before we proceed to business, and that one or more of the clergy of this city be requested to officiate in that service.

The response of the convention to Dr. Benjamin Franklin's speech was reported by General Jonathan Dayton, the delegate from New Jersey and later Speaker of the House of Representatives, to William Steele:

American Quotations.txt

The Doctor sat down; and never did I behold a countenance at once so dignified and delighted as was that of Washington at the close of the address; nor were the members of the convention generally less affected. The words of the venerable Franklin fell upon our ears with a weight and authority, even greater than we may suppose an oracle to have had in a Roman senate!

Following Franklin's historical address, Roger Sherman of Connecticut seconded his motion. Edmund Jennings Randolph of Virginia moved:

That a sermon be preached at the request of the convention on the 4th of July, the anniversary of Independence; & thenceforward prayers be used in ye Convention every morning. [Dr. Franklin seconded this motion.]

The clergy of the city responded to this request and a profound change was effected in the convention, as noted by General Jonathan Dayton when they reconvened, July 2, 1787:

The three days of recess were spent in the manner advised by Doctor Franklin... We assembled again; and... every unfriendly feeling had been expelled, and a spirit of conciliation had been cultivated.

On July 4th, the entire Convention assembled in the Reformed Calvinistic Lutheran Church, according to the proposal by Edmund Jennings Randolph of Virginia, and heard a sermon by Rev. William Rogers. His prayer reflected the hearts of the delegates following Franklin's admonition:

We fervently recommend to the fatherly notice... our federal convention... Favor them, from day to day, with thy inspiring presence; be their wisdom and strength; enable them to devise such measures as may prove happy instruments in healing all divisions and prove the good of the great whole;... that the United States of America may form one example of a free and virtuous government...

May we... continue, under the influence of republican virtue, to partake of all the blessings of cultivated and Christian society.

The Reverend James Campbell exhorted the delegates to establish a:

Free and vigorous government.

On September 19, 1787, after the Constitutional Convention endorsed the final form of the Constitution, Ben Franklin went outside the hall in Philadelphia and was asked by a Mrs. Powell: "Well Doctor, what have we got, a republic or a monarchy?" Franklin replied:

A republic, if you can keep it.

On April 9, 1789, only nine days after the first Constitutional Congress convened with a quorum, the House of Representatives and the Senate approved having chaplains open every session with prayer, paying them a salary of $500 each.

Confederation, Congress of the (July 13, 1787), passed "An Ordinance for the Government of the Territory of the United States, North-West of the River Ohio," later shortened to the Northwest Ordinance. This Ordinance, recognized in The United States Code Annotated as one of America's four most significant government documents, was later introduced into Congress by Rufus King, a signer of the Constitution, received House approval, July 21, 1789; received Senate approval, August 4, 1789 and signed into law by President George Washington, August 7, 1789, during the same period the First Amendment was being formulated. In addition to prohibiting slavery within the territory, Article VI, it stated:

SECTION 13. And, for extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, which form the basis whereon these republics, their laws and constitutions are erected:

to fix and establish those principles as the basis of all laws, constitutions and governments, which forever hereafter shall be formed in the said territory:

to provide also for the establishment of states, and permanent government therein, and for their admission to a share in the federal councils in an equal footing with the original states, at as early a period as may be consistent with the general interest:

SECTION 14. It is hereby ordained and declared by the authority aforesaid, That the following articles shall be considered as articles of compact, between the original states and the people and states of the said territory, and forever remain unalienable, unless by common consent, to wit:

ARTICLE I. No person, demeaning himself in a peaceable and orderly manner, shall ever be molested on account of his mode of worship or religious sentiments in the said territory....

ARTICLE III. Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged.

Constitutional Convention (September 17, 1787), called for a vote on the new Constitution. Thirty-nine of the fifty-five delegates at the Constitutional Convention signed the Constitution. By June 21, 1788, nine of the states had ratified it, establishing the Constitution. All of the states had completed ratification by January 10, 1791.

Virtually all of the 55 writers and signers of the United States Constitution of 1787, were members of Christian denominations: 29 Episcopalians, 9 Presbyterians, 7 Congregationalists, 2 Lutherans, 2 Dutch Reformed, 2 Methodists, 2 Roman Catholics, 1 lapsed Quaker and sometimes Anglican, and 1 open Deist - Dr. Franklin who attended every kind of Christian worship, called for public prayer, and contributed to all denominations. United States of America, Constitution of the (September 17, 1787), states:

Preamble. We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

Article I, Section 7, Paragraph 2. If any bill shall not be returned by the President within ten Days (Sundays excepted)...

Done in Convention, by the unanimous consent of the States present, the seventeenth day of September, in the year of our LORD one thousand seven hundred and eighty seven.

The Oath of Office for both the U.S. Senators, usually administered by the Vice President, and the U.S. Representatives, administered by the Speaker of the House, states:

I, _____, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter: So help me God.

Delaware, State of (December 7, 1787), was the 1st State admitted to the Union. The Constitution of the State of Delaware, adopted 1776, stated:

Article XXII. Every person who shall be chosen a member of either house, or appointed to any office or place of trust...shall...make and subscribe the following declarati on, to wit: "I, _____, do profess faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ His only Son, and in the Holy Ghost, one God, blessed for evermore; I do acknowledge the holy scriptures of the Old and New Testaments to be given by divine inspiration." (until 1792)

The Constitution of the State of Delaware, adopted 1831, stated:

It is the duty of all men frequently to assemble together for the public worship of the Author of the Universe; and piety and morality, on which the prosperity of communities depends, are thereby promoted....

No power shall or ought to be invested in or assumed by any magistrate that shall in any case interfere with... the free exercise of religious, , worship.

The Constitution of the State of Delaware, adopted 1897, stated:

Preamble. Through Divine Goodness all men have, by nature, the rights of worshipping and serving their Creator according to the dictates of their consciences.

Article I, Section 1. It is the duty of all men frequently to assemble together for the public worship of Almighty God; and piety and morality, on which the prosperity of communities depends, are hereby promoted.

Pennsylvania, State of (December 12, 1787), was the 2nd State admitted to the Union. The Constitution of the State of Pennsylvania, adopted 1776, stated:

Preamble. We, the people of Pennsylvania, grateful to Almighty God for the blessings of civil and religious liberty, and humbly invoking His guidance, do ordain and establish this Constitution.

Frame of Government, Chapter 2, Section 10. And each member [of the legislature], before he takes his seat, shall make and subscribe the following declaration, viz: "I do believe in one God, the Creator and Governour of the Universe, the Rewarder of the good and Punisher of the wicked, and I do acknowledge the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be given by Divine Inspiration."

On March 1, 1780, the legislature of the State of Pennsylvania passed an Act abolishing slavery within the State. The Constitution of the State of Pennsylvania, adopted 1874, stated:

Preamble. We, the people of Pennsylvania, grateful to Almighty God for the blessings of civil and religious liberty, and humbly invoking His guidance, do ordain and establish this Constitution.

Article I, Section 3. All men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences.

New Jersey, State of (December 18, 1787), was the 3rd State admitted to the Union. The Constitution of the State of New Jersey, adopted 1776, stated:

Article XVIII. That no person shall ever, within this Colony, be deprived of the inestimable privilege of worshipping Almighty God in a manner agreeable to the dictates of his own conscience;

That there shall be no establishment of any one religious sect in this Province, in preference to another; and that no Protestant inhabitant of this Colony shall be denied the enjoyment of any civil right, merely on account of his religious principles;

That all persons, professing a belief in the faith of any Protestant sect, and who should demean himself peaceably under the government, should be capable of being elected unto any office of profit or trust, or of being a member of either branch of the Legislature.

On February 15, 1804, the legislature of the State of New Jersey passed an Act which abolished slavery within the State. The Constitution of the State of New Jersey, adopted 1844 and 1947, stated:

Preamble. We, the people of the State of New Jersey, grateful to Almighty God for the civil and religious liberty which He hath so long permitted us to enjoy, and looking to Him for a blessing upon our endeavors to secure and transmit the same unimpaired to succeeding generations, do ordain and establish this Constitution.

Article I, Section 3. No person shall be deprived of the inestimable privilege of worshipping Almighty God in a manner agreeable to the dictates of his own conscience.

Georgia, State of (January 2, 1788), was the 4th State admitted to the Union. The Constitution of the State of Georgia, adopted 1777, stated:

Preamble. We, the people of Georgia, relying upon protection and guidance of Almighty God, do ordain and establish this Constitution.

Article VI. All members of the Legislature shall be of the Protestant religion. . . . The representatives shall be chosen out of the residents in each county. . . and they shall be of the Protestant religion.

Article LVI. All persons whatever shall have the free exercise of their religion; provided it not be repugnant to the peace and safety of the State; and shall not, unless by consent, support any teacher or teachers except those of their own profession.

The Constitution of the State of Georgia, adopted 1798, stated:

Article IV, Section 10. No person within this State shall, upon any pretense, be deprived of the inestimable privilege of worshipping God. . . nor shall any person be denied the enjoyment of any civil right merely on account of his religious principles.

The Constitution of the State of Georgia, adopted 1945, stated:

Preamble. We, the people of Georgia, relying upon protection and guidance of Almighty God, do ordain and establish this Constitution.

Article I, Section 2-112. All men have the natural and inalienable right to worship God, each according to the dictates of his own conscience.

Connecticut, State of (January 9, 1788), was the 5th State admitted to the Union. The Constitution of the State of Connecticut, adopted 1776, stated:

The People of this State...by the Providence of God...hath the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves as a free, sovereign, and independent State...and forasmuch as the free fruition of such liberties and privileges as humanity, civility, and Christianity call for, as is due to every man in his place and proportion...hath ever been, and will be the tranquility and stability of Churches and Commonwealth; and the denial thereof, the disturbances, if not the ruin of both. (until 1818)

In October of 1777, the legislature of the State of Connecticut passed an Act abolishing slavery within the State. The Constitution of the State of Connecticut, adopted 1818, stated:

Preamble. The People of Connecticut, acknowledging with gratitude the good Providence of God in permitting them to enjoy a free government, do...establish this Constitution.

Article VII, Section 1. It being the duty of all men to worship the Supreme Being, the Great Creator and Preserver of the Universe, and their right to render that worship, in the mode most consistent with the dictates of their consciences...

And each and every society or denomination of Christians in this State shall have and enjoy the same and equal powers, rights, and privileges, and shall have power and authority to support and maintain the ministers or teachers of their respective denominations, and to build and repair houses for public worship, by a tax on the members of any such society only, to be laid by a major vote of the legal voters assembled at any society meeting, warned and held according to law, or in any other manner.

Massachusetts, State of (February 6, 1788), was the 6th State admitted to the Union. The Constitution of Massachusetts, adopted 1780, stated:

Preamble. We, therefore, the people of Massachusetts, acknowledging, with grateful hearts, the goodness of the great Legislator of the Universe, in affording us, in the course of His Providence, an opportunity, deliberately and peaceably, without fraud, violence, or surprise, of entering into an original, explicit, and solemn compact with each other; . . . and devoutly imploring His direction in so interesting a design.

The Governor shall be chosen annually; and no person shall be eligible to this office, unless, at the time of his election, . . . he shall declare himself to be of the Christian religion.

Chapter VI, Article I. Any person chosen governor, or lieutenant-governor, counsellor, senator, or representative, and accepting the trust, shall before he proceed to execute the duties of his place or office, take, make and subscribe the following declaration, viz. "I, _____, do declare, that I believe the Christian religion, and have firm persuasion of its truth."

Part I, Article II. It is the right, as well as the duty, of all men in society, publicly, and at stated seasons, to worship the Supreme Being, the Great Creator and Preserver of the Universe. And no subject shall be hurt, molested, or restrained, in his person, liberty, or estate, for worshipping God in the manner and seasons, most agreeable to the dictates of his own conscience, or for his religious profession of sentiments; provided he doth not disturb the public peace, or obstruct others in their religious worship.

Part I, Article III. As the happiness of a people and the good order and preservation of civil government essentially depend upon piety, religion, and morality; and as these cannot be generally diffused throughout a community but by the institution of the public worship of God and of public instructions, in piety, religion, and morality:

Therefore to promote their happiness and secure the good order and preservation of their government, the People of this Commonwealth have the right to invest their legislature with power to authorize and require, and the legislature shall from time to time authorize and require, the several towns, parishes, precincts, and other bodies-politic or religious societies, to make suitable provision, at their own expense, for the institution of the public worship of God and the support and maintenance of public Protestant teachers of piety, religion, and morality in all cases where such provision shall not be made voluntary.

And the people of this commonwealth have also a right to, and do, invest their legislature with authority to enjoin on all the subjects an attendance upon the instructions of the public teachers aforesaid at stated times and seasons, if there be any on whose instructions they can conscientiously attend. . . .

Because a frequent recurrence to the fundamental principles of the Constitution, and a constant adherence to those of piety, justice, moderation, temperance, industry, and frugality, are absolutely necessary to preserve the advantage of liberty and to maintain a free government, the people ought consequently to have a particular regard to all those principles in the choice of their officers and representatives;

And they have a right to require of their lawgivers and magistrates an exact and constant observance of them in the formation and execution of all laws necessary for the good of the commonwealth....

Any person chosen governor, lieutenant governor, counsellor, senator, or representative, and accepting the trust, shall subscribe a solemn profession that he believes in the Christian religion, and has a firm persuasion of its truth....

And every denomination of Christians, demeaning themselves peaceably and as good subjects of the commonwealth, shall be equally under the protection of the law; and no subordination of, any one sect or denomination shall ever be established by law. (until 1863)

On March 1, 1780, in the "Declarations of Rights," Article I, the legislature of the State of Massachusetts passed an Act abolishing slavery within the State. The Constitution of the State of Massachusetts, adopted 1919, stated:

Preamble. We, therefore, the people of Massachusetts, acknowledging, with grateful hearts, the goodness of the great Legislator of the Universe, in affording us, in the course of His providence... and devoutly imploring His direction in so interesting a design... establish this Constitution.

Declaration of Rights, Article II. It is the right as well as the duty of all men in society, publicly, and at stated seasons to worship the Supreme Being, the great Creator and Preserver of the Universe.

Declaration of Rights, Article III. As the public worship of God and instructions in piety, religion and morality, promote the happiness and prosperity of a people and the security of republican government.

Maryland, State of (April 28, 1788), was the 7th State admitted to the Union. The Constitution of the State of Maryland, adopted 1776, stated:

Preamble. We, the people of the state of Maryland, grateful to Almighty God for our civil and religious liberty.

Article XXXV. That no other test or qualification ought to be required, on admission to any office of trust or profit, than such oath of support and fidelity to this State and such oath of office, as shall be directed by this Convention, or the Legislature of this State, and a declaration of a belief in the Christian religion.

Article XXXVI. That the manner of administering an oath to any person, ought to be such, as those of the religious persuasion, profession, or denomination, of which such person is one, generally esteem to most effectual confirmation, by the attestation of the Divine Being.

Article XIX; XXXIII. That, as it is the duty of every man to worship God in such a manner as he thinks most acceptable to him; all persons, professing the Christian religion, are equally entitled to protection in their religious liberty; wherefore no person ought by any law to be molested in his person or estate on account of his religious persuasion or profession, or for his religious practice; unless under colour of religion, any man shall disturb the good order, peace or safety of the State or shall infringe the laws of morality...

yet the Legislature may, in their discretion, lay a general and equal tax, for the support of the Christian religion; leaving to each individual the power of appointing the payment over the money, collected from him, to the support of any particular place of worship or minister, or for the benefit of the poor or his own denomination, of the poor in general if any particular bounty;

but the churches, chapels, glebes, and all other property now belonging to the Church of England, ought to remain the Church of England forever. (until 1851)

The Constitution of the State of Maryland, adopted 1851, declared that no other test or qualification for admission to any office of trust or profit shall be required than the official oath and:

A declaration of belief in the Christian religion; and if the party shall profess to be a Jew the declaration shall be of his belief in a future state of rewards and punishments.

The Constitution of the State of Maryland, adopted 1864, required all State officers to make:

A declaration of belief in the Christian religion, or of the existence of God, and in a future state of rewards and punishments.

The Constitution of the State of Maryland, adopted 1867, stated:

Preamble. We, the people of the State of Maryland, grateful to Almighty God for our civil and religious liberty.

Article XXXVI. That as it is the duty of every man to worship God in such manner as he thinks most acceptable to Him, all persons are equally entitled to protection in their religious liberty.

Article XXXVI. That no religious test ought ever to be required as a qualification for any office of profit or trust in this state, other than a declaration of belief in the existence of God.

year Maryland was admitted to the Union. The State Seal pictured a farmer and a fisherman, reflecting the occupations of the early settlers; a shield with the coat of arms of the Calverts and the Crosslands (Alicia Crossland was the mother of the first Baron of Baltimore, George Calvert); and beneath the shield is the Latin motto:

Scuto Bonae Voluntatis Tuae Coronasti Nos (Thou hast crowned us with the shield of Thy good will - Psalms 5:12).

South Carolina, State of (May 23, 1788), was the 8th State admitted to the Union. The Constitution of the State of South Carolina, adopted 1778, stated:

Preamble. We, the people of the State of South Carolina...grateful to God for our liberties, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the preservation and perpetuation of the same.

Article III. [Privy Council and State officers to be] all of the Protestant religion.

Article XII...The qualifications of electors shall be that every...person, who acknowledges the being of a God, and believes in the future state of rewards and punishments...[is eligible to vote].

No person shall be eligible to sit in the house of representatives unless he be of the Protestant religion.

No person shall be eligible to a seat in the said senate unless he be of the Protestant religion.

Article XXXVIII. That all persons and religious societies, who acknowledge that there is one God, and a future state of rewards and punishments, and that God is publicly to be worshipped, shall be freely tolerated.

The Christian Protestant religion shall be deemed, and is hereby constituted and declared to be, the established religion, of this State.

That all denominations of Christian Protestants in this State, demeaning themselves peaceably and faithfully shall enjoy equal religious and civil privileges.

To accomplish this desirable purpose without injury to the religious property of those societies of Christians which are by law already incorporated for the purpose of religious worship, and to put it fully into the power of every other society of Christian Protestants, either already formed or hereafter to be formed, to obtain the like incorporation, it is hereby constituted, appointed, and declared that the respective societies of the Church of England, that are already formed in this State for the purpose of religious worship, shall continue incorporate and hold the religious property now in their possession.

And that whenever fifteen or more male persons not under twenty-one years of age, professing the Christian Protestant religion, and agreeing to unite themselves in a society for the purposes of religious worship, they shall (on complying with the terms hereinafter mentioned) be and be constituted a Church, and be esteemed and regarded in law as of the established religion of the State, and on a petition to the legislature shall be entitled to be incorporated and to enjoy equal privileges.

That every society of Christians so formed shall give themselves a name or denomination, by which they shall be called and known in law, and all that associated with them for the purpose of worship shall be esteemed as belonging to the society so called; but that previous to the establishment and incorporation of the respective societies of every denomination as aforesaid, and in order to entitle them thereto, each society so petitioning shall have agreed to and subscribed in a book the five following articles - without which no agreement or union of men upon pretence of religion, shall entitle them to be incorporated and esteemed as a church of the established religion in this State. (See Locke's Const., Arts. 97-100):

I. That there is one Eternal God, and a future state of rewards and punishments.

II. That God is publicly worshipped.

III. That the Christian religion is the true religion.

IV. That the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are of Divine inspiration, and are the rule of faith and practices

V. That it is lawful and the duty of every man being thereunto called by those that govern, to bear witness to truth. That every inhabitant of this State, when called to make an appeal to God as a witness to truth, shall be permitted to do it in that way which is most agreeable to the dictates of his own conscience. And that the people of this State may forever enjoy the right of electing their own pastors or clergy, and, at the same time, that the State may have sufficient security for the due discharge of the pastoral office by those who shall be admitted to be clergymen, no person shall officiate as minister of any established church who shall not have been chosen by a majority of the society to which he shall minister, or by persons appointed by the said majority to choose and procure a minister for them, nor until the minister so chosen and appointed shall have made and subscribed the following declaration, over and above the aforesaid five articles, viz.:

That he is determined, by God's grace, out of the Holy Scriptures, to instruct the people committed to his charge, and to teach nothing (as required of necessity to eternal salvation) but that which he shall be persuaded may be concluded and proved from the Scriptures; that he will use both public and private admonitions, as well to the sick as to the whole within his cure, as need shall require and occasion shall be given; and that he will be diligent in prayers, and in reading of the Holy Scriptures, and in such studies as help to the knowledge of the same; that he will be diligent to frame and fashion his own self and his family according to the doctrine of Christ, and to make both himself and them, as much as in him lieth, wholesome examples and patterns to the flock of Christ; that he will maintain and set forward, as much as he can, quietness, peace, and love among all the people, and especially among those who are or shall be committed to his charge.

No person shall disturb or molest any religious assembly, nor shall use any reproachful, railing, or abusive language against any Church, that being the certain way of disturbing the peace, and of hindering the conversion of any to the truth, by engaging them in quarrels and animosities, to the hatred of the professors, and that professions which otherwise they might be brought to assent to....

No person shall, by law, be obliged to pay toward the maintenance and support of a religious worship that he does not freely join in, or has not voluntarily engaged to support.

But the churches, chapels, parsonages, glebes, and all other property now belonging to any societies of the Church of England, or any other religious society, shall remain and be secured to them forever.

They should chose by ballot from among themselves, or from the people at large, a governor and commander-in-chief, a lieutenant-governor, and privy council, all of the Protestant religion; that no person should be eligible to a seat in the Senate unless he be of the Protestant religion; that no person should be eligible to sit in the House of Representatives unless he be of the Protestant religion.

The Constitution of the State of South Carolina, adopted 1790, stated:

Article VIII, Section I. The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship.... shall forever hereafter be allowed within this State... provided, that the liberty of conscience thereby declared shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace and safety of this State.

Article XXXVIII. That all persons and religious societies, who acknowledge that there is one God, and a future state of rewards and punishments, and that God is publicly to be worshipped, shall be freely tolerated....

That all denominations of Christian[s]... in this State, demeaning themselves peaceably and faithfully, shall enjoy equal religious and civil privileges.

The Constitution of the State of South Carolina, adopted 1895, stated:

Preamble. We, the people of the State of South Carolina... grateful to God for our liberties, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the preservation and perpetuation of the same.

Article XVII, Section 4. No person who denies the existence of a Supreme Being shall hold any office under this Constitution.

New Hampshire, State of (June 21, 1788), was the 9th State admitted to the Union, completing the ratification of the United States Constitution. The Constitution of the State of New Hampshire, adopted 1776, stated:

That morality and piety, rightly grounded on evangelical principles would give the best and greatest security to government, and would lay in the hearts of men the strongest obligation to due subjection; and that the knowledge of these was most likely to be propagated by the institution of the public worship of the Deity and instruction in morality and religion.

In 1792, the legislature of the State of New Hampshire passed the "Bill of Rights," Article I, which abolished slavery within the State. The Constitution of the State of New Hampshire, adopted 1784 and 1792, stated:

[Representatives and Senators are to be of the] Protestant religion. (until 1877)

Declaration of rights. The open denial of the being and existence of God or of the Supreme Being is prohibited by statute, and declared to be blasphemy.

Part One, Article I, Section V. Every individual has a natural and unalienable right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and reason; and no subject shall be hurt, molested, or restrained in his person, liberty or estate for worshipping God, in the manner and season most agreeable to the dictates of his own conscience; or for his religious profession, sentiments or persuasion; provided he doth not disturb the public peace, or disturb others, in their religious worship.

Article I, Section VI. As morality and piety, rightly grounded on evangelical principles, will give the best and greatest security to government, and will lay in the hearts of men the strongest obligations to due subjection; and as the knowledge of these is most likely to be propagated through a society by the institution of the public worship of the Deity and of public instruction in morality and religion; therefore, to promote these important purposes, the people of this state have a right to empower, and do hereby fully empower, the legislature to authorize from time to time, the several towns, parishes, bodies-corporate, or religious societies within this State, to make adequate provision at their own expense, for the support and maintenance of public Protestant teachers of piety, religion and morality.

And every denomination of Christians demeaning themselves quietly, and as good citizens of the state, shall be equally under the protection of the laws; and no subordination of any one sect or denomination to another, shall ever be established by law.

Virginia, State of (June 25, 1788), was the 10th State admitted to the Union. The Constitution of the State of Virginia, adopted June 12, 1776, stated:

Bill of Rights, Article XVI. That Religion, or the Duty which we owe our Creator, and the Manner of discharging it, can be directed only by Reason and Convictions, not by Force or Violence; and therefore all Men are equally entitled to the free exercise of Religion, according to the Dictates of Conscience; and that it is the mutual Duty of all to practice Christian Forbearance, Love, and Charity towards each other.

New York, State of (July 26, 1788), was the 11th State admitted to the Union. The Constitution of the State of New York, adopted 1777, stated:

Article XXXVIII. The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever hereafter be allowed, within this State, to all mankind: Provided, that the liberty of conscience, hereby granted, shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness.

On March 29, 1799, the State of New York, in the twenty-second session, second meeting of the legislature, passed an Act which abolished slavery within the State. The Constitution of the State of New York, adopted 1777 and 1821, stated:

And Whereas we are required, by the benevolent principles of rational liberty, not only to expel civil tyranny, but also to guard against that spiritual oppression and intolerance wherewith the bigotry and ambition of weak and wicked priests and princes have scourged mankind:

This Convention doth further, in the name and by the authority of the good people of this State, ordain, determine, and declare that the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever hereafter be allowed within this State to all mankind:

Provided, That the liberty of conscience hereby granted shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness or justify practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of this State.

And Whereas the ministers of the gospel are, by their profession, dedicated to the service of God and the cure of souls... ought not to be diverted from the great duties of their function.

Blasphemy is a crime at common law and is not abrogated by the constitution.

The Constitution of the State of New York, adopted 1846, stated:

Preamble. We, the people of the State of New York, grateful to Almighty God for our freedom, in order to secure its blessings, do establish this Constitution.

North Carolina, State of (July 30, 1788), during the debates of the Convention to ratify of the Federal Constitution, Governor Samuel Johnston stated:

I know but two or three States where there is the least chance of establishing any particular religion. The people of Massachusetts and Connecticut are mostly Presbyterians. In every other State, the people are divided into a great number of sects. In Rhode Island, the tenets of the Baptists, I believe, prevail. In New York, they are divided very much; the most numerous are the Episcopalians and the Baptists. In New Jersey, they are as much divided as we are. In Pennsylvania, if any sect prevails more than others, it is that of the Quakers. In Maryland, the Episcopalians are most numerous, though there are other sects. In Virginia, there are many sects; you all know what their religious sentiments are. So in all the Southern States they differ; as also New Hampshire. I hope, therefore, that gentlemen will see there is no cause of fear that any one religion shall be exclusively established.

On July 30, 1788, State delegate Henry Abbott commented at the Convention to ratify the Federal Constitution:

Many wish to know what religion shall be established. I believe a majority of the community are Presbyterians. I am, for my part, against any exclusive establishment; but if there were any, I would prefer the Episcopal.

In expressing concern in the North Carolina legislature over the absence of a religious test in the Federal Constitution, delegate Henry Abbott vented:

If there be no religious test required, pagans, deists, and Mahometans might obtain office among us, and that the senators and representatives might all be pagans.

Judson, Adoniram (August 9, 1788-April 12, 1850), was the first American foreign missionary. He helped establish the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, translated the Bible in the language of Burma (1840), and compiled the Burmese-English Dictionary (1849).

The conversion of Adoniram Judson is recounted:

Adoniram was born in Malden, Massachusetts, in 1788. His father was a Congregationalist pastor... At age sixteen, Adoniram entered Providence College (renamed Brown University shortly after he began his studies). Here he met a young infidel named Jacob Eames. Both he and Adoniram were of quick wit, had a flair for the dramatic, and loved to study. Often they would debate and discuss their future careers, politics, philosophy, and religion late into the evening. Adoniram's religious arguments grew feeble before the wit and logic of Eames' atheism, and before his graduation, Adoniram declared himself an atheist.

After commencement, Adoniram went home to his parents and informed them that he was an atheist and planned to taste the pleasures of the world. His father tried to reason with him, and his mother was broken-hearted, but Adoniram would not be deterred. He left for New York City, intending to be a playwright, and although the excitement of his new circumstances drove from his mind the arguments of his father, he could not forget the tears of his mother.

Because of Adoniram's atheistic beliefs and his rejection of his parents' standards, God allowed him to fall into the depths of sin. After a year in New York City, Adoniram decided to travel west. The first night he stopped at a small inn. There was one bed left, separated from a dying man by only a curtain...

But though the night was still, he could not sleep. In the next room beyond the partition he could hear sounds, not very loud; footsteps coming and going; a board creaking; low voices; a groan or gasp. These did not disturb him unduly - not even the realization that a man might be dying. Death was a commonplace in Adoniram's New England. It might come to anyone, at any age. What disturbed him was the thought that the man in the next room might not be prepared for death. Was he himself?...

There was a terror in these fantastically unwinding ideas. But as they presented themselves, another part of himself jeered. Midnight fancies! that part said scornfully. What a skin-deep thing this freethinking philosophy of Adoniram Judson, valedictorian, scholar, teacher, ambitious man, must be! What would the classmates at Brown say to these terrors of the night, who thought of him as bold in thought? Above all what would Eames say - Eames the clear-headed, skeptical, witty, talented? He imagined Eames laughter and felt shame.

When Adoniram woke the sun was streaming in at the window. His apprehensions had vanished with the darkness. He could hardly believe he had given in to such weakness. He dressed quickly and ran downstairs, looking for the innkeeper... He found his host, asked for the bill, and - perhaps noticing the man somber-faced - asked casually whether the young man in the next room was better. "He is dead," was the answer...

"Did you know who he was?"

"Oh yes, Young man from the college in Providence. Name was Eames, Jacob Eames."

How he got through the next few hours, Adoniram was never also to remember. Only the words, "Lost, lost, lost," echoed through his mind. The truth of Scripture struck deep in his heart. He knew then that his father was right. He knew Eames was lost! Lost for eternity!

Adoniram returned home and made the startling announcement to his parents that he was enrolling in Andover Theological College for the fall of 1818. He was not a Christian when he enrolled, but in December, he trusted Christ as his Lord and Savior. In June of the following year, he placed himself under his father's authority and joined the church his father was pastoring...

In 1809, God planted in him a vision for missions through a book by a British army officer entitled An Account of an Embassy to the Kingdom of Ava. At first he felt a sense of "missionary zeal," but it soon died away. Later, during a time of meditation and prayer, Adoniram fully committed himself to be obedient to the Great Commission and to "go."

At Andover Theological Seminary, he became the leader of a missionary movement out of which grew the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. He was sent to England to seek the financial support of the London Missionary Society. On the way his ship was captured by a French privateer, and he was thrown into a French prison. He eventually escaped and found his way to England, only to be turned down for financial support. His mission was to be entirely American funded.

In February of 1812, Adoniram married Ann (Nancy) Hasseltine. In his letter to her father asking permission to wed, he wrote:

I have now to ask, whether you can consent to part with your daughter early next spring, to see her no more in this world; whether you can consent to her departure, and her subjection to the hardships and sufferings of missionary life, whether you can consent to her exposure to the dangers of the ocean; to the fatal influence of the southern climate of India; to every kind of want and distress; to degradation, insult, persecution, and perhaps a violent death. Can you consent to all this, for the sake of Him who left His heavenly home, and died for her and for you; for the sake of perishing, immortal souls; for the sake of Zion, and the glory of God? Can you consent to all this, in hope of soon meeting your daughter in the world of glory, with the crown of righteousness, brightened with the acclamations of praise which shall redound to her Saviour from heathens saved, through her means, from eternal woe and despair?"

Nancy's father, impressed with Adoniram's dedication and character gave his consent. Just two weeks after their marriage, Adoniram and Nancy left for India under the support of the Congregationalist Church.

During the voyage, Adoniram continued a translation of the New Testament from Greek into English, and as he did so he became convinced of the Baptist position. Shortly after their arrival at Serampore he and Nancy were baptized by William Ward, an assistant to missionary William Carey. As a result he felt compelled to resign from the Congregationalists and solicit the American Baptists for support, though as yet they had no missionary society.

They met with immediate resistance from the British East India Company, who would not allow Americans to remain in their territories. The Judson's then sailed to Java, Penang, Madras, and finally, after weeks of being hounded by the Company they took passage from Madras on the only ship available, and that was bound for Rangoon in Burma.

In 1813, they arrived in Myanmar, where he remained for 30 years. Nancy gave birth to their second child, Roger William Judson, (their first was stillborn during the tumultuous sea voyages). Their joy was short-lived as the boy contracted a tropical disease and died.

The loss of their second child became an opportunity to form an unlikely friendship with the Viceroy of Rangoon and his wife, which in turn gave them some protection from the continual harassment of corrupt Burmese officials.

Learning the language gave way to teaching and translation of the Bible. Nancy started a school to educate Burmese girls. With the arrival of a printer and press, Adoniram began to print tracts and portions of the New Testament in Burmese.

His first breakthrough came when he decided to build a Zayat, a Buddhist-style meditation room, on a main street. This allowed him to hold meetings and teach passers by in a way that was not foreign to them. He even visited a Buddhist service to learn how the meetings were conducted. His efforts bore fruit and after six years, they had their first convert, Maung Nau.

The conversion of Maung Nau "gave the mission a new impetus" as Christianity no longer was viewed as just a western religion: Rangoon's idle curiosity about the new religion had been satisfied. The enquirers who came now were genuinely interested in it as a faith for themselves.

Adoniram tried unsuccessfully to petition the despotic Emperor to allow religious freedom, but he would not hear of it. Adoniram continued to preach the Gospel as best he could. News of Judson's failure with the Emperor led to increased persecution of the believers, yet despite this they remained faithful. Adoniram insisted that converts undergo intense training before he would baptize them, as preparation for persecution.

He avoided direct affronts to the Emperor or the Buddhist religion, and respectfully wore, in the presence of the Emperor, a white robe which would mark him out as a religious teacher, without allowing him to be confused with a Buddhist priest (who wore yellow).

For some time Burma had been raiding East India Company territory because they took the English commander's refusal to fight as a sign of weakness. This led to the eruption of war and on June 8, 1824, Adoniram and medical missionary Dr. Jonathan Price were falsely accused by Burmese officials as spies and arrested. They were imprisoned twenty-one months in the Death Prison, known for its deplorable conditions. Nancy alone was left outside to get help for the prisoners and petition for their release.

After the British defeated the Burmese, Adoniram and Dr. Price were released and reunited with their families. British General Campbell then held a state dinner for the Burmese officials. When the Burmese saw Adoniram and Nancy seated at the head table, they visibly trembled, as they expected retribution for the horrible way they treated the Judsons during the imprisonment. After speaking with the General in English, Nancy turned and spoke politely to the officials in the Burmese language, telling them they had nothing to fear.

Because of his expertise in the Burmese language, Adoniram was imposed upon to help work out the treaty with the King of Burma. While helping with this translation work, Adoniram received a letter in November of 1826, which read:

My dear sir: To one who has suffered so much and with such exemplary fortitude, there needs but little preface to tell a tale of distress. It were cruel indeed to torture you with doubt and suspense. To sum up the unhappy tidings in a few words - Mrs. Judson is no more.

Shortly after, their daughter Maria, who had been born while Adoniram was in prison, died. A letter was then received from America informing of the death of Adoniram's father.

Adoniram went into deep depression, guilt and self-incrimination. He destroyed all correspondence congratulating him on his part in helping the British in the war. He gave away every penny he had. He wrote to Brown University and returned the honorary doctorate they had given him. At one point he withdrew to the edge of the jungle and dug a grave where he would sit and meditate on the meaning of death. He gradually recovered and with renewed determination, completed his translation work.

During an annual festival in Burma, Adoniram wrote that he had distributed:

...nearly ten thousand tracts, giving to none but those who ask. I presume that there have been six thousand applications at the house. Some come two- or three-months' journey, from the borders of Siam and China - "Sir, we hear that there is an eternal hell. We are afraid of it. Do give us a writing that will tell us how to escape it." Others come from the frontiers of Kathay, a hundred miles north of Ava - "Sir, we have seen a writing that tells about an eternal God. Are you the man that gives away such writings? If so, pray give us one, for we want to know the truth before we die." Others come from the interior of the country, where the name of Jesus Christ is a little known - "Are you Jesus Christ's man? Give us a writing that tells about Jesus Christ."

It was at this time that he and a colleague George Boardman were instrumental in the conversion of a member of the Karen People, Ko Tha Byu. Ko Tha Byu has come to be known as the Karen Apostle, the virtual founder of Karen Christianity. Recognizing that Christianity was the fulfillment of his people's own legends his ministry resulted in the conversion of thousands. Within 25 years there were 11,878 baptized Karen believers.

On April 10, 1834, after being alone for eight years, Adoniram married Sarah Hall Boardman, the widow of missionary companion George Boardman who died. On October 4, 1840, after twenty-three years of translation work, Adoniram completed translating the Bible from Hebrew and Greek into the Burmese language.

In 1845, he left to visit the United States, and his wife Sarah died during the voyage, being buried on the Island of St. Helena. While in America he met Fanny Forester (known as Emily Chubbuck), a gifted young writer, and they were married on June 2, 1846. On his return to Moulmein (1846; now Mawlamyine) he completed and published his Dictionary, English and Burmese (1849). The dictionary was so well done that it remained the core of all Burmese language translation for over one hundred years.

On April 12, 1850, Adoniram died at the age of sixty-one. Shortly before his death he told his wife, Emily:

Lying here on my bed, when I could not talk, I have had such views of the loving condescension of Christ and the glories of heaven as I believe are seldom granted to mortal man. It is not because I shrink from death that I wish to live; neither is it because the ties that bind me here, though some of them are very sweet, bear any comparison with the drawings I feel at times towards heaven. But a few years would not be missed from my eternity bliss, and I can well afford to spare them, both for your sake and the sake of the poor Burmans. I am not tired of my work, neither am I tired of the world. Yet when Christ calls me home, I shall go with the gladness of a boy bounding away from his school. Perhaps I feel something like the young bride, when she contemplates resigning the pleasant associations of her childhood for a yet dearer home - though only a very little like her, for there is no doubt resting on my future.

In 1845, after speaking at one of the many conferences during his brief stay in the United States, Emily asked him why he had not told any stories from the mission field in his short message. He replied that he had given them a story - "the most thrilling one that can be conceived of." Emily replied, "But they had heard it before. They wanted something new of a man who had just come from the Antipodes" (the other side of the globe). Revealing his life's passion, Dr. Judson replied:

Then I am glad they have it to say, that a man coming from the Antipodes had nothing better to tell than the wondrous story of Jesus' dying love.

At the time of Dr. Adoniram Judson's death, there were 7,000 Burmese Christians, 63 churches, 123 missionaries. Throughout the world, there are 2,700 missionaries serving through the missionary societies that Dr. Judson helped establish. The Judson Memorial Church in New York City is named for him.

United States Supreme Court (1789), was "ordained and established" by the Judiciary Act of Congress. Originally consisting of 6 justices, it has since been increased to 9. The Supreme Court Building in Washington, D.C., designed by Cass Gilbert, was completed in 1935. Engraved in stone above the head of the Chief Justice are the Ten Commandments with the great American eagle protecting them. Moses is included among the great lawgivers in Herman A. MacNeil's marble sculpture relief on the east portico. At the beginning of each session of the Court, as the Justices stand before their desks, the crier opens with the invocation:

God save the United States and this Honorable Court.

United States Congress (April 25, 1789), elected the Right Reverend Samuel Provoost (February 26, 1742-September 6, 1815), an Episcopal Bishop, as the first chaplain of the U.S. Senate, appropriating a salary for him to be paid from the Federal treasury. He conducted the service at St. Paul's Chapel, April 30, 1789, following Washington's Inauguration, attended by the President, his staff and all the leaders of the new government. He later officiated the memorial service for George Washington at St. Paul's Chapel, December 31, 1799.

United States Congress (April 27, 1789), passed a resolution in the Senate, and two days later in the House, giving instructions with regards the Inauguration of the George Washington as the first President of the United States:

Resolved, That after the oath shall have been administered to the President, he, attended by the Vice President, and the members of the Senate, and House of Representatives, proceed to St. Paul's Chapel, to hear divine service, to be performed by the Chaplain of Congress already appointed.

A week prior to the Inauguration, April 23, 1789, the schedule of events for that special day was published in the newspaper, Daily Advertiser:

On the morning of the day on which our illustrious President will be invested with his office, the bells will ring at nine o'clock, when the people may go up and in a solemn manner commit the new Government, with its important train of consequences, to the holy protection and blessings of the Most High. An early hour is prudently fixed for this peculiar act of devotion, and it is designed wholly for prayer.

The Annals of Congress give a record of the events on April 30, 1789, following President George Washington's Inauguration:

The President, the Vice-President, the Senate, and House of Representatives, &c., then proceeded to St. Paul's Chapel, where divine service was performed by the Chaplains of Congress.

United States Congress (April 30, 1789), was addressed by President George Washington in his Inaugural Speech to Both Houses of Congress. He had just taken the oath of office on the balcony of Federal Hall, at Wall and Nassau Streets in New York City, with his hand upon a Bible opened to Deuteronomy, chapter 28. Embarrassed by the thunderous ovation which followed the Inauguration ceremony, the pealing church bells and the roaring of artillery, he went inside to deliver his address to Congress:

Such being the impressions under which I have, in obedience to the public summons, repaired to the present station, it would be peculiarly improper to omit, in this first official act, my fervent supplications to that Almighty Being who rules over the universe, who presides in the councils of nations and whose providential aids can supply every human defect; that His benediction may consecrate to the liberties and happiness of the people of the United States a Government instituted by themselves for these essential purposes; and may enable every instrument employed in its administration to execute with success, the functions allotted to his charge.

In tendering this homage to the Great Author of every public and private good, I assure myself that it expresses your sentiments not less than my own; nor those of my fellow-citizens at large, less than either.

No people can be bound to acknowledge and adore the Invisible Hand which conducts the affairs of men more than the people of the United States. Every step by which they have advanced to the character of an independent nation seems to have been distinguished by some token of providential agency.

And in the important revolution just accomplished, in the system of their United government, the tranquil deliberations and voluntary consent of so many distinct communities, from which the event has resulted, can not be compared with the means by which most governments have been established, without some return of pious gratitude, along with an humble anticipation of the future blessings which the past seem to presage.

These reflections, arising out of the present crisis, have forced themselves too strongly on my mind to be suppressed. You will join with me I trust in thinking, that there are none under the influence of which the proceedings of a new and free Government can more auspiciously commence.

We ought to be no less persuaded that the propitious smiles of Heaven can never be expected on a nation that disregards the eternal rules of order and right which Heaven itself has ordained; and since the preservation of the sacred fire of liberty and the destiny of the republican model of government are justly considered as deeply, perhaps finally, staked on the experiment.

United States Congress (May 1, 1789), elected the Reverend William Linn, a Dutch Reformed minister from New York City, as the first chaplain of the U. S. House of Representatives, appropriating $500.00 dollars from the Federal treasury to pay his salary. During the period when Congress first met in the new capitol of Washington, D. C., the House and Senate Chaplains, which traditionally have always been Christian, regularly led service every Sunday in the House Chamber. In 1860, Rabbi Morris Jacob Raphall was the first Jewish clergyman invited to open a House session with prayer. Both the House and the Senate have continued to regularly open every session with prayer.

Linn, William (May 1, 1789), was elected Chaplain of U. S. House of Representatives and given a salary of $500 from the Federal Treasury. He was a respected minister in New York City, and the father of the poet John Blair Linn (1777-1804). Reverend William Linn stated:

Let my neighbor once persuade himself that there is no God, and he will soon pick my pocket, and break not only my leg but my neck. If there be no God, there is no law, no future account; government then is the ordinance of man only, and we cannot be subject for conscience sake.

United States Congress (May 8, 1789), the U. S. House of Representatives delivered the following address to President

George Washington:

The Representatives of the People of the United States present their congratulations on the event by which your fellow-citizens have attested the pre-eminence of your merit. You have long held the first place in their esteem....

We feel with you the strongest obligations to adore the Invisible Hand which has led the American People through so many difficulties, to cherish a conscious responsibility for the destiny of republican liberty; and to seek the only sure means of preserving and recommending the precious deposit in a system of legislation founded on the principles of an honest policy....

All that remains is, that we join in our fervent supplications for the blessings of Heaven on our country, and that we add our own for the choicest of these blessings on the most beloved of her citizens.

On Friday, May 8, 1789, President George Washington replied to the U. S. House of Representatives:

Your very affectionate address produces emotions which I know not how to express....

For all beyond, I rely on the wisdom and patriotism of those with whom I am to co-operate, and a continuance of the blessings of Heaven on our beloved country.

United States Congress (May 18, 1789), the U. S. Senate delivered the following address to President George Washington and Vice-President John Adams:

We, the Senate of the United States, return you our sincere thanks for your excellent speech delivered to both Houses of Congress....

We are, with you, unavoidably led to acknowledge and adore the Great Arbiter of the universe, by whom empires rise and fall. A review of the many signal instances of divine interposition in favor of this country, claims our most pious gratitude; and permit us, sir, to observe, that, among the great events which have led to the formation and establishment of a Federal Government, we esteem your acceptance of the office of the President as one of the most propitious and important....

We commend you, sir, to the protection of Almighty God, earnestly beseeching him long to preserve a life so valuable and dear to the People of the United States, and that your administration may be prosperous to the nation and glorious to yourself.

On Monday, May 18, 1789, President George Washington replied to the U. S. Senate:

I thank you for your address, in which the most affectionate sentiments are expressed....

I now feel myself inexpressibly happy in a belief that Heaven, which has done so much for our infant nation, will not withdraw its Providential influence before our political felicity shall have been completed, and in a conviction that the Senate will at times co-operate in every measure which may tend to promote the welfare of this confederated republic.

Thus supported by a firm trust in the Great Arbiter of the universe, aided by the collected wisdom of the Union, and imploring the divine benediction on our joint exertions in the service of our country, I readily engage with you in the arduous but pleasing task of attempting to make a nation happy.

Jay, William (June 16, 1789-October 14, 1858), was the son of John Jay, the first Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and the father of John Jay, the influential diplomat. He was a successful attorney, author and judge in Westchester County, New York. William Jay took the unpopular and politically incorrect stance of opposing slavery, and, in 1833, helped found the New York City Anti-Slavery Society. He was a founder of the American Bible Society, 1816, and served as the director of the American Tract Society.

William Jay wrote several books against slavery, including: American Anti-Slavery Societies, 1835; Miscellaneous Writings on Slavery, 1853; War and Peace: The Evils of the First and a Plan for Preserving the Last, 1842; and, in 1849, wrote this testimony in the introduction to one of his works:

The writer is a believer in the Divine authority of the Scriptures - he acknowledges no standard of right and wrong but the Will of God, and denies the expediency of any act which is forbidden by laws dictated by Infinite Wisdom and Goodness.

This avowal will prepare the reader to find in the following pages many opinions not having the stamp of public approbation. Patriotism, honor, glory, and national prosperity, are terms to which the Christian and the mere politician attach different ideas, and estimate by different standards.

He who admits the authority of the Bible will not readily acknowledge that whatever is "highly esteemed among men" must be right, nor that which is unpopular is, of course, wrong.

United States Congress (August 7, 1789), in "An Ordinance for the Government of the Territory of the United States, North-West of the River Ohio," later shortened to the Northwest Ordinance, Article VI, prohibited slavery within the territory that was to become the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin and the eastern part of Minnesota. It was signed into law by President George Washington; after having been introduced into Congress by Rufus King, a signer of the Constitution; receiving House approval, July 21, 1789; and receiving Senate approval, August 4, 1789. This was the same period that Congress was formulating the First Amendment. This Ordinance, recognized in The United States Code Annotated as one of America's four most significant government documents, was originally passed by the Congress of the Confederation, July 13, 1787.

The Northwest Ordinance stated:

SECTION 13. And, for extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, which form the basis whereon these republics, their laws and constitutions are erected: to fix and establish those principles as the basis of all laws, constitutions and governments, which forever hereafter shall be formed in the said territory: to provide also for the establishment of states, and permanent government therein, and for their admission to a share in the federal councils in an equal footing with the original states, at as early period as may be consistent with the general interest:

SECTION 14. It is hereby ordained and declared by the authority aforesaid, That the following articles shall be considered as articles of compact, between the original states and the people and states of the said territory, and forever remain unalienable, unless by common consent, to wit:

ARTICLE I. No person, demeaning himself in a peaceable and orderly manner, shall ever be molested on account of his mode of worship or religious sentiments in the said territory....

ARTICLE III. Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged.

United States Congress (September 25, 1789), voted on the final version of the first ten amendments to the Constitution, known as the Bill of Rights. The First Amendment states:

Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

The initial draft of the first amendment was made by James Madison, of Virginia, on June 8, 1789. His wording was:

The civil rights of none shall be abridged on account of religious belief or worship, nor shall any national religion be established, nor shall the full and equal rights of conscience be in any manner, or on any pretext, infringed.

George Mason, the author of the Virginia Declaration of Rights and a member of the Constitutional Convention, was largely responsible for the States' insistence that the powers of Congress be limited by a Bill of Rights. He had previously suggested that the First Amendment wording be:

All men have an equal, natural and unalienable right to the free exercise of religion, according to the dictates of conscience; and that no particular sect or society of Christians ought to be favored or established by law in preference to others.

On August 15, 1789, the House Select Committee revised the proposed wording to:

No religion shall be established by law, nor shall the equal rights of conscience be infringed.

Peter Sylvester, Representative of New York, had some doubts as to the Select Committee's version, as:

It might be thought to have a tendency to abolish religious together.

Mr. Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts said it would read better:

No religious doctrine shall be established by law.

James Madison said he:

... apprehended the meaning of the words to be, that Congress should not establish a religion and enforce the legal observation of it by law, nor compel men to worship God in any manner contrary to their conscience.

Representative Benjamin Huntington, son of the prestigious governor of Connecticut, protested that:

The words might be taken in such latitude as to be extremely hurtful to the cause of religion.

Representative Huntington then suggested that:

The amendment be made in such a way as to secure the rights of religion, but not to patronize those who professed no religion at all.

James Madison then responded agreeably to Representative Huntington and Representative Peter Sylvester, that he:

... believes that the people feared one sect might obtain a preeminence, or two [Anglican and Congregational] combine and establish a religion to which they would compel others to conform.

Roger Sherman did not even want an amendment, realizing that the federal government was not to have any say in what was under the individual States' jurisdictions. James Madison then proposed the insertion of the word "national" before religion, thereby pointing the amendment directly to the object it was intended to prevent.

On August 15, 1789, Samuel Livermore of New Hampshire proposed the wording:

Congress shall make no laws touching religion, or infringing the rights of conscience.

The House agreed and accepted the first five words of this version.

On August 20, 1789, Fisher Ames of Massachusetts introduced the language:

Congress shall make no law establishing religion, or to prevent the free exercise thereof, or to infringe the rights of conscience.

This proposal was accepted by the House, which then sent it to the Senate for discussion. On September 3, 1789, the Senate proposed several versions in succession:

Congress shall not make any law infringing the rights of conscience, or establishing any religious sect or society.

Congress shall make no law establishing any particular denomination of religion in preference to another, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, nor shall the rights of conscience be infringed.

Congress shall make no law establishing one religious society in preference to others, or to infringe on the rights of conscience.

The version accepted by the Senate at the end of the day, September 3, 1789 was:

Congress shall make no law establishing religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

On September 9, 1789, the Senate agreed on the version:

Congress shall make no law establishing articles of faith or a mode of worship, or prohibiting the free exercise of religion.

This proposal was then sent to a joint committee of both the House and the Senate to reconcile the differences. The final wording agreed upon was:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

On December 15, 1791, The Bill of Rights was finally ratified by the states. This was a declaration of what the federal government could not do, leaving the States free within the controls of their own constitutions.

The First Amendment in its entirety, states:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The Second Amendment states:

A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed.

The Third Amendment states:

No soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

The Fourth Amendment states:

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

The Fifth Amendment states:

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

The Sixth Amendment states:

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining Witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

The Seventh Amendment states:

In Suits at common Law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise reexamined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of common Law.

The Eighth Amendment states:

Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

The Ninth Amendment states:

The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

The Tenth Amendment states:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

National Day of Public Thanksgiving and Prayer:

Friday, September 25, [1789]. Day of Thanksgiving. Resolved. That a joint committee of both Houses be directed to wait upon the President of the United States to request that he recommend to the people of the United States a day of public Thanksgiving and Prayer, to be observed by acknowledging, with grateful hearts, the many signal favors of Almighty God, especially by affording them an opportunity peaceably to establish a constitution of government for their safety and happiness.

The Journals of Congress, documenting the discussions of Congress in regard to this proclamation, recorded the comments of Mr. Roger Sherman of Connecticut:

Mr. Sherman justified the practice of Thanksgiving, on any signal event, not only as a laudable one in itself, but as warranted by a number of precedents in Holy Writ: for instance, the solemn thanksgivings and rejoicings which took place in the time of Solomon, after the building of the temple, was a case in point. This example, he thought, worthy of Christian imitation on the present occasion.

On October 3, 1789, from the city of New York, President George Washington issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving:

Whereas it is the duty of all nations to acknowledge the providence of Almighty God, to obey His will, to be grateful for His benefits, and humbly to implore His protection and favor and

Whereas both Houses of Congress have by their joint Committee requested me "to recommend to the People of the United States a day of public thanksgiving and prayer to be observed by acknowledging with grateful hearts the many signal favors of Almighty God, especially by affording them an opportunity peaceably to establish a form of government for their safety and happiness."

Now, therefore, I do recommend and assign Thursday, the twenty-sixth day of November next, to be devoted by the People of these United States to the service of that great and glorious Being, who is the beneficent Author of all the good that was, that is, or that will be.

That we may then all unite in rendering unto Him our sincere and humble thanks, for His kind care and protection of the People of this country previous to their becoming a Nation, for the signal and manifold mercies, and the favorable interpositions of His Providence, which we experienced in the course and conclusion of the late war, for the great degree of tranquillity, union, and plenty, which we have since enjoyed, for the peaceable and rational manner in which we have been enabled to establish constitutions of government for our safety and happiness, and particularly the national one now lately instituted, for the civil and religious liberty with which we are blessed, and the means we have of acquiring and diffusing useful knowledge and in general for all the great and various favors which He hath been pleased to confer upon us.

And also that we may then unite in most humbly offering our prayers and supplications to the great Lord and Ruler of Nations, and beseech Him to pardon our national and other transgressions, to enable us all, whether in public or private stations, to perform our several and relative duties properly and punctually, to render our national government a blessing to all the People, by constantly being a government of wise, just and constitutional laws, discreetly and faithfully executed and obeyed, to protect and guide all Sovereigns and Nations (especially such as have shown kindness unto us) and to bless them with good government, peace, and concord, to promote the knowledge and practice of the true religion and virtue, and the increase of science among them and Us, and generally to grant unto all Mankind such a degree of temporal prosperity as He alone knows to be best.

Given under my hand, at the city of New York, the 3rd of October, A. D. 1789.
Go Washington.

North Carolina, State of (November 21, 1789), was the 12th State admitted to the Union. The Constitution of the State of North Carolina, adopted 1776, stated:

Article XIX. That all men have a natural and unalienable right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own conscience.

Article XXXII. That no person who shall deny the being of God, or the truth of the Protestant religion, or the divine authority of the Old or New Testaments, or who shall hold religious principles incompatible with the freedom and safety of the State, shall be capable of holding any office or place of trust or profit in the civil department within this State. (until 1876)

Section XXXIV. There shall be no establishment of any one religious church or denomination in this State in preference to any other.

In 1835, the word "Protestant" was changed to "Christian."

The Constitution of the State of North Carolina, adopted 1868, stated:

Preamble. We the people of the State of North Carolina, grateful to Almighty God, the Sovereign Ruler of Nations, for the preservation of the American Union and the existence of our civil, political, and religious liberties, and acknowledging our dependence upon Him for the continuance of those blessings to us and our posterity, do, for the more certain security thereof and for the better government of this State, ordain and establish this Constitution.

evident that all persons...are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights.

Article I, Section 26. All persons have a natural and inalienable right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences.

Article IV, Section 8. The following classes of persons shall be disqualified for office: First, all persons who shall deny the being of Almighty God.

Article XXXIV. That there shall be no establishment of any one religious church or denomination in this State, in preference to any other.

Tyler, John (March 29, 1790-January 18, 1862), was the 10th President of the United States, 1841-45, responsible for the Annexation of Texas, 1844, the city of Tyler, Texas, being his namesake; the Webster-Ashburton Treaty, 1842, ending the border disputes with Canada; joint U.S.-British naval patrols off the African coast to suppress the slave trade; and the United States' first commercial trade treaty with China; Chancellor of the College of William and Mary, 1860; married Julia Gardiner, 1844, after death of first wife; Vice-President under William Henry Harrison, 1841, being the first to assume the Presidency at the death of a President; U.S. Senator, 1827-36; Governor of Virginia, 1825-27; U.S. Representative, 1816-21; elected to the Virginia House of Delegates, 1838, 1823, 1811; married Letitia Christian, 1813; U.S. Army Captain during the War of 1812; admitted to bar, 1809, and graduated from the College of William and Mary, 1807.

On Friday, April 9, 1841, in his Inaugural Address delivered upon assuming the Presidency after the death of President Harrison, President John Tyler stated:

Fellow-citizens: Before my arrival at the seat of Government the painful communication was made to you by the officers presiding over the several Departments of the deeply regretted death of William Henry Harrison, late President of the United States. Upon him you had conferred your suffrages for the first office in your gift, and had selected him as your chosen instrument to correct and reform all such errors and abuses as had manifested themselves from time to time in the practical operation of the Government.

While standing at the threshold of this great work he has by the dispensation of an all-wise Providence been removed from amongst us, and by the provisions of the Constitution the efforts to be directed to the accomplishing of this vitally important task have devolved upon myself. This same occurrence has subjected the wisdom and sufficiency of our institutions to a new test.

For the first time in our history the person elected to the Vice-Presidency of the United States, by the happening of a contingency provided for in the Constitution, has had devolved upon him the Presidential office....

My earnest prayer shall be constantly addressed to the all-wise and all-powerful Being who made me, and by whose dispensation I am called to the high office of President. . . .

Confiding in the protecting care of an everwatchful and overruling Providence, it shall be my first and highest duty to preserve unimpaired the free institutions under which we live and transmit them to those who shall succeed me in their full force and vigor.

On Tuesday, April 13, 1841, from Washington, D.C., President John Tyler issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Fasting and Prayer in respect of the death of President William Henry Harrison:

When a Christian people feel themselves to be overtaken by a great public calamity, it becomes them to humble themselves under the dispensation of Divine Providence, to recognize His righteous government over the children of men, to acknowledge His goodness in time past, as well as their own unworthiness, and to supplicate His merciful protection for the future.

The death of William Henry Harrison, late President of the United States, so soon after his elevation to that high office, is a bereavement peculiarly calculated to be regarded as a heavy affliction and to impress all minds with a sense of the uncertainty of human things and of the dependence of nations, as well as individuals, upon our Heavenly Parent.

I have thought, therefore, that I should be acting in conformity with the general expectations and feelings of the community in recommending, as I now do, to the people of the United States of every religious denomination that, according to their several modes and forms of worship, they observe a day of fasting and prayer by such religious services as may be suitable on the occasion; and I recommend Friday, the 14th day on May next, for that purpose, to the end that on that day we may all with one accord join in humble and reverential approach to Him in whose hands we are, invoking Him to inspire us with a proper spirit and temper of heart and mind under these frowns of His providence and still to bestow His gracious benedictions upon our Government and our country.

On June 13, 1841, in a letter to Mrs. Anna Symmes Harrison, wife of the late-President William Henry Harrison, President John Tyler wrote:

In conveying to you, my dear madam, the profound respect of the two Houses of Congress for your person and character, and their sincere condolences on the late afflicting dispensations of Providence, permit me to mingle my feelings with theirs and tender you my fervent wishes for your health, happiness, and long life.

On June 24, 1841, President John Tyler received a letter from Mrs. Anna Symmes Harrison:

Dear Sir. . . . I can not sufficiently express the thanks I owe to the nation and its assembled representatives for their condolence, so feelingly expressed, of my individual calamity and the national bereavement; but mingling my tears with the sighs of the many patriots of the land, pray to Heaven for the enduring happiness and prosperity of our beloved country.

On August 16, 1841, in a Veto Message, President John Tyler stated:

The bill entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Fiscal Bank of the United States,"...has been considered by me....I can not conscientiously give it my approval....

By the occurrence of a contingency provided for in the Constitution and arising under an impressive dispensation of Providence I succeeded to the Presidential office. Before entering upon the duties of that office I took an oath that I would "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States." Entertaining the opinions alluded to and having taken this oath, the Senate and the country will see that I could not give my sanction to a measure of the character described without surrendering all claim to the respect of honorable men, all confidence on the part of the people, all self-respect, all regard for moral and religious obligations, without an observance of which no government can be prosperous and no people can be happy....

Let the history of the late United States Bank aid us in answering this inquiry....It may be remarked, too, that notwithstanding the immense transactions of the bank in the purchase of exchange...in the line of discounts the suspended debt was enormous and proved most disastrous to the bank and the country. Its power of local discount has in fact proved to be a fruitful source of favoritism and corruption, alike destructive to the public morals and to the general weal.

On December 7, 1841, in his First Annual Message to the Senate and House of Representatives, President John Tyler declared:

We are in the enjoyment of all the blessings of civil and religious liberty....We are all called upon by the highest obligations of duty to renew our thanks and our devotion to our Heavenly Parent, who has continued to vouchsafe to us the eminent blessings which surround us and who has so signally crowned the year with His goodness. If we find ourselves increasingly beyond example in numbers, in strength, in wealth, in knowledge, in everything which promotes human and social happiness, let us ever remember our dependence for all these on the protection and merciful dispensations of Divine Providence.

On August 30, 1842, in a Protest Message to Congress, President John Tyler stated:

It is true that the succession of the Vice-President to the Chief Magistracy has never occurred before....But I found myself placed in this most responsible station by no usurpation or contrivance of my own. I was called to it, under Providence, by the supreme law of the land and the deliberately declared will of the people.

On December 6, 1842, in his Second Annual Message to the Senate and House of Representatives, President John Tyler stated:

We have continued reason to express our profound gratitude to the Great Creator of All Things for the numberless benefits conferred upon us as a people. Blessed with genial seasons, the husbandman has his garners filled with abundance, and the necessaries of life, not to speak of its luxuries, abound in every direction. While in some other nations steady and industrious labor can hardly find the means of subsistence, the greatest evil which we have to encounter is a surplus of production beyond the home demand, which seeks, and with difficulty finds, a partial market in other regions.

The health of the country, with partial exceptions, has for the past year been well preserved, and under their free and wise institutions the United States are rapidly advancing toward the consummation of the high destiny which an overruling Providence seems to have marked out for them. Exempt from domestic convulsion and at peace with all the world, we are left free to consult as to the best means of securing and advancing the happiness of the people.

Such are the circumstances under which you now assemble in your respective chambers and which should lead us to unite in praise and thanksgiving to that Great Being who made us and who preserves us as a nation. . . .

The schoolmaster and the missionary are found side by side, and the remnants of what were once numerous and powerful nations may yet be preserved as the builders up of a new name for themselves and their posterity.

In December 1843, in his Third Annual Message to Congress, President John Tyler stated:

If any people ever had cause to render up thanks to the Supreme Being for parental care and protection extended to them in all the trials and difficulties to which they have been from time to time exposed, we certainly are that people. From the first settlement of our forefathers on the continent, through the dangers attendant upon the occupation of a savage wilderness, through a long period of colonial dependence, through the War of the Revolution, in the wisdom which led to the adoption of the existing forms of republican government, in the hazards incident to a war subsequently waged with one of the most powerful nations of the earth, in the increase of our population, in the spread of the arts and sciences, and in the strength and durability conferred on the political institutions emanating from the people and sustained by their will, the superintendence of an overruling Providence has been plainly visible. As preparatory, therefore, to entering once more upon the high duties of legislation, it becomes us humbly to acknowledge our dependence upon Him as our guide and protector and to implore a continuance of His parental watchfulness over our beloved country.

Under the influence of our free system of government new republics are destined to spring up at no distant day on the shores of the Pacific similar in policy and in feeling to those existing on this side of the Rocky Mountains, and giving wider and more extensive spread to the principles of civil and religious liberty....

When, under Providence, I succeeded to the Presidential office, the state of public affairs was embarrassing and critical....I shall be permitted to congratulate the country that under an overruling Providence peace was preserved without a sacrifice of national honor.

On Tuesday, December 3, 1844, in his Fourth Annual Message to Congress, President John Tyler stated:

We have continued cause for expressing our gratitude to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe for the benefits and blessings which our country, under His kind providence, has enjoyed during the past year....The world has witnessed its rapid growth in wealth and population, and under the guide and direction of a superintending Providence the developments of the past may be regarded but as the shadowing forth of the mighty future....The guaranty of religious freedom, of the freedom of the press, of the liberty of speech, of the trial by jury, of the habeas corpus, and of the domestic institutions of each of the States....Thus it is that in the progress of time the inestimable principles of civil liberty will be enjoyed by millions yet unborn....

Our prayers should evermore be offered up to the Father of the Universe for His wisdom to direct us in the path of our duty so as to enable us to consummate these high purposes.

Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, State of (May 29, 1790), was the 13th State admitted to the Union. In 1784, the legislature of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations passed an Act abolishing slavery within the State. The Constitution of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, adopted 1842, stated:

Preamble. We, the people of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, grateful to Almighty God for the civil and religious liberty which He hath so long permitted us to enjoy, and looking to Him for a blessing upon our endeavors to secure and to transmit the same unimpaired to succeeding generations, do ordain and establish this constitution of Government.

Article I, Section 3. Whereas Almighty God hath created the mind free; and all attempts to influence it by temporal punishments or burdens, or by civil incapacitations, tend to beget habits of hypocrisy and meanness.

The original Charter of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, issued by Charles II in 1663, remained the Constitution of the Commonwealth until 1842. It stated:

American Quotations.txt

The object of the Colonists is to pursue, with peace and loyal minds, their sober, serious, and religious intentions of godly edifying themselves and one another in the holy Christian faith and worship, together with the gaining over and conversion of the poor ignorant Indian natives to the sincere profession and obedience of the same faith and worship. (until 1842)

Vermont, State of (March 4, 1791), was the 14th State admitted into the Union. The Constitution of the State of Vermont, adopted 1777, stated:

Preamble. Whereas all government ought to be instituted and supported for the security and protection of the community, as such, and to enable the individuals who compose it to enjoy their natural rights, and other blessings which the Author of existence has bestowed on man.

DECLARATION OF RIGHTS, III. That all men have a natural and Unalienable right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences and understanding, regulated by the word of GOD; and that no man ought, or of right can be compelled to attend any religious worship, or erect, or support any place of worship, or maintain any minister, contrary to the dictates of his conscience;

nor can any man who professes the Protestant religion, be justly deprived or abridged of any civil right, as a citizen, on account of his religious sentiment, or peculiar mode of worship, and that no authority can... interfere with, or in any manner control, the rights of conscience, in the free exercise of religious worship;

nevertheless, every sect or denomination of people ought to observe the Sabbath, or the Lord's day, and keep up, and support, some sort of religious worship, which to them shall seem most agreeable to the revealed will of GOD.

In 1786, the Legislature of the State of Vermont passed the "Declaration of Rights," Article I, which abolished slavery within the State. The Constitution of the State of Vermont, adopted 1786, stated:

Frame of Government, Section IX. And each member [of the Legislature], before he takes his seat, shall make and subscribe the following declaration, viz: "I do believe in one God, the Creator and Governor of the Universe, the Rewarder of the good and Punisher of the wicked. And I do acknowledge the Scripture of the Old and New Testament to be given by Divine inspiration, and own and profess the Protestant religion.

And no further or other religious test shall ever, hereafter, be required of any civil officer or magistrate in this State."

In 1792, the Constitution of the State of Vermont stated:

Frame of Government, Chapter II, Section XII. And
Page 519

each member, before he takes his seat, shall make and subscribe the following declaration, viz: "You do believe in one God, the Creator and Governor of the Universe, the Rewarder of the good and Punisher of the wicked."

In 1793, the Constitution of the State of Vermont stated:

Chapter I, Article III. That all men have a natural and unalienable right, to worship Almighty God, according to the dictates of their own consciences.... Every sect or denomination of Christians ought to observe the Sabbath or Lord's Day, and keep up some sort of religious worship, which to them shall seem most agreeable to the revealed will of God.

Buchanan, James (April 23, 1791-June 1, 1868), the 15th President of the United States, 1857-61, attempted unsuccessfully to circumvent the rising tension over slavery; U.S. Minister to Great Britain, 1853-56; Secretary of State under James K. Polk, 1845-49; U.S. Senator, 1834-45; U.S. Minister to Russia, 1832-34; U.S. Representative, 1821-31; the only bachelor President as his fiancée, Ann Coleman, died suddenly when he was a young man, 1820; member of the Pennsylvania Legislature, 1814-16; served in the War of 1812; admitted to bar, 1812; and graduated from Dickinson College, 1809.

While serving in Russia as the U.S. Minister, 1832-33, James Buchanan wrote to his brother, a Presbyterian minister:

I can sincerely say for myself that I desire to be a Christian, and I think I could withdraw from the vanities and follies of the world without suffering many pangs. I have thought much upon the subject since my arrival in this strange land and sometimes almost persuade myself that I am a Christian: but I am often haunted by the spirit of skepticism. My true feeling upon many occasions is: "Lord, I would believe; help thou my unbelief." Yet I am far from being an unbeliever.

On February 29, 1844, James Buchanan wrote a letter to his brother from Washington:

I am a believer; but not with that degree of firmness of faith calculated to exercise a controlling influence on my conduct. I ought constantly to pray, "Help Thou my unbelief." I trust that the Almighty Father, through the merits and atonement of His Son, will yet vouchsafe to me a clearer and stronger faith than I possess.

On Wednesday, March 4, 1857, in his Inaugural Address, President James Buchanan stated:

In entering upon this great office I must humbly invoke the God of our fathers for wisdom and firmness to execute its high and responsible duties in such a manner as to restore harmony and ancient friendship among the people of the several States and to preserve our free institutions throughout many generations. Convinced that I owe my election to the inherent love for the Constitution and the Union which still animates the hearts of the American people, let me earnestly ask their powerful support in sustaining all just measures calculated to perpetuate these, the richest political blessings which Heaven has ever bestowed upon any nation....

I feel an humble confidence that the kind Providence which inspired our fathers with wisdom to frame the most perfect form of government and union ever devised by man will not suffer it to perish until it shall have been peacefully instrumental by its example in the extension of civil and religious liberty throughout the world....

Our present financial condition is without parallel in history. No nation has ever before been embarrassed from too large a surplus in its treasury. This almost necessarily gives birth to extravagant legislation. It produces wild schemes of expenditure and begets a race of speculators and jobbers, whose ingenuity is exerted in contriving and promoting expedients to obtain public money....

No nation in the tide of time has ever been blessed with so rich and noble an inheritance as we enjoy in the public lands.... We should never forget that it is our cardinal policy to reserve these lands, as much as may be, for actual settlers, and this at moderate prices. We shall thus not only best promote the prosperity of the new States and Territories, by furnishing them a hardy and independent race of honest and industrious citizens, but shall secure homes for our children and our children's children, as well as for those exiles from foreign shores who may seek in this country to improve their condition and to enjoy the blessings of civil and religious liberty....

We ought to cultivate peace, commerce, and friendship with all nations, and this not merely as the best means of promoting our own material interests, but in a spirit of Christian benevolence toward our fellow-men, wherever their lot may be cast....

In all our acquisitions the people, under the protection of the American flag, have enjoyed civil and religious liberty.... I shall now proceed to take the oath prescribed by the Constitution, whilst humbly invoking the blessing of Divine Providence on this great people.

On December 8, 1857, in his First Annual Message to Congress, President James Buchanan stated:

First and above all, our thanks are due to Almighty God for the numerous benefits which He has bestowed upon this people, and our united prayers ought to ascend to Him that He would continue to bless our great Republic in time to come as He has blessed it in time past.

On January 7, 1858, in a message to the Senate, President James Buchanan stated:

The crime well deserves the punishment inflicted upon it by our laws. It violates the principles of Christianity, morality, and humanity, held sacred by all civilized nations and by none more than by the people of the United States....

The avowed principle which lies at the foundation of the law of nations is contained in the Divine command that "all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you do ye even so to them." Tried by this unerring rule, we should be severely condemned if we shall not use our best exertions to arrest such expeditions against our feeble sister republic of Nicaragua.

On February 2, 1858, in an address to Congress, President James Buchanan stated:

I have thus performed my duty on this important question, under a deep sense of responsibility to God and my country. My public life will terminate within a brief period, and I have no other object of earthly ambition than to leave my country in a peaceful and prosperous condition.

On December 6, 1858, in his Second Annual Message to Congress, President James Buchanan stated:

We have much reason for gratitude to that Almighty Providence which has never failed to interpose for our relief at the most critical periods of our history....

Immediately upon the formation of a new Territory people from different States and from foreign countries rush into it for the laudable purpose of improving their condition. Their first duty to themselves is to open and cultivate farms, to construct roads, to establish schools, to erect places of religious worship...

On December 20, 1858, in writing to the Senate, President James Buchanan stated:

Under the act of January 17, 1858, the courts of inquiry were directed to investigate "the physical, mental, professional, and moral fitness" of each officer who applied to them for relief.... In performance of my duty I found the greatest difficulty in deciding what should be considered as "moral fitness" for the Navy.... There has been but one perfect standard of morality on earth, and how far a departure from His precepts and example must proceed in order to disqualify an officer for the naval service is a question on which a great difference of honest opinion must always exist.

On Monday, December 19, 1859, in his Third Annual Message to Congress, President James Buchanan stated:

Our deep and heartfelt gratitude is due to that Almighty Power which has bestowed upon us such varied and numerous blessings throughout the past year. The general health of the country has been excellent, our harvests have been unusually plentiful, and prosperity smiles throughout the land. Indeed, notwithstanding our demerits, we have much reason to believe from the past events in our history that we have enjoyed the special protection of Divine Providence ever since our origin as a nation.

We have been exposed to many threatening and alarming difficulties in our progress, but on each successive occasion the impending cloud has been dissipated at the moment it appeared ready to burst upon our head, and the danger to our institutions has passed away. May we ever be under the Divine guidance and protection....

I firmly believe that the events at Harpers Ferry, by causing the people to pause and reflect upon the possible peril to their cherished institutions, will be the means under Providence of allaying the existing excitement and preventing further outbreaks of a similar character....

The light and the blessings of Christianity have been extended to them, and both their moral and physical condition has been greatly improved....

But we are obliged as a Christian and moral nation to consider what would be the effect upon unhappy Africa itself if we should reopen the slave trade. This would give the trade an impulse and extension which it has never had, even in its palmy days. The numerous victims required to supply it would convert the whole slave coast into a perfect pandemonium, for which this country would be held responsible in the eyes both of God and man....

When a market for African slaves shall no longer be furnished in Cuba, and thus all the world be closed against this trade, we may then indulge a reasonable hope for the gradual improvement of Africa.... In this manner Christianity and civilization may gradually penetrate the existing gloom.

On March 28, 1860, President James Buchanan sent a formal Protest to the House of Representatives:

I have lived long in this goodly land, and have enjoyed all the offices and honors which my country could bestow.... I feel proudly conscious that there is no public act of my life which will not bear the strictest scrutiny. I defy all investigations. Nothing but the basest perjury can sully my good name. I do not fear even this, because I cherish an humble confidence that the gracious Being who has hitherto defended and protected me against the shafts of falsehood and malice will not desert me now when I have become "old and gray headed." I can declare before God and my country that no human being (with an exception scarcely worthy of notice) has at any period of my life dared to approach me with a corrupt or dishonorable proposition.

On April 24, 1860, in writing to the House of Representatives, President James Buchanan stated:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 2d March, 1859, and of the 26th ultimo, requesting information relative to discriminations in Switzerland against citizens of the United States of the Hebrew persuasion, I transmit a report of the Secretary of State.

On Monday, December 3, 1860, in his Fourth Annual Message to Congress, President James Buchanan stated:

Self-preservation is the first law of nature, and has been implanted in the heart of man by his Creator for the wisest purpose; and no political union, however fraught with blessings and benefits in all other respects, can long continue if the necessary consequence be to render the homes and the firesides of nearly half the parties to it habitually and hopelessly insecure. Sooner or later the bonds of such a union must be severed. It is my conviction that this fatal period has not yet arrived, and my prayer to God is that He would preserve the Constitution and the Union throughout all generations....

As sovereign States, they, and they alone, are responsible before God....

What, in the meantime, is the responsibility and true position of the Executive? He is bound by solemn oath, before God and the country, "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and from this obligation he can not be absolved by any human power....

When we take a retrospect of what was then our condition and contrast this with its material prosperity at the time of the late Presidential elections, we have abundant reason to return our grateful thanks to that merciful Providence which has never forsaken us as a nation in all our past trials....

It is with great satisfaction I communicate the fact that since the date of my last annual message not a single slave has been imported into the United States in violation of the laws prohibiting the African Slave trade....

It surely ought to be the prayer of every Christian and patriot that such expeditions may never again receive countenance in our country or depart from our shores.

On Friday, December 14, 1860, President James Buchanan issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Humiliation, Fasting, and Prayer:

Numerous appeals have been made to me by pious and patriotic associations and citizens, in view of the present distracted and dangerous condition of our country, to recommend that a day be set apart for humiliation, fasting, and prayer throughout the Union.

In compliance with their request and my own sense of duty, I designate Friday, the 4th day of January, 1861, for this purpose, and recommend that the people assemble on that day, according to their several forms of worship, to keep it as a solemn fast.

The Union of the States is at the present moment threatened with alarming and immediate danger; panic and distress of a fearful character prevail throughout the land; our laboring population are without employment, and consequently deprived of the means of earning their bread. Indeed, hope seems to have deserted the minds of men. All classes are in a state of confusion and dismay, and the wisest counsels of our best and purest men are wholly disregarded.

In this the hour of our calamity and peril to whom shall we resort for relief but to the God of our fathers? His omnipotent arm only can save us from the awful effects of our own crimes and follies - our own ingratitude and guilt toward our Heavenly Father.

Let us, then, with deep contrition and penitent sorrow unite in humbling ourselves before the Most High, in confessing our individual and national sins, and in acknowledging the justice of our punishment. Let us implore Him to remove from our hearts that false pride of opinion which would impel us to persevere in wrong for the sake of consistency rather than yield a just submission to the unforeseen exigencies by which we are now surrounded. Let us with deep reverence beseech Him to restore the friendship and good will which prevailed in former days among the people of the several States, and, above all, to save us from the horrors of civil war and "blood guiltiness." Let our fervent prayers ascend to His throne that He would not desert us in this hour of extreme peril, but remember us as He did our fathers in the darkest days of the Revolution, and preserve our Constitution and our Union, the work of their hands, for ages yet to come.

An Omnipotent Providence may overrule existing evils for permanent good. He can make the wrath of man to praise Him, and the remainder of wrath He can restrain. Let me invoke every individual, in whatever sphere of life he may be placed, to feel a personal responsibility to God and his country for keeping this day holy and for contributing all in his power to remove our actual and impending calamities.

On January 8, 1861, President James Buchanan stated to Congress:

But, in Heaven's name, let the trial be made before we plunge into armed conflict upon the mere assumption that there is no other alternative... Let us pause at this momentous point and afford the people, both North and South, an opportunity for reflection.

On January 28, 1861, in a message to Congress, President James Buchanan stated:

I yet cherish the belief that the American people will perpetuate the Union of the States on some terms just and honorable for all sections of the country. I trust that the mediation of Virginia may be the destined means, under Providence, of accomplishing this inestimable benefit.

Nearing the end of his life, James Buchanan, who was a member of the Presbyterian Church, wrote to a friend:

We are both at a period of life when it is our duty to relax our grasp on the world fast receding, and fix our thoughts, desires, and affections on One who knows no change. I trust in God that, through the merits and atonement of His Son, we may both be prepared for the inevitable change.

Morse, Samuel Finley Breese (April 27, 1791-April 2, 1872), was an American inventor and artist. He invented the Morse Code, developed the telegraph, and built the first camera in America. He was the son of Jedediah Morse, the educator and textbook writer known as "The Father of American Geography."

Samuel F. B. Morse was also one of the greatest portrait artists of all time. He was the founder and president for 20 years of the National Academy of Design, and, in 1831, received the distinction of being appointed to the first chair of fine arts in America, the Professor of Sculpture and Painting at New York University.

In 1844, Samuel F. B. Morse erected the first telegraph lines between Baltimore and the chamber of the U. S. Supreme Court in Washington, D. C. The first message, only four words, ever sent over this new communication system which would revolutionize the world, was a verse from the Bible found in Numbers 23: 23:

"What hath God Wrought!"

Samuel F. B. Morse wrote to his wife during those anxious days between failure and success:

The only gleam of hope, and I can not underrate it, is from confidence in God. When I look upward it calms my apprehensions for the future, and I seem to hear a voice saying: 'If I clothe the lilies of the field, shall I not also clothe you?' Here is my strong confidence, and I will wait patiently for the direction of Providence.

Later in life, when informed of his wife's death, Samuel F. B. Morse wrote to his father:

Oh, is it possible? Is it possible? Shall I never see my wife again? But I can not trust myself to write on this subject. I need your prayers and those of Christian friends.

Samuel F. B. Morse graduated in 1810 from Yale College, having studied under the godly influence of its President, Timothy Dwight. Four years before his death, Samuel F. B. Morse gave this strong testimony of his faith:

The nearer I approach to the end of my pilgrimage, the clearer is the evidence of the divine origin of the Bible, the grandeur and sublimity of God's remedy for fallen man are more appreciated, and the future is illumined with hope and joy.

Faraday, Michael (September 22, 1791-August 25, 1867), was an English chemist and naturalist. In 1833, he was honored as professor of chemistry at the prestigious Royal Institute. He pioneered the liquefaction of gases and discovered benzene, which is used in aniline dyes, perfumes, and high explosives.

Michael Faraday's scientific contributions include the discovery of electrolysis, electromagnetic induction, the concept of magnetic lines of force, and the invention of the first electrical generator in 1831. Michael Faraday avowed:

It is permitted to the Christian to think of death; he is even represented as praying that God would teach him to number his days. Words are given him: "Thanks be unto God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." And though the thought of death brings the thought of judgment, it also brings to the Christian the thought of Him who died, who rose again for the justification of those who believe in Him.

The Christian who is taught by God (by His Word and Holy Spirit) finds his guide in the Word of God, and commits the keeping of his soul in the hands of God. He looks for no assurance beyond what the Word of God can give him; and if his mind is troubled by the cares and fears which may assail him, he can go nowhere but to the throne of grace and to Scripture.

No outward manifestation can give either instruction or assurance to him, nor can any outward opposition or trouble diminish his confidence in Christ crucified, to the Jews a stumbling block and to the Greeks foolishness; but to them who are called, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God. The Christian religion is a revelation, and that revelation is the Word of God.

Michael Faraday believed:

The Bible, and it alone, with nothing added to it nor taken away from it by man, is the sole and sufficient guide for each individual, at all times and in all circumstances. . . . Faith in the divinity and work of Christ is the gift of God, and evidence of this faith is obedience to the commandment of Christ.

In 1861, in writing to a scientist friend, Michael Faraday stated:

Since peace is alone the gift of God; and as it is He who gives it, why should we be afraid? His unspeakable gift in His beloved Son is the ground of no doubtful hope.

First Amendment (December 15, 1791), was added to the Constitution of the United States of America, along with nine other amendments, which together compose The Bill of Rights. The First Amendment reads:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Herschel, Sir John Frederick William (March 7, 1792-May 11, 1871), was an English astronomer, the son of the great astronomer, Sir William Herschel. He discovered and catalogued over 500 new stars and nebulae of both northern and southern hemispheres. Concerning the Bible, Sir John Frederick Herschel asserted:

All human discoveries seem to be made only for the purpose of confirming more and more strongly the truths that come from on high and are contained in the Sacred Writings.

Kentucky, State of (June 1, 1792), was the 15th State admitted to the Union. The Constitution of the State of Kentucky, adopted 1799, stated:

Article VI, Section 7. The manner of administering an oath or affirmation... shall be esteemed by the General Assembly the most solemn appeal to God.

The Constitution of the State of Kentucky, adopted 1891, stated:

Preamble. We, the people of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, grateful to Almighty God for the civil, political and religious liberties we enjoy and invoking the continuance of these blessings... establish this Constitution.

Bill of Rights, Section 1. The right of worshipping Almighty God according to the dictates of their consciences.

Finney, Charles Grandison (August 29, 1792-August 16, 1875), was an American revivalist, author and educator of the early 19th century. He was the president of Oberlin College, in Ohio, 1852. He believed that every human life was valuable and strongly supported giving freedom to the slaves. His college was a busy station on the Underground Railroad, which secretly brought slaves to freedom. Under Charles Finney's direction as president, Oberlin College was the first university in America to award college degrees to women and to blacks. His college graduated Mary Jane Patterson, the first black woman ever to receive a bachelor's degree in the United States. Charles Finney was the grandfather of artist Kenyon Cox (1856-1919), known for his murals on public buildings.

His Lectures on Revivals, 1835, had a powerful impact in England, profoundly affecting George Williams, who went on to found the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA), 1844, and William and Catherine Booth, who founded The Salvation Army, 1865.

Charles G. Finney helped form the Benevolent Empire, a great network of volunteer societies organized to aid in solving social problems. Among them were the: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, 1810; American Bible Society, 1816; American Sunday School Union, 1817; American Tract Society, 1826; American Home Mission Society, 1826; and American Temperance Society, 1826. By 1834, the budget of these organizations was almost as large as the federal budget of that time. Charles Finney said concerning the Kingdom of God:

Every member must work or quit. No honorary members.

Charles Finney declared:

The church must take right ground in regards to politics... The time has come for Christians to vote for honest men, and take consistent ground in politics or the Lord will curse them...

God cannot sustain this free and blessed country, which we love and pray for, unless the Church will take right ground. Politics are a part of a religion in such a country as this, and Christians must do their duty to their country as a part of their duty to God...

God will bless or curse this nation according to the course Christians take in politics.

Hemans, Felicia Dorothea Browne (September 25, 1793-May 16, 1835), was an English poet. She was noted for her naturalness and simplicity. Sir Walter Scott wrote the epilogue for her play, The Vespers of Palermo. Felicia Hemans is best known to American readers for her work, The Landing of the Pilgrim Fathers, in which she penned:

What sought they thus afar?
Bright jewels of the mine?
The wealth of seas, the spoils of war?
They sought a faith's pure shrine!

Ay, call it holy ground,
The soil where they first trod!
They have left unstained what there they found - Freedom to worship God.

Perry, Matthew Calbraith (April 10, 1794-March 4, 1858), was the U. S. Navy Commodore who opened Japan to world trade through a dramatic show of force on July 8, 1853 and again in February 1854. His brother was Captain Oliver Hazard Perry, who won fame in the war of 1812.

Commodore Matthew Calbraith Perry stated:

I have just finished the Bible; I make it a point to read it through every cruise. It is certainly a wonderful Book - a most wonderful Book. . . . From boyhood I have taken a deep interest in Christianizing the heathen, and in imparting a knowledge of God's revealed truth everywhere.

On a Sunday in 1853, on his way to Japan to protect American seamen, Commodore Perry set his Bible on the capstan, read Psalm 100, then sang:

Before Jehovah's awful throne
Ye nations bow with sacred joy.

Everett, Edward (April 11, 1794-January 15, 1865), was an American diplomat, educator, orator and clergyman. He was Governor of Massachusetts, 1836-40; U. S. Minister to Britain, 1841-45; Secretary of State under President Fillmore, 1852-53; and U. S. Senator, 1853-54. He was the president of Harvard, 1846-49, and dedicated the national cemetery at Gettysburg, November 19, 1863, with President Abraham Lincoln. Edward Everett stated:

All the distinctive features and superiority of our republican institutions are derived from the teachings of Scripture.

In an address at the opening of the Dudley Observatory in Albany, New York, Edward Everett remarked:

I do not wonder at the superstition of the ancient magicians, who, in the morning of the world, went up to the hilltops of Central Asia, and, ignorant of the true God, adored the most glorious work of his hand.

But I am filled with amazement, when I am told, that, in this enlightened age and in the heart of the Christian world, there are persons who can witness this daily manifestation of the power and wisdom of the Creator, and yet say in their hearts, There is no God.

Bryant, William Cullen (November 3, 1794-June 12, 1878), was an American poet and editor. He known as the "Father of American Poets," and wrote such titles as: Thanatopsis; To a Waterfowl; The Death of the Flowers; and To the Fringed Gentian. He was the editor in chief of the New York Evening Post for 50 years, lending its support in the formation of the Republican Party and the fight against slavery. William Cullen Bryant wrote:

The sacredness of the Bible awes me, and I approach it with the same sort of reverential feeling that an ancient Hebrew might be supposed to feel who was about to touch the ark of God with unhallowed hands.

The very men who, in the pride of their investigations into the secrets of the internal world, turn a look of scorn upon the Christian system of belief, are not aware how much of the peace and order of society, how much the happiness of households, and the purest of those who are the dearest to them, are owing to the influence of that religion extending beyond their sphere....

In my view, the life, the teachings, the labors, and the sufferings of the blessed Jesus, there can be no admiration too profound, no love of which the human heart is capable too warm, no gratitude too earnest and deep of which He is justly the object.

United States Congress (January 1, 1795), heard President George Washington give his National Thanksgiving Proclamation, declaring Thursday, the 19th of February, 1795, as a National Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer. In it he stated:

The happy course of our public affairs in general, the unexampled prosperity of all classes of our citizens, are circumstances which peculiarly mark our situation with indications of the Divine Beneficence towards us. In such a state of things, it is in an especial manner our duty as a people, with devout reverence and affectionate gratitude, to acknowledge our many and great obligations to Almighty God, and to implore Him to continue and confirm the blessings we experience.

Polk, James Knox (November 2, 1795-June 15, 1849), was the 11th President of the United States, 1845-49, won the Mexican War against Santa Anna, 1848, which resulted in California, Nevada, Utah, and parts of Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado, and Wyoming being added to the Union; resolved dispute with Great Britain, 1846, fixing the Oregon border at the 49th parallel; Governor of Tennessee, 1839-41; U.S. Representative, 1824-39, being Speaker of the House, 1835-39; married Sarah Childress, 1824; member of the Tennessee Legislature, 1823-25; admitted to the bar, 1820; and graduated from the University of North Carolina, 1818.

On Tuesday, March 4, 1845, in his Inaugural Address, President James Knox Polk stated:

In assuming responsibilities so vast, I fervently invoke the aid of that Almighty Ruler of the Universe in whose hands are the destinies of nations and of men to guard this Heaven-favored land against the mischiefs which without His guidance might arise from an unwise public policy. With a firm reliance upon the wisdom of Omnipotence to sustain and direct me in the path of duty which I am appointed to pursue I stand in the presence of this assembled multitude of my countrymen to take upon myself the solemn obligation "to the best of my ability to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."...

The Government of the United States...leaves individuals, over whom it casts its protecting influence, entirely free to improve their own condition by the legitimate exercise of all their mental and physical powers. It is a common protector of each and all the States; of every man who lives upon our soil, whether of native or foreign birth; of every religious sect, in their worship of the Almighty according to the dictates of their own conscience....

If he say that error and wrong are committed in the administration of the Government, let him remember that nothing human can be perfect, and that no other system of government revealed by Heaven or devised by man has reason been allowed so free and broad a scope to combat error....

With these views of the nature, character, and objects of the Government and the value of the Union, I shall steadily oppose the creation of those institutions and systems which in their nature tend to pervert it from its legitimate purposes and make it the instrument of sections, classes, and individuals. We need no national banks or other extraneous institutions planted around the Government to control and strengthen it in opposition to the will of its authors. Experience has taught us how unnecessary they are as auxiliaries of the public authorities - impotent for good and how powerful for mischief....

The Republic of Texas has made known her desire to come into our Union, to form a part of our Confederacy and enjoy with us the blessings of liberty secured and guaranteed by our Constitution....

I enter upon the discharge of the high duties which have been assigned to me by the people, again humbly supplicating that Divine Being, who has watched over and protected our beloved country from its infancy to the present hour, to continue His gracious benedictions upon us, that we may continue to be prosperous and happy people.

On Monday, June 16, 1845, President James K. Polk directed George Bancroft, Acting Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy, to issue General Order No. 27:

The President of the United States with heartfelt sorrow announces to the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps the death of Andrew Jackson. On the evening of Sunday, the 8th day of June, about 6 o'clock, he resigned his spirit to his Heavenly Father. . . . Heaven gave him length of days and he filled them with deeds of greatness. . . . Thrice happy in death, for while he believed the liberties of his country imperishable and was cheered by visions of its constant advancement, he departed from this life in a full hope of a blessed immortality through the merits and atonement of the Redeemer. Officers of the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps will wear crape on the left arm and on their swords, and the colors of the several regiments will be put in mourning for the period of six months.

On Tuesday, December 2, 1845, in his First Annual Message to Congress, President James K. Polk stated:

Under the blessings of Divine Providence and the benign influence of our free institutions, it stands before the world a spectacle of national happiness. . . . It becomes us in humility to make our devout acknowledgements to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe for the inestimable civil and religious blessings with which we are favored. . . .

Our experience has shown that when banking corporations have been the keepers of the public money, and been thereby made in effect the Treasury, the Government can have no guaranty that it can command the use of its own money for public purposes. The late Bank of the United States proved to be faithless. But a few years ago, with millions of public money in their keeping, the Government was brought almost to bankruptcy and the public credit seriously impaired. . . .

The public money should not be mingled with the private funds of banks or individuals or to be used for private purposes. When it is placed in banks for safe-keeping, it is in effect loaned to them without interest, and is loaned by them upon interest to borrowers from them. The public money is converted into banking capital, and is used and loaned out for the private profit of bank stockholders. . . . The framers of the Constitution could never have intended that the money paid into the Treasury should be thus converted to private use and placed beyond the control of the Government. . . .

Banks which hold the public money are often tempted by a desire of gain to extend their loans, increase their circulation, and thus stimulate, if not produce, a spirit of speculation and extravagance which sooner or later must result in ruin to thousands. If the public money be not permitted to be thus used, but kept in the Treasury and paid out to the public creditors in gold and silver, the temptation afforded by its deposit with banks to an undue expansion of their business would be checked. . . .

The separation of the moneys of the Government from banking institutions is indispensable for the safety of the funds of the Government and the rights of the people. . . . To say that the people or their Government are incompetent or not to be trusted with the custody of their own money in their own Treasury, provided by themselves, but must rely on the presidents, cashiers, and stockholders of banking corporations, not appointed by them nor responsible to them, would be to concede that they are incompetent for self-government. . . .

The enjoyment of contemplating, at the advanced age of near fourscore years, the happy condition of his country cheered the last hours of Andrew Jackson, who departed this life in the tranquil hope of a blessed immortality. . . . In his language on a similar occasion to the present, "I now commend you, fellow-citizens, to the guidance of Almighty God, with a full reliance on His merciful providence for the maintenance of our free institutions, and with an earnest supplication that whatever errors it may be my lot to commit in discharging the arduous duties which have devolved on me will find a remedy in the harmony and wisdom of your counsels."

On May 13, 1846, President James Knox Polk stated in a Proclamation of War with the Republic of Mexico:

I do, moreover, exhort all the good people of the United States, as they love their country, as they feel the wrongs which have forced on them the last resort of injured nations, and they consult the best means, under the blessing of Divine Providence, of abridging its calamities.

On December 8, 1846, in his Second Annual Message to Congress, President James K. Polk stated:

Our devout and sincere acknowledgments are due to the gracious Giver of All Good for the numberless blessings which our beloved country enjoys.

On Tuesday, December 7, 1847, in his Third Annual Message to Congress, President James K. Polk stated:

The success of our admirable system is a conclusive refutation of the theories of those in other countries who maintain that a "favored few" are born to rule and that the mass of mankind must be governed by force. Subject to no arbitrary or hereditary authority, the people are the only sovereigns recognized by our Constitution. . . .

No country has been so much favored, or should acknowledge with deeper reverence the manifestations of Divine protection. An all-wise Creator directed and guarded us in our infant struggle for freedom and has constantly watched over our surprising progress until we have become one of the great nations of the earth. . . . In the enjoyment of the bounties of Providence at home such as have rarely fallen to the lot of any people, it is the cause of congratulation. . . .

Invoking the blessing of the Almighty Ruler of the Universe upon your deliberations, it will be my highest duty, no less than my sincere pleasure, to cooperate with you in all measures which may tend to promote the honor and enduring welfare of our common country.

On February 24, 1848, President James K. Polk issued the Executive Order:

It has pleased Divine Providence to call hence a great and patriotic citizen. John Quincy Adams is no more. At the advanced age of more than fourscore years, he was suddenly stricken from his seat in the House of Representatives.... He had for more than a half a century filled the most important public stations.

On Tuesday, December 5, 1848, in his Fourth Annual Message to Congress, President James K. Polk stated:

Under the benignant providence of Almighty God the representatives of the States and of the people are again brought together to deliberate for the public good. The gratitude of the nation to the Sovereign Arbiter of All Human Events should be commensurate with the boundless blessings which we enjoy. Peace, plenty, and contentment reign throughout our borders, and our beloved country presents a sublime moral spectacle to the world....

Invoking the blessing of the Almighty upon your deliberations at your present important session, my ardent hope is that in a spirit of harmony and concord you may be guided to wise results, and such as my redound to the happiness, the honor, and the glory of our beloved country.

On June 8, 1849, only a week before his death, James K. Polk commented to the Rev. Dr. Edgar, of Nashville, Tennessee:

Sir, if I had supposed, twenty years ago, that I should come to my death bed unprepared, it would have made me an unhappy man; and yet I am about to die, and have not made preparation. I have not been baptized. Tell me, sir, can there be any ground for a man thus situated to hope?

Shortly following, James Knox Polk was baptized into the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and received the sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

Carlyle, Thomas (December 4, 1795-February 5, 1881), was a Scottish essayist and historian. His works were controversial yet highly praised. His books include: The Life of Schiller, 1826; The French Revolution, 1837; and On Heros and Hero Worship, 1840. He also translated Goethe's works from German into English. Thomas Carlyle wrote:

The Bible is the truest utterance that ever came by alphabetic letters from the soul of man, through which, as through a window divinely opened, all men can look into the stillness of eternity, and discern in glimpses their far-distant, long-forgotten home.

I call the Book of Job, apart from all the theories about it, one of the grandest things ever written with the pen.

In his Miscellaneous Papers, Thomas Carlyle wrote:

The Hebrew Bible, is it not before all things true as no other book ever was or will be?

In his essays Corn-Law Rhymes, Carlyle wrote:

In the poorest cottage are books: in one Book wherein, for several thousand of years, the spirit of man has found light, and nourishment, and an interpreting response to whatever is deepest in him.

In his Critical and Miscellaneous Essays, 1827, Carlyle wrote:

The Bible itself has, in all changes of theory about it, this as its highest distinction: that it is the truest of all books. The Book springs, every word of it, from the intensest convictions, from the very heart's core, of those who penned it; and has not that been a successful Book? Did all the Paternoster Rows of the world ever hear of one so successful?

In 1827, Thomas Carlyle wrote in The State of German Literature:

The three great elements of modern civilization: gunpowder, printing, and the Protestant religion.

In Book III, Chapter III of his Sartor Resartus, 1833-34, Thomas Carlyle wrote:

If thou ask to what height man has carried it, look to our divinest symbol: Jesus of Nazareth, and His life, and His biography, and what followed therefrom. Higher has the human thought never reached; this is Christianity and Christendom - a symbol of quite perennial, infinite character, whose significance will ever demand to be anew inquired into and anew made manifest.

In Book II, Chapter 9 of Sartor Resartus, he wrote:

Love not Pleasure; I love God.

Butler, Benjamin Franklin (December 14, 1795-November 8, 1858), was an American politician and Union General during the Civil War. He served as the U. S. Attorney General, 1833-38, under President Andrew Jackson; the U. S. Secretary of War, 1836-37; and U. S. attorney for the Southern District of New York, 1838-48. In addition to serving in the New York State Legislature, Benjamin Franklin Butler was the head of the electoral College of New York in 1845. In an address delivered in 1834 at Alexandria, D. C., Benjamin Franklin Butler stated:

He is truly happy, whatever may be his temporal condition, who can call God his Father in the full assurance of faith and hope. And amid all his trials, conflicts, and doubts, the feeblest Christian is still comparatively happy; because cheered by the hope... that the hour is coming when he shall be delivered from "this body of sin and death" and in the vision of his Redeemer... approximate to the... felicity of angels.

Not only does the Bible inculcate, with sanctions of the highest import, a system of the purest morality, but in the person and character of our Blessed Saviour it exhibits a tangible illustration of that system.

In Him we have set before us - what, till the publication of the Gospel, the world had never seen - a model of feeling and action, adapted to all times, places, and circumstances; and combining so much of wisdom, benevolence, and holiness, that none can fathom its sublimity; and yet, presented in a form so simple, that even a child may be made to understand and taught to love it.

Wayland, Francis (March 11, 1796-September 30, 1865), was an American clergyman, author and educator. He was the president of Brown University, 1827-55, and the first president of the American Institute of Instruction, 1830. He was instrumental in devising the school system for Providence, Rhode Island. A graduate of Union College and Harvard University, Francis Wayland wrote: Elements of Moral Science, 1835; Elements of Political Economy, 1837; Thoughts on the Present Collegiate System in the United States, 1842; and A Memoir of the Life of the Rev. Adoniram Judson, D.D., 1842. As a well recognized American clergyman, Francis Wayland stated:

That the truths of the Bible have the power of awakening an intense moral feeling in every human being; that they make bad men good, and send a pulse of healthful feeling through all the domestic, civil, and social relations; that they teach men to love right, and hate wrong, and seek each other's welfare as children of a common parent; that they control the baleful passions of the heart, and thus make men proficient in self government; and finally that they teach man to aspire after conformity to a Being of infinite holiness, and fill him with hopes more purifying, exalted, and suited to his nature than any other book the world has ever known - these are facts as incontrovertible as the laws of philosophy, or the demonstrations of mathematics.

Briggs, George Nixon (April 12, 1796-September 12, 1861), was an American politician and philanthropist. He was the Governor of Massachusetts, and a U.S. Representative for six successive terms. In May of 1850, while President of the American Baptist Missionary Union, he addressed the missionaries in Buffalo:

You go to an embassy compared with which all the embassies of men dwindle into insignificance. You go forth as ambassadors of Christ. You go to crumble idols - to convey light to benighted minds - to kindle love to God in the souls of ungodly men.
Who can overestimate the qualifications necessary for such work? The fervent, effectual prayer shall ascend to the mercy seat for you.
You shall never see the day when your brethren who sent you out shall turn their backs on you; but look higher, the Saviour has told you, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." The Almighty Friend will always be at your side to sustain you.

Mann, Horace (May 4, 1796-August 2, 1859), was an American legislator and educator. He played a leading role establishing the public school system in the United States. As a lawyer, Horace Mann served in the Massachusetts legislature as a state representative, 1827-33, and as a state senator, 1833-37. In 1848, he became a U. S. Representative and strongly fought to end slavery in America.

Horace Mann was known for being the Secretary of the Massachusetts State Board of Education; founding the first state normal school in the United States in 1839; and being the president of Antioch College in Ohio. In 1900, he was elected to New York University's Hall of Fame. Horace Mann stated:

Moral education is a primal necessity of social existence. The unrestrained passions of men are not only homicidal, but suicidal; and a community without a conscience would soon extinguish itself. Even with a natural conscience, how often has evil triumphed over good.

In 1843, as Secretary of Education in Massachusetts, Mann studied the educational system of Prussia. Five years later, in 1848, at the Twelfth Annual Report of the Massachusetts Board of Education, Horace Mann made the following statement:

Now, it is the especial province and function of the statesman and the lawgiver - of all those, indeed, whose influence molds or modifies public opinion - to study out the eternal principles which conduce to the strength, wisdom, and righteousness of a community....

And he is not worthy to be called a statesman, he is not worthy to be a lawgiver or leader among men, who, either through the weakness of his head or the selfishness of his heart, is incapable of marshaling in his mind the great ideas of knowledge, justice, temperance, and obedience to the laws of God, - on which foundation alone the structure of human welfare can be erected; who is not capable of organizing these ideas into a system, and then of putting that system into operation.

Horace Mann, in the Twelfth Annual report to the Massachusetts Board of Education, recommended:

But to all doubters, disbelievers, or despairers in human progress, it may still be said, there is one experiment which has never yet been tried. It is an experiment, which even before its inception, offers the highest authority for its ultimate success.

Its formula is intelligible to all; and it is as legible as though written in starry letters on an azure sky. It is expressed in these few and simple words:

"Train up a child in the way he should go and when he is old he will not depart from it."

This declaration is positive. If the conditions are complied with, it makes no provision for a failure.... But it will be said that this grand result in practical morals is a consummation of blessedness that can never be attained without religion, and that no community will ever be religious without a religious education.

Both these propositions I regard as eternal and immutable truths. Devoid of religious principles and religious affections, the race can never fall so low but that it may sink still lower; animated and sanctified by them, it can never rise so high but that it may ascend still higher.

And is it not at least as presumptuous to expect that mankind will attain to the knowledge of truth, without being instructed in truth, and without that general expansion and development of faculty which will enable them to recognize and comprehend truth in any other department of human interest as in the department of religion.

If I were able to give but one parting word of advise to my own children, or to the children of others; if I were sinking beneath the wave, and had time to utter but one articulate breath; or were wasting away upon the deathbed, and had strength to make but one exhortation more, - that dying legacy should be, "Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth."

So the religious education which a child receives at school is not imparted to him for the purposes of making him join this or that denomination when he arrives at years of discretion, but for the purpose of enabling him to judge for himself, according to the dictates of his own reason and conscience, what his religious obligations are, and whether they lead.

The Bible is in our common schools by common consent....In all my intercourse for twelve years, whether personal or by letter, with all the school officers in the state, and with tens of thousands of individuals in it, I have never heard an objection made to the use of the Bible in school, except in one or two instances; and, in those cases, the objection was put upon the ground that daily familiarity with the book in school would tend to impair a reverence for it.

In his report, Horace Mann emphasized:

That our public schools are not theological seminaries, is admitted. That they are debarred by law from inculcating the peculiar and distinctive doctrines of any one religious denomination amongst us, is claimed; and that they are also prohibited from ever teaching that what they teach is the whole of religion, or all that is essential to religion or to salvation, is equally certain.

But our system earnestly inculcated all Christian morals; it founds its morals on the basis of religion; it welcomes the religion of the Bible; and, in receiving the Bible, it allows it to do what it is allowed to do in other systems - to speak for itself....

I hold it, then, to be one of the excellences, one of the moral beauties, of the Massachusetts system, that there is one place in the land where the children of all the different denominations are brought together for instruction, where the Bible is allowed to speak for itself; one place where the children can kneel at a common altar, and feel that they have a common Father, and where the services of religion tend to create brothers, and not Ishmaelites.

In concluding his report to the Massachusetts Board of Education, Horace Mann offered the evidence:

It was in consequence of laws that invaded the direct and exclusive jurisdiction which our Father in Heaven exercises over his children upon earth, that the Pilgrims fled from their native land to that which is the land of our nativity. They sought a residence so remote and so inaccessible, in hopes that the prerogatives of the Divine Magistrate might no longer be set at nought by the usurpations of the civil power.

Was it not an irreligious and an impious act on the part of the British government to pursue our ancestors with such cruel penalties and privations as to drive them into banishment? Was it not a religious and pious act in the Pilgrim Fathers to seek a place of refuge where the arm of earthly power could neither restrain them from worshipping God in the manner believed to be most acceptable to him, nor command their worship in a manner believed to be unacceptable? And if it was irreligious for our forefathers two centuries ago, then it is more flagrantly irreligious to repeat the oppression in this more enlightened age of the world.

If it was a religious act in our forefathers to escape from ecclesiastical tyranny, then it must be in the strictest conformity to religion for us to abstain from all religious oppression over others, and to oppose it whenever it is threatened.

And this abstinence from religious oppression, this acknowledgement of the rights of others, this explicit recognition and avowal of the supreme and exclusive jurisdiction of Heaven, and this denial of the right of any earthly power to encroach upon that jurisdiction, is precisely what the Massachusetts school-system purports to do in theory and what it does actually in practice.

Hence I infer that our system is not an irreligious one, but is in the strictest accordance with religion and its obligations.

In his last public statement, Horace Mann exclaimed:

Be ashamed to die until you have won some victory for humanity.

Tennessee, State of (June 1, 1796), was the 16th State admitted to the Union. The Constitution of the State of Tennessee, adopted 1796, stated:

Article XI, Section III. That all men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences.

Article VIII, Section II. No person who denies the being of God, or a future state of rewards and punishments, shall hold any office in the civil department of this State.

Article XI, Section IV. That no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under this State.

The Constitution of the State of Tennessee, adopted 1870, stated:

Article I, Section 3. That all men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own conscience.

Article IX, Section 2. No person who denies the being of God, or a future state of rewards and punishments, shall hold any office in the civil department of this State.

Rhode Island, Seal of the State of (1797), reflected the sentiments of the state's 69,122 population. On the seal, over the picture of an anchor, is inscribed the motto:

IN GOD WE HOPE.

Truth, Sojourner (c.1797-November 26, 1883), was an American abolitionist. A slave herself, she was freed in 1827 and who moved with her family to New York. In 1843, she heard "a voice from Heaven," and began to travel the North preaching emancipation of the slaves. In the mid-1860's, she relocated in Washington, D.C., and helped resettle ex-slaves. A strong part of the abolitionist movement, Sojourner Truth stated:

When I left the house of bondage I left everything behind. I wanted to keep nothing of Egypt on me, and so I went to the Lord and asked him to give me a new name....

I set up my banner, and then I sing, and then folks always comes up 'round me, and then...I tells them about Jesus.

Sojourner Truth frequently began her messages by saying:

Children, I talk to God and God talks to me.

At an abolitionist meeting in Faneuil Hall, Boston, Frederick Douglass had spoken saying that the slaves had no hope except their own strength and desire to fight for themselves. Sojourner Truth quietly asked him:

Frederick, is God dead?

Hodge, Charles (December 27, 1797-June 19, 1878), was married to the great-grand daughter of Ben Franklin, received his doctorate from Rutgers University and was a professor for fifty years at Princeton University. A distinguished author, Charles Hodge wrote in 1871:

The proposition that the United States [is] a Christian...nation, is...the statement of a fact. That fact is not simply that the great majority of the people are Christians...but that the organic life, the institutions, laws, and official action of the government, whether that action be legislative, judicial, or executive, is...in accordance with the principles of...Christianity....

If a man goes to China, he expects to find the government there administered according to the religion of the country. If he goes to Turkey, he expects to find the Koran supreme and regulating all public action. If he goes to a [Christian] country, he has no right to complain, should he find the Bible in the ascendancy and exerting its benign influence not only on the people, but also on the government....

In the process of time thousands have come among us, who are [not] Christians. Some are...Jews, some are infidels, and some atheists. All are welcomed; all are admitted to equal rights and privileges. All are allowed to acquire property, and to vote in every election...All are allowed to worship as they please, or not to worship at all....

No man is molested for his religion or for his want of religion. No man is required to profess any form of faith, or to join any religious association. More than this cannot reasonably be demanded.

More, however, is demanded. The infidel demands that the government should be conducted on the principle that Christianity is false, the atheist demands that it should be conducted on the assumption that there is no God...the sufficient answer to all this is that it cannot possibly be done

Smith, Jedediah Strong (June 24, 1798-May 27, 1831), was an American trader and explorer. His expeditions were exceeded in importance only by those of Lewis and Clark. He helped lead expeditions up the Missouri River, with characters such as keelboatmen Mike Fink, Talbot, and Carpenter. He led expeditions across the Rocky Mountains, 1822-26; from California to the Oregon coast; across the Mojave desert and the Sierra Nevadas; and along the Santa Fe Trail, 1826-29. Jedediah Strong Smith, along with two other partners, operated the successful fur-trading company of Smith, Jackson and Sublette, in Salt Lake City.

Jedediah Strong Smith, who discovered the South Pass through the Rockies and established the first land route to California, noted in his journal:

Then let us come forward with faith, nothing doubting, and He will most unquestionably hear us....

On December 24, 1829, from Wind River on the east side of the Rocky Mountains, Jedediah Smith wrote to his parents in Ohio:

It is a long time since I left home & many times I have been ready, to bring my business to a close & endeavor to come home; but have been hindered hitherto....

However I will endeavor, by the assistance of Divine Providence, to come home as soon as possible...but whether I shall ever be allowed the privilege, God only knows, I feel the need of the watch & care of a Christian Church.

You may well suppose that our Society is of the roughest kind. Men of good morals seldom enter into business of this kind - I hope you will remember me before the Throne of Grace....

May God in His infinite mercy allow me soon to join My Parents in the Prayer of your undutiful Son, Jedediah S. Smith.

Jedediah Smith confided:

I have passed through the Country from St. Louis, Missouri, to the North Pacific Ocean, in different ways - through countrys of Barrenness & seldom one of the reverse, many Hostile Tribes of Indians inhabit this Space, and we are under the necessity of keeping a constant watch; notwithstanding our vigilance, we sometimes suffer;

In Augt. 1827 ten Men, who were in company with me, lost their lives, by the Amuchabas Indians, on the Colorado River; & in July 1828 fifteen men, who were in Company with me lost their lives, by the Umpquah Indians, on the River of the Same name, it enters the North Pacific, one hundred miles South of the Mouth of the Columbia - many others have lost their lives in different parts of the Country.

My Brother believe me, we have Many dangers to face & many difficulties to encounter, but if I am Spared I am not anxious with regard to difficulties - for particulars you must await a meeting....

As it respects my Spiritual welfare, I hardly durst Speak, I find myself one of the most ungrateful; unthankful, Creatures imaginable. Oh when Shall I be under the care of a Christian Church? I have need of your Prayers, I wish our Society to bear me up before the Throne of Grace....I remain as ever your affectionate Brother, Jedediah Smith Renowned for having escaped being killed by Indians numerous times, Jedediah was once mauled by a grizzly. While he was recovering apart from the camp, an Indian raid killed all the rest in his group. Arriving back at the camp, he found only a rifle, knife, flint, and his Bible. He let it fall open, and his eyes fell on a verse that would change his life:

He is chastened also with pain upon his bed, and the multitude of his bones with strong pain....Yes, his soul draweth near to the grave, and his life to the destroyers. His flesh shall be fresher than a child's; he shall return to the days of his youth. He shall pray unto God, and He will be favorable unto him.

A friend, Hugh Campbell, had written to Smith informing him of his brother Robert's serious illness. On November 24, 1830, Jedediah Strong Smith replied:

With pain did I peruse that part of your Epistle, which Speaks of the ill health off My much valued Friend - Oh is it possible I Shall never again See him in the Land of the living?

My Prayer to Almighty God, is, that I may again be allowed the Privilege of passing some time in company with my Friend -

On January 26, 1831, from the frontier city of St. Louis, population pushing 6,500, Jedediah S. Smith wrote to his brother Ralph Smith, in Wayne County, Ohio:

...Some difficulty occurred with regard to conveying the Property to Mr. F. as the river froze and the Mail Stage was at this season irregular....This is the last place to which youngsters should be sent... Austin had come by Water but the Ice stopped him at the mouth of Ohio, and he brought none of the letters....

Next My Brother comes the subject for which we live, are we ungrateful to that God in whom we live, and move, and have our being, how often ought we on our bended knees offer up our grateful acknowledgements for the gift of His Dear Son; is it possible that God "So loved the World that He gave His only begotten Son that whosoever believed on Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Then let us come forward with faith, nothing doubting and He will most unquestionably hear us - let us be often found in the means and take my word for it we Shall receive a blessing;

some, who have made a profession of Christianity & have by their own negligence caused the Spirit to depart think their day of grace is over; but where did they find Such doctrine?

I find our Saviour ever entreating & wooing us, using the most endearing language and endeavoring by every means without compelling, for that would at once destroy our free agency, to bring us to Him that we may have life. Are we doing our duty, do we regularly and without fail attend to Prayers & keep in mind that in due season we shall receive the Crown, if we faint not, oh! Let us be engaged & to that end let us take a view of what... another Poet Sings...

Lord, I believe a rest remains
To all Thy People known;
A rest, where pure enjoyment reigns,
And Thou art loved alone.

Well, My Brother, will it be for us if we have faith in those last lines and make use of it in Such a way that it may produce good works - Write soon my Brother, & give me any news which You may consider worth conveying, and believe me, as Ever your affectionate Brother, Jedediah S. Smith.

On May 27, 1831, Jedediah Smith, and his partner Sublette, were travelling towards Sante Fe' with 74 men and animals for 22 wagons. Starving and without water for four days, Jedediah left the party in search of water, when he encountered about 20 Comanche Indians. Seeing no way of escape, he boldly went up to them in hopes of conciliation. The Indians did not fire upon him as long as they were face to face, but when they succeeded in frightening his horse to turn, they shot Jedediah in the shoulder.

On September 24, 1831, his brother, Austin Smith, wrote from Walnut Creek on the Arkansas River relaying the report of Jedediah's death to their father in Ashtabula County, Ohio:

My Dear Father,

It is painful at all times to communicate the death of a friend, but when it falls to the lot of a son to communicate to a father the death of a Brother it is more so -

Your son Jedediah was killed on the Simerone River the 27th of May on his way to Sante Fe' by the Curmanch Indians, his party was in distress for water, and he had gone alone in search of the above river which he found, when he was attacked by fifteen of twenty of them -

They succeeded in alarming his animal not daring to fire on him so long as they kept face to face, so soon as his horse turned they fired, and wounded him in the shoulder. He then fired his gun, and killed their head Chief. It is supposed they then rushed upon him, and despatched him -

Such my father is the fate of him who you loved - I am convinced that this intelligence will grieve you much, but do not, my dear father, take it to heart too sorely, the Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away, blessed be His name.

He was kind who trusted, and confided, in the Giver of all good and may we not hope, that his religion, was true, and will be rewarded - Come unto Me all ye ends of the earth and ye shall be saved -

I am, dear father, your son forever, Austin Smith.

Kentucky Resolutions (November 16, 1798), stated:

III. Resolved, that it is true as a general principle, and is also expressly declared by one of the amendments of the Constitution that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people"; and that no power over the freedom of religion, freedom of speech, or freedom of the press being delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, all lawful power respecting the same did of right remain, and were reserved to the States, or to the people:

That thus was manifested their determination to retain to themselves the right of judging how far the licentiousness of speech and of the press may be abridged without lessening their useful freedom, and how far those abuses which cannot be separated from their use should be tolerated rather than the use be destroyed;

and thus also they guarded against all abridgement by the United States of the freedom of religious opinions and exercises, and retained to themselves the right of protecting the same, as this State, by a law passed on the general demand of its citizens, has already protected them from all human restraint or interference. . . .

Maryland Supreme Court (1799), decided the case of M'Creery's Lessee v. Allender, a dispute over whether an Irish emigrant, Thomas M'Creery, had become a naturalized American citizen and was thereby able to leave an estate to a relative who still lived in Ireland. The court decided in M'Creery's favor, based on a certificate executed before Justice Samuel Chase. The certificate reads:

Thomas M'Creery, in order to become . . . naturalized according to the Act of Assembly . . . on the 30th of September, 1795, took the oath . . . before the Honorable Samuel Chase, Esquire, then being the Chief Judge of the State of Maryland . . . and did then and there receive from the said Chief Judge, a certificate thereof. . . .

Maryland; I, Samuel Chase, Chief Judge of the State of Maryland, do hereby certify all whom it may concern, that... personally appeared before me Thomas M'Creery, and did repeat and subscribe a declaration of his belief in the Christian Religion, and take the oath required by the Act of Assembly of this State, entitled, "An Act for Naturalization."

Maryland Supreme Court (1799), in the case of Runkel v. Winemiller, rendered its opinion:

Religion is of general and public concern, and on its support depend, in great measure, the peace and good order of government, the safety and happiness of the people. By our form of government, the Christian religion is the established religion; and all sects and denominations of Christians are placed upon the same equal footing, and are equally entitled to protection in their religious liberty.

Choate, Rufus (October 1, 1799-July 13, 1859), was a lawyer, U.S. Representative from Massachusetts, 1831-34, and U.S. Senator, 1841-45. Before he was six years old, he had become so familiar with John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress as to repeat from memory large portions of it. Famous for his definition of a lawyer's vacation being "the space between a question to a witness and his answer," Rufus Choate was extremely fond of the Bible. He declared:

No lawyer can afford to be ignorant of the Bible.

Library of Congress (1800), was set up primarily to assist Congressmen in preparing laws, although it is open to all scholars. Burned by the British during the War of 1812, it was subsequently rebuilt. In 1897, it was relocated into its present building, and, in 1938, an annex was added. Numerous quotations from Scripture can be found within the walls of the Library of Congress. President Eliot of Harvard selected the following verse to be inscribed on the walls:

He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly and love mercy and walk humbly with thy God. (Micah 6:8)

The lawmakers' library has engraved the quote from the Psalmist:

The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth His handiwork. (Psalm 19:1)

Also inscribed is the verse:

The light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not. (John 1:5)

Fillmore, Millard (January 7, 1800-March 8, 1874), was the 13th President of the United States, 1850-53; Vice-President under Zachary Taylor, 1848-50, assuming the Presidency upon Taylor's death; sent Commodore Perry to Japan, opening the trade routes to the Far East; signed the Compromise Act of 1850; admitted California, which had just begun the Gold Rush, into the Union as a free state; when the Library of Congress caught fire, 1851, President Fillmore and his Cabinet formed a bucket brigade to extinguish the flames; president of the Buffalo Historical Society, 1862; married Caroline Carmichael McIntosh, 1858, after death of first wife; Comptroller of New York State, 1847; Chancellor of the University of Buffalo, 1846; U.S. Representative, 1833-35, 1837-45, becoming the Chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, 1840; member of New York State Legislature, 1828-31; married Abigail Powers, 1826; and admitted to bar 1823.

On July 9, 1850, after an illness of only 5 days, President Zachary Taylor died. Millard Fillmore, who had been Vice-President under President Taylor, informed Congress, Wednesday, July 10, 1850:

I have to perform the melancholy duty of announcing to you that it has pleased Almighty God to remove from this life Zachary Taylor, late President of the United States. He deceased last evening at the hour of half-past 10 o'clock, in the midst of his family and surrounded by affectionate friends, calmly and in the full possession of all his faculties. Among his last words were these: - "I have always done my duty. I am ready to die. My only regret is for the friends I leave behind me."

Having announced to you, fellow-citizens, this most afflicting bereavement, and assuring you that it has penetrated no heart with deeper grief than mine, it remains for me to say that I propose this day at 12 o'clock, in the Hall of the House of Representatives, in the presence of both Houses of Congress, to take the oath prescribed by the Constitution, to enable me to enter on the execution of the office which this event has devolved on me.

On Wednesday, July 10, 1850, after being sworn into office, President Millard Fillmore addressed Congress:

A great man has fallen among us, and a whole country is called to an occasion of unexpected, deep, and general mourning.

To you, Senators and Representatives of a nation in tears, I can say nothing which can alleviate the sorrow with which you are oppressed. I appeal to you to aid me, under the trying circumstances which surround me, in the discharge of the duties from which, however much I may be oppressed by them, I dare not shrink; and I rely upon Him who holds in His hands the destinies of nations to endow me with the requisite strength for the task and to avert from our country the evils apprehended from the heavy calamity which has befallen us.

On August 6, 1850, in an address to Congress, President Millard Fillmore stated:

It is plain, therefore, on the face of these treaty stipulations that all Mexicans established in territories north or east of the line of demarcation already mentioned come within the protection of the ninth article, and that the treaty, being a part of the supreme law of the land, does extend over all such Mexicans, and assures to them perfect security in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, as well as in the free exercise of their religion.

On Monday, December 2, 1850, in his First Annual Message to Congress, President Millard Fillmore stated:

Being suddenly called in the midst of the last session of Congress by a painful dispensation of Divine Providence to the responsible station which I now hold, I contented myself with such communications to the Legislature as the exigency of the moment seemed to require....

Nations, like individuals in a state of nature, are equal and independent, possessing certain rights and owing certain duties to each other, arising from their necessary and unavoidable relations; which rights and duties there is no common human authority to protect and enforce. Still, there are rights and duties, binding in morals, in conscience, and in honor.... The great law of morality ought to have a national as well as a personal and individual application. We should act toward other nations as we wish them to act toward us....

And now, fellow-citizens, I can not bring this communication to a close without invoking you to join me in humble and devout thanks to the Great Ruler of Nations for the multiplied blessings which He has graciously bestowed upon us. His hand, so often visible in our preservation, has stayed the pestilence, saved us from foreign wars and domestic disturbances, and scattered plenty throughout the land.

Our liberties, religious and civil, have been maintained, the fountains of knowledge have all been kept open, and means of happiness widely spread and generally enjoyed greater than have fallen to the lot of any other nation. And while deeply penetrated with gratitude for the past let us hope that His all-wise providence will so guide our counsels as that they shall result in giving satisfaction to our constituents, securing the peace of the country, and adding new strength to the united Government under which we live.

On Tuesday, December 2, 1851, in his Second Annual Message to Congress, President Millard Fillmore stated:

None can look back to the dangers which are passed or forward to the bright prospect before us without feeling a thrill of gratification, at the same time that he must be impressed with a grateful sense of our profound obligations to a beneficent Providence, whose paternal care is so manifest in the happiness of this highly favored land.

On December 6, 1852, in his Third Annual Message to Congress, President Millard Fillmore stated:

Our grateful thanks are due to an all-merciful Providence, not only for staying the pestilence which in different forms has desolated some of our cities, but for crowning the labors of the husbandman with an abundant harvest and the nation generally with the blessings of peace and prosperity....

Is it prudent or is it wise to involve ourselves in these foreign wars? Is it indeed true that we have heretofore refrained from doing so merely from the degrading motive of a conscious weakness? For the honor of the patriots who have gone before us, I can not admit it. Men of the Revolution, who drew the sword against the oppressions of the mother country and pledged to Heaven "their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor" to maintain their freedom, could never have been actuated by so unworthy a motive.... The truth is that the course which they pursued was dictated by a stern sense of international justice, by a statesmanlike prudence and a far-seeing wisdom, looking not merely to the present necessities but to the permanent safety and interest of the country....

Our own free institutions were not the offspring of our Revolution. They existed before. They were planted in the free charters of self-government under which the English colonies grew up, and our Revolution only freed us from the dominion of a foreign power whose government was at variance with those institutions. But European nations have had no such training for self-government, and every effort to establish it by bloody revolutions has been, and must without that preparation continue to be, a failure. Liberty unregulated by law degenerates into anarchy, which soon becomes the most horrid of all despotisms....

We owe these blessings, under Heaven, to the happy Constitution and Government which were bequeathed to us by our fathers, and which it is our sacred duty to transmit in all their integrity to our children.

President Millard Fillmore, who was a member of the Episcopalian Church, stated:

I owe my uninterrupted bodily vigor to an originally strong constitution, to an education of a farm, and to life-long habits of regularity and temperance. Throughout all my public life I maintained the same regular and systematic habits of living to which I had previously been accustomed. I never allowed my usual hours for sleep to be interrupted. The Sabbath day I always kept as a day of rest. Besides being a religious duty, it was essential to health. On commencing my Presidential career, I found that the Sabbath had frequently been employed by visitors for private interviews with the President. I determined to put an end to this custom, and ordered my doorkeeper to meet all Sunday visitors with an indiscriminate refusal.

May God save the country, for it is obvious the people will not.

Brown, John (May 9, 1800-December 2, 1859), was an abolitionist, reformer and northern martyr. In his efforts to free the slaves, he opened his barn in Pennsylvania as a station on the Underground Railroad, and even lived in a black community for a time. He also took extreme steps, most notably the killing of settlers who believed individuals had the choice of enslaving a human life, and the seizing of the government arsenal at Harper's Ferry, Virginia. He was captured, sentenced, and on December 2, 1859, he was hanged. Labeled insane by some, he was called Saint John the Just by Louisa May Alcott, author of Little Women.

At the end of a church service, in which the murder of the abolitionist publisher Elijah Lovejoy was recounted, John Brown stood up in the back of the church and declared:

Here, before God, in the presence of these witnesses, I consecrate my life to the destruction of slavery.

In a letter John Brown wrote:

I commend you all to Him "whose mercy endureth forever," to the God of my fathers, "whose I am, and whom I serve." "He will never leave you nor forsake you." Finally, my dearly beloved, be of good comfort!

Be sure to remember and follow my advice, and my example, too, so far as it has been consistent with the holy religion of Jesus Christ, in which I remain a most firm and humble believer.

Never forget the poor, nor think anything in them is to be lost in you, even though they may be black as Ebedmelech, the Ethiopian eunuch, who cared for Jeremiah in the pit of the dungeon; or as black as the one to whom Philip preached Christ.

McGuffey, William Holmes (September 23, 1800-May 4, 1873), was an American educator. He was the president of Ohio University, professor at the University of Virginia and the department chairman at the Miami University of Ohio. He was responsible for forming the first teachers' association in that part of the nation.

Considered the "Schoolmaster of the Nation," McGuffey published the first edition of his McGuffey's Reader in 1836. This book was the mainstay in public education in America till 1920. As of 1963, 125 million copies had been sold, making it one of the most widely used and influential textbooks of all times. Millions of American children learned to read and write from it.

In the foreword of McGuffey's Reader, 1836, William H. McGuffey wrote:

The Christian religion is the religion of our country. From it are derived our prevalent notions of the character of God, the great moral governor of the universe. On its doctrines are founded the peculiarities of our free institutions.

The Ten Commandments and the teachings of Jesus are not only basic but plenary.

McGuffey's Eclectic First Reader included a lesson "Evening Prayer":

At the close of the day, before you go to sleep, you should not fail to pray to God to keep you from sin and from harm. . . . You should ask your God for those things which he can give you, and which no one else can give you. You should ask him for life, and health, and strength; and you should pray to him to keep your feet from the ways of sin and shame. You should thank him for all his good gifts; and learn, while young, to put your trust in Him; and the kind care of God will be with you.

William Holmes McGuffey, in McGuffey's Fifth Eclectic Reader (Cincinnati and New York: Van Antwerp, Bragg & Co., revised edition, 1879), included Lesson XIII, "Respect for the Sabbath Rewarded":

In the city of Bath, not many years since, lived a barber who made a practice of following his ordinary occupation on the Lord's day. As he was on the way to his morning's employment, he happened to look into some place of worship just as the minister was giving out his text - "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy." He listened long enough to be convinced that he was constantly breaking the laws of God and man by shaving and dressing his customers on the Lord's day. He became uneasy, and went with a heavy heart to his Sabbath task....

He discontinued his Sabbath work, went constantly and early to the public services of religion, and soon enjoyed that satisfaction of mind which is one of the rewards of doing our duty, and that peace which the world can neither give nor take away....

Providence had now thrown him in his way in a most extraordinary manner, and he had great pleasure in transferring a great many thousand pounds to a worthy man, the rightful heir of the property. Thus was man's extremity God's opportunity.

William Holmes McGuffey, in McGuffey's Fifth Eclectic Reader (Cincinnati and New York: Van Antwerp, Bragg & Co., revised edition, 1879), included Lesson XXIII, "King Charles II and William Penn" by Mason L. Weems:

King Charles: How then will you get their lands?

William Penn: I mean to buy their lands of them.

King Charles: Buy their lands of them? Why, man, you have already bought them of me!...

William Penn: ...How can I, who call myself a Christian, do what I should abhor even in the heathen? No... I will buy the right of the proper owners, even of the Indians themselves. By doing this, I shall imitate God himself in his justice and mercy, and thereby insure His blessing on my colony, if I should ever live to plant one in North America.

William Holmes McGuffey, in McGuffey's Fifth Eclectic Reader (Cincinnati and New York: Van Antwerp, Bragg & Co., revised edition, 1879), included Lesson CII, "The Character of a Happy Life" by Sir Henry Wotton:

5. Who God doth late and early pray,
More of His grace than gifts to lend;
And entertains the harmless day
With a religious book or friend;
6. This man is freed from servile bands,
Of hope to rise, or fear to fall;
Lord of himself, though not of lands;
And having nothing, yet hath all.

William Holmes McGuffey, in McGuffey's Fifth Eclectic Reader (Cincinnati and New York: Van Antwerp, Bragg & Co., revised edition, 1879), included Lesson CI, "Little Victories," by Harriet Martineau:

1. O Mother, now I have lost my limb, I can never be a soldier or a sailor; I can never go round the world! And Hugh burst into tears, now more really afflicted than he had ever been yet. His mother sat on the bed beside him, and wiped away his tears as they flowed...

3. Hugh sighed, and his mother went on. "Did you ever hear of Beethoven? He was one of the greatest musical composers that ever lived. His great, his sole delight was in music. It was the passion of his life. When all his time and all his mind were given to music, he suddenly became deaf, perfectly deaf; so that he never more heard one single note from the loudest orchestra. While crowds were moved and delighted with his compositions, it was all silence to him."

6. "The pleasure of rousing the soul to bear pain, and of agreeing with God silently, when nobody knows what is in the breast. There is no pleasure like that of exercising one's soul in bearing pain, and of finding one's heart glow with the hope that one is pleasing God... Every time you can willingly give up your wish to be a soldier or a sailor, or any thing else you have set your mind upon, you will feel that pleasure"

17. "You will be a better scholar for your lameness, I have no doubt. You will read more books, and have a mind richer in thoughts. You will be more beloved by us all, and you yourself will love God more for having given you something to bear for his sake. God himself will help you to bear your trials. You will conquer your troubles one by one, and by a succession of LITTLE VICTORIES will at last completely triumph over all."

William Holmes McGuffey, in McGuffey's Fifth Eclectic Reader (Cincinnati and New York: Van Antwerp, Bragg & Co., revised edition, 1879), included Lesson LXVI, "Control Your Temper" by John Todd:

No one has a temper naturally so good, that it does not need attention and cultivation, and no one has a temper so bad, but that, by proper culture, it may become pleasant...

3. Look at Roger Sherman, who rose from a humble occupation to a seat in the first Congress of the United States, and whose judgment was received with great deference by that body of distinguished men. He made himself master of his temper, and cultivated it as a great business in life...

4. One day, after having received his highest honors, he was sitting and reading in his parlor. A roguish student, in a room close by, held a looking-glass in such a position as to pour the reflected rays of the sun directly in Mr. Sherman's face. He moved his chair, and the thing was repeated. A third time the chair was moved, but the looking-glass still reflected the sun in his eyes. He laid aside his book, went to the window, and many witnesses of the impudence expected to hear the ungentlemanly student severely reprimanded. He raised the window gently, and then - shut the window-blind!

5. I can not forbear adducing another instance of the power he had acquired over himself....Mr. Sherman was one of those men who are not ashamed to maintain the forms of religion in their families.

William Holmes McGuffey, in McGuffey's Fifth Eclectic Reader (Cincinnati and New York: Van Antwerp, Bragg & Co., revised edition, 1879), included Lesson XCIII, "Religion The Only Basis of Society" by William Ellery Channing:

1. Religion is a social concern; for it operates powerfully, contributing in various ways to its stability and prosperity. Religion is not merely a private affair; the community is deeply interested in its diffusion; for it is the best support of the virtues and principles, on which the social order rests. Pure and undefiled religion is, to do good; and it follows, very plainly, that if God be the Author and Friend of Society, then, the recognition of him must enforce all social duty, and enlightened piety must give its whole strength to public order....

2...How powerless conscience would become without the belief of a God...

5. Erase all thought and fear of God from a community, and selfishness and sensuality would absorb the whole man. Appetite, knowing no restraint, and suffering, having no solace or hope, would trample in scorn on the restraints of human laws. Virtue, duty, principle, would be mocked and spurned as unmeaning sounds. A sordid self-interest would supplant every feeling; and man would become, in fact, what the theory in atheism declares him to be, - a companion for brutes.

William Holmes McGuffey, in McGuffey's Fifth Eclectic Reader (Cincinnati and New York: Van Antwerp, Bragg & Co., revised edition, 1879), included Lesson CXIII, "A Picture of Human Life" by Samuel Johnson:

14. "But temptation succeeds temptation, and one compliance prepares us for another; we, in time, lose the happiness of innocence, and solace our disquiet with sensual gratifications. By degrees we let fall the remembrance of our original intention, and quit the only adequate object of rational desire. We entangle ourselves in business, immerse ourselves in luxury, and rove through the labyrinths of inconstancy till darkness of old age begins to invade us, and disease and anxiety obstruct our way. We then look back upon our lives with horror, with sorrow, and with repentance; and wish, but too often vainly wish, that we had not forsaken the paths of virtue."

William Holmes McGuffey, in McGuffey's Fifth Eclectic Reader (Cincinnati and New York: Van Antwerp, Bragg & Co., revised edition, 1879), included Lesson CXVI, "The Bible The Best of Classics" by Thomas S. Grimke':

1. There is a classic, the best the world has ever seen, the noblest that has ever honored and dignified the language of mortals. If we look into its antiquity, we discover a title to our veneration unrivaled in the history of literature. If we have respect to its evidences, they are found in the testimony of miracle and prophecy; in the ministry of man, of nature, and of angels, yea, even of "God, manifest in the flesh," of "God blessed forever."

2. If we consider its authenticity, no other pages have survived the lapse of time that can be compared with it. If we examine its authority, for it speaks as never man spake, we discover that it came from heaven in vision and prophecy under the sanction of Him who is Creator of all things, and the Giver of every good and perfect gift.

3. If we reflect on its truth, they are lovely and spotless, sublime and holy as God himself, unchangeable as his nature, durable as his righteous dominion, and versatile as the moral condition of mankind. If we regard the value of its treasures, we must estimate them, not like the relics of classic antiquity, by the perishable glory and beauty, virtue and happiness, of this world, but by the enduring perfection and supreme felicity of an eternal kingdom.

4. If we inquire who are the men that have recorded its truths, vindicated its rights, and illustrated the excellence of its scheme, from the depth of ages and from the living world, from the populous continent and the isles of the sea, comes forth the answer: "The patriarch and the prophet, the evangelist and the martyr."

5. If we look abroad through the world of men, the victims of folly or vice, the prey of cruelty, of injustice, and inquire what benefits, even in this temporal state, the great and the humble, the rich and the poor, the powerful and the weak, the learned and the ignorant reply, as with one voice, that humility and resignation, purity, order, and peace, faith, hope, and charity are its blessings upon earth.

6. And if, raising our eyes from time to eternity; from the world of mortals to the world of just men made perfect; from the visible creation, marvelous, beautiful, and glorious as it is, to the invisible creation of angels and seraphs; from the footstool of God to the throne of God himself, we ask, what are the blessings that flow from this single volume, let the question be answered by the pen of the evangelist, the harp of the prophet, and the records of the Book of Life.

7. Such is the best of classics the world has ever admired; such, the noblest that man has ever adopted as a guide.

William Holmes McGuffey, in McGuffey's Fifth Eclectic Reader (Cincinnati and New York: Van Antwerp, Bragg & Co., revised edition, 1879), included lesson CXVII, "My Mother's Bible" by George P. Morris:

1. This Book is all that's left me now,
Tears will unbidden start,
With faltering lip and throbbing brow
I press it to my heart.
For many generations past

Here is our family tree;
My mother's hand this Bible clasped,
She, dying, gave it me.

2. Ah! Well do I remember those Whose names these records bear;
Who round the hearth-stone used to close,
After the evening prayer,
And speak of what these pages said
In tones my heart would thrill!
Though they are with the silent dead,
Here are they living still!

3. My father read this Holy Book
To brothers, sisters, dear;
How calm was my poor mother's look,
Who loved God's Word to hear!
Her angel face, -I see it yet!
What thronging memories come!
Again that little group is met
Within the walls of home!

4. Thou truest friend man ever knew,
Thy constancy I've tried;
When all were false, I found thee true,
My counselor and guide.
The mines of earth no treasures give
That could this volume buy;
In teaching me the way to live,
It taught me how to die.

In 1837, In the preface of his Eclectic Third Reader, McGuffey wrote:

Selections, [have been] drawn from the purest fountains of English literature.... Copious extracts made from the Sacred Scripture.

Upon a review of the work... an apology may be due for not having still more liberally transferred to pages the chaste simplicity, the thrilling pathos, the living descriptions, and the matchless sublimity of the Sacred Writings.

From no source has the author drawn more copiously than from the Sacred Scriptures.... This certainly apprehends no censure. In a Christian country, that man is to be pitied, who, at this day, can honestly object to imbuing the minds of youth with the language and spirit of the Word of God.

McGuffey's Eclectic Third Reader, in Lesson 21, stated:

The morality of Jesus Christ was purer, sounder, sublimer and more perfect than had ever before entered into the imagination, or preceded from the lips of man.

In McGuffey's Newly Revised Rhetorical Guide, 1853, William Holmes McGuffey wrote:

If you can induce a community to doubt the genuineness and authenticity of the Scriptures; to question the reality, and obligations of religion; to hesitate, undeciding, whether there be any thing as virtue and vice; whether there be an eternal state of retribution beyond the grave; or whether there exists any such being as God, you have broken down the barriers of moral virtue, and hoisted the flood-gates of immorality and crime.

On August 7, 1873, upon William Holmes McGuffey's death, the National Education Association, Elmira, New York, stated:

In the death of William H. McGuffey, late Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Virginia, the Association feels that they have lost one of the great lights of the profession... in offices as teacher of common schools, college professor and college president, and as author of text books; his almost unequalled industry; his power in the lecture room; his influence upon his pupils and community; his care for the public interests of education; his lofty devotion to duty; his conscientious Christian character - all these have made him one of the noblest ornaments of our profession in this age, and entitled to the grateful remembrance of this Association and of the teachers of America.

Bancroft, George (October 3, 1800-January 17, 1891), was a historian, diplomat and educator. He served as Secretary of Navy under President Polk, 1845-46, directing the establishment of the U. S. Naval Academy at Annapolis, as well as the Naval Observatory at Washington, D. C. He served as U. S. Minister to Great Britain, 1846-49; and later Germany.

In 1834, he published the first volume of his ten-volume History of the United States, (1834-1876). This was the first comprehensive history of America written from its beginnings to the ratification of the Constitution. For more than 50 years it was the best-known and most widely read history of America. In 1882, he published the History of the Formation of the Constitution of the United States; and in 1885 he published History of the United States from the Discovery of America to the Inauguration of Washington.

In his History of the United States, Volume I, 1834, George Bancroft explained:

Puritanism had exalted the laity.... For him the wonderful counsels of the Almighty had appointed a Saviour; for him the laws of nature had been compelled and consulted, the heavens had opened, the earth had quaked, the Sun had veiled his face, and Christ had died and risen again.

From his address entitled, "The Progress of Mankind," published in his work Literary and Historical Miscellanies, George Bancroft declared:

For the regeneration of the world it was requisite that the Divine Being should enter the abodes and hearts of men and dwell there; that a belief in Him should be received which would include all truth respecting His essence; that He should be known, not as a distant Providence of boundless power and uncertain and inactive will, but as God present in the flesh....

Amid the deep sorrows of humanity during the sad conflict which was protracted during centuries for the overthrow of the past and the reconstruction of society, the consciousness of an incarnate God carried peace into the bosom of humanity....

This doctrine once communicated to man, was not to be eradicated. It spread as widely, as swiftly, and as silently as the light, and the idea of GOD WITH US dwelt and dwells in every system of thought that can pretend to vitality; in every oppressed people, whose struggles to be free have the promise of success; in every soul that sighs for redemption.

At the time of the Revolution, a full two-thirds of the population of America, estimated at 3,000,000 people, had been trained in the teachings of John Calvin: 900,000 were of Scotch or Scotch-Irish origin, 600,000 were Puritan English, 400,000 were German or Dutch Reformed, the Episcopalians had a Calvinistic confession in their Thirty-nine Articles, in addition to the numerous French Huguenots who had come to the western world. George Bancroft expressed:

He who will not honor the memory and respect the influence of Calvin knows little of the origin of American liberty.

Macaulay, Thomas Babington, Lord (October 25, 1800-December 28, 1859), was an English statesman, essayist, historian and poet. He was a member of Parliament, 1830-56, an eloquent debater, and he served on the Supreme Council in India. His writings were highly popular, as he made historical figures come alive with a vivid style. His works include the Lays of Ancient Rome and The History of England from the Accession of James II, 5 vols., 1849-61.

In his piece entitled, On John Dryden, 1828, Lord Macaulay stated:

The English Bible - a book which if everything else in our language should perish, would alone suffice to show the whole extent of its beauty and power.

In 1830, while commenting on Southey's edition of John Bunyan's classic book, Pilgrim's Progress, Lord Macaulay said:

That wonderful book, while it obtains admiration from the most fastidious critics, is loved by those who are too simple to admire it.

In On Lord Bacon, 1837, Lord Macaulay concluded:

To sum up the whole, we should say that the aim of the Platonic philosophy was to exalt man into a god.

Seward, William Henry (May 16, 1801-October 10, 1872), was Governor of the State of New York, 1839-43; U.S. Senator 1849-61; and Secretary of State under President Lincoln during the War between the States, 1861-65. Lincoln's assassins also attempted to kill him; one of John Wilkes Booth's accomplices broke into Seward's home and wounded him. He later served as Secretary of State under President Andrew Johnson, 1865-69, working to implement the "reconstruction" in the South.

Among his accomplishments was the negotiation of the purchase of Alaska from Russia, 1867. At the time it was mockingly called "Seward's Folly," as the land was thought to be of no use, but it later proved to be of tremendous worth.

William Henry Seward stated:

I do not believe human society, including not merely a few persons in any state, but whole masses of men, ever have attained, or ever can attain, a high state of intelligence, virtue, security, liberty, or happiness without the Holy Scriptures; even the whole hope of human progress is suspended on the ever-growing influence of the Bible.

William Henry Seward gave an oration entitled, The Destiny of America, in which he stated:

Shall we look to the sacred desk? Yes, indeed; for it is of Divine institution, and is approved by human experience. The ministers of Christ, inculcating Divine morals, under Divine authority, with Divine sanction, and sustained and aided by special cooperating influences of the Divine Spirit, are now carrying further and broadly onward the great work of the renewal of the civilization of the world, and its emancipation from superstition and despotism.

In 1836, as vice-president of the American Bible Society, William Henry Seward expressed:

I know not how long a republican government can flourish among a great people who have not the Bible; the experiment has never been tried; but this I do know: that the existing government of this country never could have had existence but for the Bible. And, further, I do, in my conscience, believe that if at every decade of years a copy of the Bible could be found in every family in the land its republican institutions would be perpetuated.

Farragut, David Glasgow (July 5, 1801-August 14, 1870), was an Admiral in the U.S. Navy, 1866. He had served as the Navy's first Rear Admiral, a rank he earned in 1862 by capturing New Orleans during the Civil War. He helped General Ulysses S. Grant capture Vicksburg in 1863, and then took command of a fleet to capture Mobile, Alabama, in 1864. Through tremendous fire, Farragut bravely forced his way into Mobile Bay, which was filled with mines (torpedoes), roaring his phrase, "Damn the torpedoes. Full steam ahead!"

In the Life and Letters of Admiral D.G. Farragut, written by his son, Loyall Farragut, Admiral David Glasgow Farragut declared that:

He never felt so near his Master as he did when in a storm, knowing that on his skill depended the safety of so many lives.

When David Glasgow Farragut was dangerously ill in Chicago he called for a clergyman to come and pray to the Lord with him, saying:

Massachusetts Grand Jury (1802), appointed by Judge Nathaniel Freeman, defined:

The laws of the Christian system, as embraced by the Bible, must be respected as of high authority in all our courts and it cannot be thought improper for the officers of such government to acknowledge their obligation to be governed by its rule...

[Our government] originating in the voluntary compact of a people who in that very instrument profess the Christian religion, it may be considered, not as republic Rome was, a Pagan, but a Christian republic.

The State of Massachusetts paid the salaries of the Congregational ministers in that state until 1833.

Hugo, Victor Marie (February 26, 1802-May 22, 1885), was a French author. He wrote: The Hunchback of Notre Dame, 1831; Les Contemplations, 1856; Les Misérables, 1862; Legend of the Centuries, 1859-83; and numerous other great works, was deeply involved in politics, and was exiled from France a number of times. Victor Marie Hugo avouched:

England has two books, the Bible and Shakespeare. England made Shakespeare, but the Bible made England.

Victor Hugo remarked:

Courage for the great sorrows of life, and patience for the small ones, and when you have laboriously accomplished your daily task, go to sleep in peace. God is awake.

Baxter, George (March 1802), was a professor at Washington Academy in Virginia. He published an account of his travels throughout Kentucky the previous November, giving particular attention to the religious revivals where taking place. With academic skepticism he researched the reports of what was later to be known as "The Second Great Awakening." Dr. Baxter's report, printed in the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, March of 1802, recounted:

The power with which this revival has spread, and its influence in moralizing the people, are difficult for you to conceive, and more so for me to describe...

I found Kentucky, to appearance, the most moral place I had ever seen. A profane expression was hardly ever heard. A religious awe seemed to pervade the country. Never in my life have I seen more genuine marks of that humility which... looks to the Lord Jesus Christ as the only way of acceptance with God.

I was indeed highly pleased to find that Christ was all and in all in their religion... and it was truly affecting to hear with what agonizing anxiety awakened sinners inquired for Christ, as the only physician who could give them any help.

Those who call these things "enthusiasm," ought to tell us what they understand by the Spirit of Christianity....

Upon the whole, sir, I think the revival in Kentucky among the most extraordinary that have ever visited the Church of Christ, and all things considered, peculiarly adapted to the circumstances of that country....

Something of an extraordinary nature seemed necessary to arrest the attention of a giddy people, who were ready to conclude that Christianity was a fable, and futurity a dream.

This revival has done it; it has confounded infidelity, awed vice to silence, and brought numbers beyond calculation under serious impressions.

Whitman, Marcus (September 4, 1802-November 29, 1847), was an American pioneer, doctor and missionary to the Indians in the Pacific Northwest. Dr. Marcus Whitman had practiced medicine for eight years in Rushville, New York, and in Canada before being appointed, in 1836, as a missionary-physician to Oregon, with his wife Narcissa, by the American Board of Foreign Missions. They set up missions at Waiilatpu near Walla Walla, Washington, and at Laowai.

In 1842-43, responding to a potential threat of closure, Dr. Marcus Whitman made a 4,000-mile trek east to persuade the Mission Board not to disband the mission. He also endeavored to interest the Government in settling the Oregon country and, in 1843, saw the first large wagon train head west on the Oregon Trail.

On July 3, 1923, just one month before his death, President Warren G. Harding delivered a speech in Meacham, Oregon, in remembrance of the Oregon Trail and the courageous missionaries to the Oregon and Washington territories. He unveiled a monument at Immigration Springs, and gave special recognition to the medical missionary Dr. Marcus Whitman, who, along with his wife, Narcissa, journeyed in 1836 to the Oregon territory. Dr. Marcus Whitman was also honored by the United States government with a statue in the U.S. Capitol Hall of Statuary for his key role in populating Oregon, which was vital in winning the boundary dispute with Great Britain, thereby bringing the territory under United States jurisdiction. President Warren G. Harding stated:

Of the many rooms in the White Houses, which possess the peculiar charm of association with epochal happenings, the one most fascinating to me is that which formerly comprised the Cabinet Room and the President's Study. Through its high windows one's gaze is drawn irresistibly to the towering granite shaft whose very grandeur, exceeded by no other moment in the world, admirably symbolizes the matchless character of George Washington. The beautifully carved mahogany bedposts are those upon which fell the eyes of Andrew Jackson when opened from the troubled slumber which even to this day occasionally falls to lot of an over-weary President. Sunk into the marble mantel piece is a bronze tablet recording the circumstance that it was in this room that Abraham Lincoln signed the great emancipation proclamation, which struck the shackles of slavery from millions of human beings.

Yet another episode of hardly less importance in the building of our mighty nation took place within these walls. Before my mind's eye as I stood in that heroic chamber a few days ago appeared the vivid picture. I beheld seated at his desk, immaculately attired, the embodiment of dignity and courtliness, John Tyler, tenth President of the United States. Facing him, from a chair constructed for a massive frame, his powerful spirit gleaming through his cavernous eyes, was the lion-visaged Daniel Webster, Secretary of State.

The door opened and there appeared before the amazed statesmen a strange and astonishing figure. It was that of a man of medium height and sturdy build, deep chested, broad shouldered, yet lithe in movement and soft in step. He was clad in a coarse fur coat, buckskin breeches, fur leggings, and boot moccasins, looking much worse for the wear. But it was the countenance of the visitor, as he stood for an instant in the doorway, that riveted the perception of the two Chiefs of State.

It was that of a religious enthusiast, tenaciously earnest yet revealing no suggestion of fanaticism, bronzed from exposure to pitiless elements and seamed with deep lines of physical suffering, a rare combination of determination and gentleness - obviously a man of God, but no less a man among men.

Such was Marcus Whitman, the missionary hero of the vast, unsettled, unexplored Oregon country, who had come out of the West to plead that the state should acquire for civilization the empire that the churches were gaining for Christianity.

Many of the exploits of America's resolute sons are recounted in prose and verse. How often in our youth, and even in later years, have we been thrilled by the story of how "on through the night rode Paul Revere, through every Middlesex village and farm" to call the Minute Men to embattle at Lexington and fire "the shot heard 'round the world!" How many times we have shuddered at the impending fate of the Shenandoah Valley with "Sheridan twenty miles away!" I loved the martial notes of those stirring verses as a boy. I still love them.

But, when I stood in that historic room in the White House and my imagination depicted the simple scene, I could not but feel that the magnificence of Marcus Whitman's glorious deed has yet to find adequate recognition in any form. Here was a man who, with a single companion, in the dead of winter [1842], struggled through pathless drifts and blinding storms, four thousand miles, with the sole aim to serve his country and his God. Eighty years and eight months ago he was pushing grimly and painfully through this very pass on his way from Walla Walla to Fort Hall, thence, abandoning the established northern route as impassable, off to the South through unknown, untrodden lands, past the Great Salt Lake, to Santa Fe, then hurriedly on to St. Louis and finally, after a few days, again on the home-stretch to his destination, taking as many months as it now takes days to go from Walla Walla to Washington.

It was more than a desperate and perilous trip that Marcus Whitman undertook. It was a race against time. Public opinion was rapidly crystallizing into a judgment that the Oregon country was not worth claiming, much less worth fighting for; that, even though it could be acquired against the insistence of Great Britain, it would prove to be a liability rather than an asset.

It is with sheer amazement that we now read the declarations of leading men of that period. So good an American, so sturdy a frontiersman, so willing a fighter, as General Jackson, shook his head ominously in fear lest the national domain should get too far outspread, and warned the country that its safety "lay in a compact government." Senator McDuffie, of South Carolina, declared he "would not give a pinch of snuff for the whole territory," and expressed the wish that the Rocky Mountains were "an impassable barrier." Senator Dayton, of New Jersey, said that, with very limited exceptions, "the whole country was as irreclaimable and barren a waste as the Sahara desert," and that malaria had carried away most of its native population. Even so far-seeing and staunch an advocate of western interests as Thomas Benton protested that the ridge of the Rockies should be made our western boundary, and avowed that "on the highest peak the statue of the fabled god, Terminus, should be erected, never to be thrown down."

Webster, although not definitely antagonistic, was uninterested and lukewarm. Years before he had pronounced Oregon "a barren, worthless country, fit only for wild beasts and wild men," and he was not one who changed opinions readily. But neither was Whittman one easily dismayed. Encouraged by the manifest friendliness of President Tyler, he portrayed with vivid eloquence the salubrity of the climate, the fertility of the soil, the magnitude of the forests, the evidences of ore in the mountains, and the splendor of the wide valleys drained by the great rivers. And he did not hesitate to speak plainly, as one who knew, even like the prophet Daniel.

"Mr. Secretary," he declared, "you would better give all New England for the cod and mackerel fisheries of Newfoundland than to barter away Oregon."

Then turning to the President, he added quietly but beseechingly:

"All I ask is that you will not barter away Oregon or allow English interference until I can lead a band of stalwart American settlers across the plains. For this I shall try to do!"

The manly appeal was irresistible. He sought only for the privilege of proving his faith. The just and considerate Tyler could not refuse.

"Doctor Whittman," he rejoined sympathetically, "your long ride and frozen limbs testify to your courage and your patriotism. Your credentials establish your character. Your request is granted!"

Whittman's strategy was true statesmanship. Substantial occupation would make good the claim of the United States, and that was what he had initiated during his few days in St. Louis. A few months later [1843] he had completed an organization of eager souls, and led the first movement by wagon train across plains and mountains along this unblazed trail.

What a sight that caravan must have appeared to the roaming savages! And what an experience for the intrepid pioneers!

More than two hundred wagons, bearing well-nigh a thousand emigrants, made up the party. They traveled by substantially the same route that Whitman had taken when he first went out to Oregon; from a rendezvous near what is now Kansas City they moved due northwest across northeast Kansas and southeast Nebraska to the Platte River; followed the Platte to the middle of what is now Wyoming, thence crossing the mountains by way of the Sweetwater Valley and the South Platte; and from Fort Hall, following the well-known route, roughly paralleling the Snake River, into Oregon. The difficulties of the trip, involving beside the two hundred wagons, the care of women and children, and of considerable herds of live stock, were such that its successful accomplishment seems almost miraculous.

But stern determination triumphed and the result was conclusive. Americans had settled the country. The country belonged to them because they had taken it; and in the end the boundary settlement was made on the line of the forty-ninth parallel, your great Northwest was saved, and a veritable Empire was merged in the young Republic.

Never in the history of the world has there been a finer example of civilization following Christianity. The missionaries led under the banner of the cross, and the settlers moved close behind under the star-spangled symbol of the nation.

Among all the records of the evangelizing efforts as the forerunner of human advancement, there is none so impressive as this of the early Oregon mission and its marvelous consequences.

To the men and women of that early day whose first thought was to carry the gospel to the Indians - to the Lees, the Spauldings, the Grays, the Walkers, the Leslies, to Fathers DeSmet and Blanchet and DeMars, and to all the others of that glorious company who found that in serving God they were also serving their country and their fellowmen - to them we pay today our tribute; to them we owe a debt of gratitude, which we can never pay, save partially through recognition such as you and I have accorded today....

I thank you from my heart for permitting me to participate in doing homage to those brave souls. I rejoice particularly in the opportunity afforded me of voicing my appreciation both as President of the United States and as one who honestly tries to be a Christian soldier, of the signal service of the martyred Whitman.

Ohio, State of (March 1, 1803), was the 17th State admitted to the Union. On August 7, 1789, President George Washington signed into law an Act of Congress which prohibited slavery from entering the territory, entitled "An Ordinance for the Government of the Territory of the United States, North-West of the River Ohio," Article VI. On April 30, 1802, President Thomas Jefferson signed The Enabling Act for Ohio, which required the government being formed in that territory to be:

...not repugnant to the [Northwest Ordinance].

The Northwest Ordinance stated:

SECTION 13. And, for extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, which form the basis whereon these republics, their laws and constitutions are erected: to fix and establish those principles as the basis of all laws, constitutions and governments, which forever hereafter shall be formed in the said territory: to provide also for the establishment of states, and permanent government therein, and for their admission to a share in the federal councils in an equal footing with the original states, at as early period as may be consistent with the general interest:

SECTION 14. It is hereby ordained and declared by the authority aforesaid, That the following articles shall be considered as articles of compact, between the original states and the people and states of the said territory, and forever remain unalienable, unless by common consent, to wit:

ARTICLE I. No person, demeaning himself in a peaceable and orderly manner, shall ever be molested on account of his mode of worship or religious sentiments in the said territory. . . .

ARTICLE III. Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged.

The Constitution of the State of Ohio, adopted November 1, 1802, stated:

Article VIII, Section 3. That all men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their conscience; that no human authority can, in any case whatever, control or interfere with the rights of conscience; that no man shall be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry, against his consent; and that no preference shall ever be given by law to any religious society or mode of worship, and no religious test shall be required, as a qualification to any office of trust or profit.

But religion, morality, and knowledge being essentially necessary to the good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of instruction shall forever be encouraged by legislative provision.

The Constitution of the State of Ohio, adopted 1852, stated:

Preamble. We the people of the state of Ohio, grateful to Almighty God for our freedom, to secure its blessings and to promote our common welfare, do establish our Constitution.

Bill of Rights, Article I, Section 7. All men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own conscience.

Emerson, Ralph Waldo (May 25, 1803-April 27, 1882), was the American poet who wrote the Concord Hymn, 1836. This poem made famous the Revolutionary War battle at Concord, Massachusetts, with the phrase "the shot heard around the world." Ralph Waldo

Emerson acknowledged:

All I have seen has taught me to trust the Creator for all I have not seen.

America is another name for opportunity. Our whole history appears like a last effort of divine Providence in behalf of the human race.

United States Congress (December 3, 1803), ratified A Treaty Between the United States and the Kaskaskia Tribe of Indians.
This treaty, which had been recommended by President Thomas Jefferson, included the annual support of a Catholic missionary priest of $100, to be paid out of the Federal treasury. At a later date two other treaties with similar provisions were made:
the Treaty with the Wyandots etc., in 1805 and the Treaty with the Cherokees in 1806. The treaty provided:

And whereas the greater part of the said tribe have been baptized and received into the Catholic Church, to which they are much attached, the United States will give annually, for seven years, one hundred dollars toward the support of a priest of that religion, who will engage to perform for said tribe the duties of his office, and also to instruct as many of their children as possible, in the rudiments of literature, and the United States will further give the sum of three hundred dollars, to assist the said tribe in the erection of a church.

Hawthorne, Nathaniel (July 4, 1804-May 19, 1864), was an American author and poet. He became famous through his novel, The Scarlet Letter, published in 1850. He was a friend of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow and Franklin Pierce, the 14th President of the United States. Other well-known works of his include: The House of Seven Gables, Twice-Told Tales, Blithedale Romance and Mosses from an Old Manse. In his poem, The Star of Calvary, Nathaniel Hawthorne wrote:

It is the same infrequent star,
 The all mysterious light,
That, like a watcher gazing on
 The changes of the night,
Toward the hill of Bethlehem, took
 Its solitary flight.

It is the same infrequent star;
 Its sameness startleth me;
Although the disk is red a-blood
 And downward silently
It looketh on another hill,
 The hill of Calvary.

Behold, O Israel! behold!
 It is no human One
That ye have dared to crucify.
 What evil hath he done?
It is your King, O Israel,
 The God-begotten Son!

In Ethan Brand, written in 1850, Nathaniel Hawthorne wrote:

"What is the Unpardonable Sin?" asked the Lime-burner....

"It is a sin that grew within my own breast," replied Ethan Brand.... "The sin of an intellect that triumphed over the sense of brotherhood with man and reverence for God."

Pierce, Franklin (November 23, 1804-October 8, 1869), was the 14th President of the United States, 1853-57; president of New Hampshire Constitutional Convention, 1850; Brigadier General in Mexican War, 1846-48; U.S. Senator, 1837-42; U.S. Representative, 1833-37; married Jane Means Appleton, 1834; member of the New Hampshire Legislature, 1829-33, being State Speaker of the House, 1831-33; admitted to bar, 1827; and graduated from Bowdoin College, 1824, being friends with Nathaniel Hawthorne and Henry Wadsworth Longfellow.

In 1839, while serving in the U.S. Senate, Franklin Pierce wrote to his law partner:

I have dwelt somewhat more this winter upon the truths of divine revelation than usual and perhaps have struggled somewhat harder to think and act in conformity with the precepts and commands of the New Testament than ever before - but with indifferent success as every man must who is not a humble and devoted Christian, to which character I can, I regret to say, make no pretension.

On Friday, March 4, 1853, only two months after his eleven year only son, Bennie, was killed as the campaign train they were riding rolled off the tracks, President Franklin Pierce delivered his Inaugural Address on the steps of the Capitol:

Our fathers decided for themselves, both upon the hour to declare and the hour to strike. They were their own judges of the circumstances under which it became them to pledge to each other "their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor" for the acquisition of the priceless inheritance transmitted to us. The energy with which that great conflict was opened was under the guidance of a manifest and beneficent Providence....

The dangers of a concentration of all power in the General government of a confederacy so vast as ours are too obvious to be disregarded. You have a right, therefore, to expect your agents in every department to regard strictly the limits imposed upon them by the Constitution of the United States. The great scheme of our constitutional liberty rests upon a proper distribution of power between the State and Federal authorities....

With the Union my best and dearest earthly hopes are entwined. Without it what are we individually or collectively? What becomes of the noblest field ever opened for the advancement of our race in religion, in government, in the arts, and in all that dignifies and adorns mankind....

It is with me an earnest and vital belief that as the Union has been the source, under Providence, of our prosperity to this time, so it is the surest pledge of a continuance of the blessings we have enjoyed, and which we are sacredly bound to transmit undiminished to our children....

But let not the foundation of our hope rest upon man's wisdom.... It must be felt that there is no national security but in the nation's humble, acknowledged dependence upon God and His overruling providence....

With all the cherished memories of the past gathering around me like so many eloquent voices of exhortation from Heaven, I can express no better hope for my country than that the kind Providence which smiled upon our fathers may enable their children to preserve the blessings they have inherited.

On Monday, December 5, 1853, in his First Annual Message to Congress, President Franklin Pierce stated:

While the different branches of the Government are to a certain extent independent of each other, the duties of all alike have direct reference to the source of power. Fortunately, under this system no man is so high and none so humble in the scale of public station as to escape from the scrutiny or to be exempt the responsibility which all official functions imply....

Although disease, assuming at one time the characteristics of a widespread and devastating pestilence, has left its sad traces upon some portions of our country, we have still the most abundant cause for reverent thankfulness to God for an accumulation of signal mercies showered upon us as a nation. It is well that a consciousness of rapid advancement and increasing strength be habitually associated with an abiding sense of dependence upon Him who holds in His hands the destiny of men and of nations.

Recognizing the wisdom of the broad principles of absolute religious toleration proclaimed in our fundamental law, and rejoicing in the benign influence which it has exerted upon our social and political condition, I should shrink from a clear duty if I failed to express my deepest conviction that we can place no secure reliance upon any apparent progress if it be not sustained by national integrity, resting upon the great truths affirmed and illustrated by Divine Revelation....

The Federal Government has its appropriate line of action in the specific and limited powers conferred on it by the Constitution, chiefly as to those things in which the States have a common interest in their relations to one another and to foreign governments, while the great mass of interests which belong to cultivated men - the ordinary business of life, the springs of industry, all the diversified personal and domestic affairs of society - rest securely upon the general reserved powers of the people of the several States....

Happily, I have no occasion to suggest any radical changes in the financial policy of the Government. Ours is almost, if not absolutely, the solitary power of Christendom having a surplus revenue drawn immediately from imposts on commerce.

On Monday, December 4, 1854, in his Second Annual Message, President Franklin Pierce stated:

In the present, therefore, as in the past, we find ample grounds for reverent thankfulness to the God of grace and providence for His protecting care and merciful dealings with us as a people. . . .

As individuals we can not repress sympathy with human suffering nor regret for the causes which produce it; as a nation we are reminded that whatever interrupts the peace or checks the prosperity of any part of Christendom tends more or less to involve our own. . . .

We have to maintain inviolate the great doctrine of the inherent right of popular self-government; to reconcile the largest liberty of the individual citizen with complete security of the public order; to render cheerful obedience to the laws of the land, to unite in enforcing their execution, and to frown indignantly on all combinations to resist them; to harmonize a sincere and ardent devotion to the institutions of religious faith with the most universal religious toleration. . . . whilst exalting the condition of the Republic, to assure to it the legitimate influence and the benign authority of a great example amongst all the powers of Christendom.

Under the solemnity of these convictions the blessings of Almighty God is earnestly invoked to attend upon your deliberations and upon all the counsels and acts of the Government, to the end that, with common zeal and common efforts, we may, in humble submission to the divine will, cooperate for the promotion of the supreme good of these United States.

On December 31, 1855, in his Third Annual Message to Congress, President Franklin Pierce stated:

I rely confidently on the patriotism of the people, on the dignity and self-respect of the States, on the wisdom of Congress, and, above all, on the continued gracious favor of Almighty God to maintain against all enemies, whether at home or abroad, the sanctity of the Constitution and the integrity of the Union.

On December 2, 1856, in his Fourth Annual Message to Congress, President Franklin Pierce stated:

I shall prepare to surrender the Executive trust to my successor and retire to private life with sentiments of profound gratitude to the good Providence which during the period of my Administration has vouchsafed to carry the country through many difficulties.

On Friday, January 16, 1857, President Franklin Pierce communicated to the Senate:

I communicate to the Senate herewith, for its constitutional action, a treaty made and concluded at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas Territory, on the 16th day of December, 1856, between Indian Agent Benjamin F. Robinson, commissioner on the part of the United States, the principal men of the Christian Indians, and Gottlieb F. Oehler, on behalf of the board of elders of the northern diocese of the Church of the United Brethren in the United States of America. Among the papers which accompany the treaty is a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, containing a recommendation, concurred in by the Secretary of the Interior, that the treaty be ratified.

Franklin Pierce was baptized on December 3, 1865. Shortly afterwards, he wrote to a friend:

I can repeat with more or less comfort, Thou art my God. My time is in Thy hand.

Disraeli, Benjamin (December 21, 1804-April 19, 1881), the 1st Earl of Beaconsfield, was Prime Minister of Britain, 1868, 1874-80. An accomplished author and diplomat, Benjamin Disraeli wrote:

The time will come when countless myriads will find music in the songs of Zion and solace in the parables of Galilee. . . . The pupil of Moses may ask himself whether all the princes of the House of David have done so much for the Jews as the Prince who was crucified?

Andersen, Hans Christian (April 2, 1805-August 4, 1875), was a Danish novelist and story-writer. He authored many fairy tales, including The Ugly Duckling, The Emperor's New Clothes and The Tinder Box. In his autobiography, entitled The Fairy Tale of My Life, 1855, Hans Christian Andersen wrote:

Depressed in spirit, I took up my Bible, which I lay before me, for an oracle; opened it, pointed blindly at a place, and read: "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself; but in Me is thine help." (Hosea.) Yes, Father, I am weak, but Thou lookest into my heart and wilt be my help.

Here also (Copenhagen) I obtained a place, after I had given seven pieces. The different periods of my life passed before me. I knelt down upon the stage and repeated our Lord's Prayer, just at the spot where I now sit amongst the first and distinguished men. Humility and prayer unto God for strength to deserve happiness, filled my heart. May He always enable me to preserve these feelings.

Hans Christian Andersen wrote what has become one of Denmark's best-known carols, entitled "Barn (Child) Jesus":

Child Jesus came to earth this day,
To save us sinners dying
And cradled in the straw and hay
The Holy One is lying.
The star shines down the child to greet,
The lowing oxen kiss his feet.
Hal l e l u j a h, Hal l e l u j a h, Chi l d Je s u s!

Take courage, Soul so weak and worn,
Thy sorrows have departed.
A Child in David's town is born,
To heal the broken hearted.

Then let us haste this child to find
And children be in heart and mind.
Hallelujah, Hallelujah, Child Jesus!

United States Congress (June 4, 1805), during Thomas Jefferson's presidency, drafted a Treaty of Peace and Amity with Tripoli, ratified April 12, 1806, in order to prevent the pirates of the North African Barbary Coast from seizing American ships, confiscating their cargo, and selling the crews and passengers as slaves. The United States had made a previous treaty with Tripoli and paid large sums of extortion money, but it failed when war broke out in 1801. Lieutenant Stephen Decatur (1779-1820) won fame by stealing into the Tripoli harbor on the small vessel Intrepid, February 16, 1804, burning a captured ship and escaping unharmed amidst fierce enemy fire. British Admiral Horatio Nelson called it the "most bold and daring act of the age." In April of 1805, the U.S. Marines seized the Barbary harbor of Derne, Tripoli, the daring act of which is remembered in the Marine Hymn "From the Halls of Montezuma to the Shores of Tripoli."

The June 4, 1805, Treaty of Tripoli, did not include a phrase that had been questionably inserted into the previous Treaty with Tripoli, June 7, 1797, that the United States "is not, in any sense founded on the Christian Religion..." (an insertion intended to clarify that the American government was not like the Mohammedan, Buddhist, or Hindu governments which controlled the religious life of its citizens and "that no pretext arising from religious opinions shall ever produce an interruption of the harmony existing between the two countries.") This phrase was not in the Arabic version of the 1797 treaty, and appears to have been an insertion by Joel Barlow (1754-1812), the American consul at Algiers who oversaw the translation process from Arabic to English. (Joel Barlow's position as American consul to Algiers was originally intended for the naval hero John Paul Jones, but he died before he could fill the appointment.)

The original Arabic translation of the 1797 treaty stated:

Glory be to God! Declaration of the third article.
We have agreed that if American Christians are traveling with a nation that is at war with the well-preserved Tripoli, and [the Tripolitan] takes [prisoners] from the Christian enemies and from the American Christians with whom we are at peace, then sets them free; neither he nor his goods shall be taken....

Praise be to God! Declaration of the twelfth article. If there arises a disturbance between us both sides, and it becomes a serious dispute, and the American Consul is not able to make clear his affair, and the affair shall remain suspended between them both, between the Pashna of Tripoli, may God strengthen him, and the Americans, until Lord Hassan Pashna, may God strengthen him, in the well-protected Algiers, has taken cognizance of the matter. We shall accept whatever decision he enjoins on us, and we shall agree with his condition and his seal; May God make it all permanent love and a good conclusion between us in the beginning and in the end, by His grace and favor, amen!

1805-April 16, 1859), was a French statesman, historian and social philosopher. He arrived in New York, May 11, 1831, with Gustave de Beaumont, and began a nine month tour of the country for the purpose of observing the American prison system, the people and American institutions. His two-part work, which was published in 1835 and 1840, was entitled Democracy in America. It has been described as "the most comprehensive and penetrating analysis of the relationship between character and society in America that has ever been written." In it, Alexis de Tocqueville related:

Upon my arrival in the United States the religious aspect of the country was the first thing that struck my attention; and the longer I stayed there, the more I perceived the great political consequences resulting from this new state of things, to which I was unaccustomed.

In France I had almost always seen the spirit of religion and the spirit of freedom marching in opposite directions. But in America I found they were intimately united and that they reigned in common over the same country.

Religion in America... must be regarded as the foremost of the political institutions of that country; for if it does not impart a taste for freedom, it facilitates the use of it. Indeed, it is in this same point of view that the inhabitants of the United States themselves look upon religious belief.

I do not know whether all Americans have a sincere faith in their religion - for who can search the human heart? - But I am certain that they hold it to be indispensable to the maintenance of republican institutions. This opinion is not peculiar to a class of citizens or a party, but it belongs to the whole nation and to every rank of society.

The sects that exist in the United States are innumerable. They all differ in respect to the worship which is due to the Creator; but they all agree in respect to the duties which are due from man to man.

Each sect adores the Deity in its own peculiar manner, but all sects preach the same moral law in the name of God....

Moreover, all the sects of the United States are comprised within the great unity of Christianity, and Christian morality is everywhere the same.

In the United States, if a political character attacks a sect, this may not prevent even the partisans of that very sect, from supporting him; but if he attacks all the sects together [Christianity], every one abandons him and he remains alone.

In the United States the sovereign authority is religious.... There is no country in the whole world where the Christian religion retains a greater influence over the souls of men than in America, and there can be no greater proof of its utility and of its conformity to human nature than that its influence is powerfully felt over the most enlightened and free nation of the earth.

America is still the place where the Christian religion has kept the greatest real power over men's souls; and nothing better demonstrates how useful and natural it is to man, since the country where it now has the widest sway is both the most enlightened and the freest.

The Americans show by their practice that they feel the high necessity of imparting morality to democratic communities by means of religion. What they think of themselves in this respect is a truth of which every democratic nation ought to be thoroughly persuaded.

I do not question that the great austerity of manners that is observable in the United States arises, in the first instance, from religious faith... its influence over the mind of woman is supreme, and women are the protectors of morals. There is certainly no country in the world where the tie of marriage is more respected than in America or where conjugal happiness is more highly or worthily appreciated...

In the United States the influence of religion is not confined to the manners, but it extends to the intelligence of the people...

Christianity, therefore reigns without obstacle, by universal consent; the consequence is, as I have before observed, that every principle of the moral world is fixed and determinate.

The safeguard of morality is religion, and morality is the best security of law as well as the surest pledge of freedom.

The Americans combine the notions of Christianity and of liberty so intimately in their minds, that it is impossible to make them conceive the one without the other; and with them this conviction does not spring from that barren traditional faith which seems to vegetate in the soul rather than to live.

They brought with them... a form of Christianity, which I cannot better describe, than by styling it a democratic and republican religion... From the earliest settlement of the emigrants, politics and religion contracted an alliance which has never been dissolved.

The Christian nations of our age seem to me to present a most alarming spectacle; the impulse which is bearing them along is so strong that it cannot be stopped, but it is not yet so rapid that it cannot be guided: their fate is in their hands; yet a little while and it may be no longer.

Alexis de Tocqueville wrote that there existed in America:

An ostensible respect for Christian morality and virtue. ... [and] almost all education is intrusted to the clergy.

In August of 1831, while traveling through Chester County in New York, Alexis de Tocqueville had the opportunity to observe a court case. He wrote:

While I was in America, a witness, who happened to be called at the assizes of the county of Chester (state of New York), declared that he did not believe in the existence of God or in the immortality of the soul. The judge refused to admit his evidence, on the ground that the witness had destroyed beforehand all confidence of the court in what he was about to say. The newspapers related the fact without any further comment. The New York Spectator of August 23d, 1831, relates the fact in the following terms:

"The court of common pleas of Chester county (New York), a few days since rejected a witness who declared his disbelief in the existence of God. The presiding judge remarked, that he had not before been aware that there was a man living who did not believe in the existence of God; that this belief constituted the sanction of all testimony in a court of justice: and that he knew of no case in a Christian country, where a witness had been permitted to testify without such belief."

Alexis de Tocqueville is attributed with the observations:

I think that the state of religion in America is one of the things that most powerfully helps us to maintain our republican institutions. The religious spirit exercises a direct power over political passions, and also an indirect power by sustaining morals... The destruction of the Christian religion... would be an irreparable ill for humanity.

Christianity is the companion of liberty in all its conflicts - the cradle of its infancy, and the divine source of its claims.

I sought for the key to the greatness and genius of America in her harbors and her ample rivers...; in her fertile fields and boundless forests...; in her rich mines and vast world commerce...; in her public school system and institutions of learning. I sought for it in her democratic Congress and in her matchless Constitution.

Not until I went into the churches of America and heard her pulpits flame with righteousness did I understand the secret of her genius and power.

America is great because America is good, and if America ever ceases to be good, America will cease to be great.

Francis J. Grund, a publicist who was a contemporary of Alexis de Tocqueville, wrote in his work The Americans in Their Moral, Social and Political Relations, 1837:

Although the most perfect tolerance exists with regard to particular creeds, yet it is absolutely necessary that a man should belong to some persuasion of other, lest his fellow-citizens should consider him an outcast from society. The Jews are tolerated in America with the same liberality as any denomination of Christians; but if a person were to call himself a Deist or an Atheist, it would excite universal execration. Yet there are religious denominations in the United States whose creeds are very nearly verging on Deism; but taking their arguments from the Bible, and calling themselves followers of Christ, they and their doctrines are tolerated, together with their form of worship.

Garrison, William Lloyd (December 10, 1805-May 24, 1879), was an abolitionist leader and the publisher of The Liberator, an anti-slavery paper in Boston. He founded the American Anti-Slavery Society in 1833 and suffered hundreds of threats upon his life for his politically incorrect stand that a human being was not property. In the face of pro-slavery government, laws, court decisions, public opinion, and even pseudo "scientific theories" that Negroes were "biologically inferior" and therefore denied the right to life and freedom, William Lloyd Garrison printed the first issue of The Liberator on January 1, 1831:

It is pretended, that I am retarding the cause of emancipation by the coarseness of my invective and the precipitancy of my measures. The charge is not true. On this question my influence, - humble as it is, - is felt at this moment to a considerable extent, and shall be felt in coming years - not perniciously, but beneficially - not as a curse, but as a blessing; and posterity will bear testimony that I was right.

I desire to thank God, that he enables me to disregard "the fear of man which bringeth a snare," and to speak his truth in its simplicity and power. And here I close with this fresh dedication:

veins,
"...I swear, while life-blood warms my throbbing
Still to oppose and thwart, with heart and hand,
Thy brutalizing sway - till Afric's chains
Are burst, and Freedom rules the rescued land,
Trampling Oppression and his iron rod:
Such is the vow I take - SO HELP ME GOD!"

In his writings, W. P. and F. J. T. Garrison, published 1885-89, William Lloyd Garrison explained:

Wherever there is a human being, I see God-given rights inherent in that being, whatever may be the sex or complexion.

Maury, Matthew Fontaine (January 14, 1806-February 1, 1873), was a scientist and pioneer hydrographer. He was known as the "Pathfinder of the Seas" for having charted the sea and wind currents while serving in the U. S. Navy. Considered the founder of modern hydrography and oceanography, he was Professor of Meteorology at Virginia Military Institute. In his book Physical Geography of the Sea, 1855, Matthew Maury wrote:

I have always found in my scientific studies, that, when I could get the Bible to say anything on the subject it afforded me a firm platform to stand upon, and a round in the ladder by which I could safely ascend.

As our knowledge of nature and her laws has increased, so has our knowledge of many passages of the Bible improved.

The Bible called the earth "the round world," yet for ages it was the most damnable heresy for Christian men to say that the world is round; and, finally, sailors circumnavigated the globe, and proved the Bible to be right, and saved Christian men of science from the stake.

And as for the general system of circulation which I have been so long endeavoring to describe, the Bible tells it all in a single sentence: "The wind goeth toward the South and returneth again to his circuits."

Engraved on his tombstone at the U.S. Naval Academy is the verse from Psalm 8 which had inspired him all his life:

Whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas.

Lee, Robert Edward (January 19, 1807-October 12, 1870), was a Confederate General during the Civil War. He was the son of the Revolutionary leader, "Light-Horse Harry" Lee, and the son-in-law of George Washington's adopted son, George Washington Parke Custis. Robert E. Lee and his wife, Mary Ann Randolph, inherited the 1,100 acre Washington estate directly across the Potomac from Washington, D.C. Tutored and home-schooled as a child, Robert E. Lee excelled at West Point, and distinguished himself in the Mexican-American War. From San Antonio, Texas, he engineered the American troops' passage across the difficult Mexican mountains so they could quickly take Mexico City.

Lee was against slavery and a number of years before the war he freed his own slaves. He was so highly respected, that when war looked imminent, President Abraham Lincoln offered him the Field Command of the U.S. Army. He struggled all night with his decision, finally resolving to the obligation of loyalty to his home state and the South. He resigned from the U.S. Army and in a letter to his sister, explained:

With all my devotion to the union and the feelings of loyalty and duty of an American citizen, I have not been able to make up my mind to raise my hand against my relatives, my children, my home.

On December 27, 1856, Robert E. Lee wrote to his wife:

Slavery as an institution is a moral and political evil in any country...I think, however, a greater evil to the white than to the black race...

The doctrines and miracles of our Saviour have required nearly two thousand years to convert but a small part of the human race, and even among the Christian nations what gross errors still exist!

General Robert E. Lee's His military expertise was so formidable that, for the first two years of the Civil War, it looked as if the South had won. General Stonewall Jackson's repeated victories kept pushing the North back until Lee's troops were dangerously close to attacking Washington, D.C., itself. On December 25, 1862, General Robert E. Lee wrote to his wife from Fredericksburg, Virginia:

My heart is filled with gratitude to Almighty God for his unspeakable mercies with which He has blessed us in this day. For those He granted us from the beginning of life, and particularly for those He has vouchsafed us during the past year. What should have become of us without His crowning help and protection?

Oh, if our people would only recognize it and cease from self-boasting and adulation, how strong would be my belief in the final success and happiness to our country! But what a cruel thing is war; to separate and destroy families and friends, and mar the purest joys and happiness God has granted us in this world; to fill our hearts with hatred instead of love for our neighbors, to devastate the fair face of this beautiful world!

I pray that on this day when only peace and goodwill are preached to mankind, better thoughts may fill the hearts of our enemies and turn them to peace.

On May 31, 1863, General Robert E. Lee wrote to his wife as he prepared the Confederate Army of Northern Virginia for its next major northern thrust:

I pray that our merciful Father in heaven may protect and direct us. In that case I fear no odds and no numbers.

On April 8, 1864, General Robert E. Lee issued orders for his troops to observe the Day of Fasting, Humiliation and Prayer that had been proclaimed:

Soldiers! Let us humble ourselves before the Lord, our God, asking through Christ, the forgiveness of our sins, beseeching the aid of the God of our forefathers in the defense of our homes and our liberties, thanking Him for His past blessings, and imploring their continuance upon our cause and our people.

General Robert E. Lee wrote:

Knowing that intercessory prayer is our mightiest weapon and the supreme call for all Christians today, I pleadingly urge our people everywhere to pray. Believing that prayer is the greatest contribution that our people can make in this critical hour, I humbly urge that we take time to pray - to really pray.

Let there be prayer at sunup, at noonday, at sundown, at midnight - all through the day. Let us pray for our children, our youth, our aged, our pastors, our homes. Let us pray for our churches.

Let us pray for ourselves, that we may not lose the word "concern" out of our Christian vocabulary. Let us pray for our nation. Let us pray for those who have never known Jesus Christ and redeeming love, for moral forces everywhere, for our national leaders. Let prayer be our passion. Let prayer be our practice.

General Lee once remarked to Chaplain John William Jones regarding the Bible:

There are things in the old Book which I may not be able to explain, but I fully accept it as the infallible Word of God, and receive its teachings as inspired by the Holy Spirit.

General Robert E. Lee was visited in his tent by Chaplain J. William Jones and General Stonewall Jackson's Chaplain, B. T. Lacey. They told the General that all the chaplains were praying for him. As Jones recorded, tears came to General Lee's eyes as he said:

Please thank them for that, sir - I warmly appreciate it. And I can only say that I am nothing but a poor sinner, trusting in Christ alone for salvation, and need all of the prayers they can offer me.

One night around the campfire, Chaplain Jones overheard some soldiers discussing the recent invention of the theory of evolution, when one soldier replied:

Well, boys, the rest of us may have developed from monkeys; but I tell you, none the less than God could have made such a man as Marse Robert.

Near the final end of the War, after such a tremendous loss of life, one of Lee's generals suggested rallying more recruits to the Confederate cause. General Lee responded:

General, you and I as Christian men... must consider its effects on the country as a whole. Already it is demoralized by four years of war. If I took your advice, the men... would become mere bands of marauders, and the enemy's cavalry would pursue them and overrun many wide sections... We would bring on a state of affairs it would take the country years to recover from.

General Robert E. Lee surrendered to General Ulysses S. Grant on April 9, 1865 at Appomattox, Virginia. Lee took off his sword and handed it to Grant, and Grant handed it back.

The next day, April 10, 1865, General Robert E. Lee issued his final order from his headquarters to the Army of Northern Virginia:

After four years of arduous service, marked by unsurpassed courage and fortitude, the Army of Northern Virginia has been compelled to yield to overwhelming numbers and resources... I have determined to avoid the useless sacrifice of those whose past services have endeared them to their countrymen. By the terms of the agreement, officers and men can return to their homes... I earnestly pray that a merciful God will extend to you His blessing and protection.

Robert E. Lee confided:

In all my perplexities and distresses, the Bible has never failed to give me light and strength.

In a church service on June 4, 1865, as reported by Colonel T. L. Broun, there was a shock when a Negro advanced to the communion table. But then:

[General Robert E. Lee] arose in his usual dignified and self-possessed manner... and reverently knelt down to partake of the communion, not far from the Negro.

In June of 1865, Robert E. Lee was indicted for treason by the U.S. Grand Jury in Norfolk, Virginia. When some friends voiced their indignation, Lee calmly responded:

I have fought against the people of the North because I believed they were seeking to wrest from the South dearest rights. But I have never cherished toward them bitter or vindictive feelings, and have never seen the day when I did not pray for them.

After the war, a southern clergyman spoke critically of the recent actions of the federal government. Following a pause, Robert E. Lee asked:

Doctor, there is a good old book which... says "Love your enemies." Do you think your remarks this evening were quite in the spirit of that teaching?

In August of 1865, Robert E. Lee accepted the invitation to become the President of Washington College at Lexington, Virginia, (later changed to Washington and Lee University, in his honor). In 1869, Robert E. Lee invited his former chaplain, John William Jones to speak. In thanking him, Lee remarked:

Oh, doctor, if I could only know that all the young men in this College were good Christians I should have nothing more to desire.

I wish, sir, to thank you for your address. It was just what we needed. Our great want is a revival which shall bring these young men to Christ.

I should be disappointed, sir, and shall fail in the leading object that brought me here, unless these young men all become Christians; and I wish you and others of your sacred profession to do all you can to accomplish it.

We poor sinners need to come back from our wanderings to seek pardon through the all-sufficient merits of our Redeemer. And we need to pray earnestly for the power of the Holy Spirit to give us a precious revival in our hearts and among the unconverted.

Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth (February 27, 1807-March 24, 1882), was an American poet. He served for 20 years as Professor of Belles-Lettres at Harvard University, 1834-54. He wrote such poems as: Evangeline, 1847; The Song of Hiawatha, 1855; The Courtship of Miles Standish, 1858; and Paul Revere's Ride, 1861. In his brother's Ordination Hymn, Longfellow wrote:

Christ to the young man said:
"Yet one thing more:
If thou wouldst perfect be,
Sell all thou hast, and give it to the poor,
And come and follow me!"

Within this temple Christ again, unseen,
Those sacred words hath said,
And His invisible hands to-day have been Laid upon a young man's head.

And evermore beside him on his way
The unseen Christ shall move,
That he may lean upon His arm and say,
"Dost Thou, dear Lord, approve?"

Beside him at the marriage feast shall be
To make the scene more fair:
Beside him in the dark Gethsemane
Of pain and midnight prayer.

O holy trust! O endless sense of rest!
Like the beloved John
To lay his head upon our Saviour's breast,
And thus to journey on.

Henry Wadsworth Longfellow remarked:

Man is unjust, but God is just; and finally justice triumphs.

Nothing with God can be accidental.

For me, a line from mother is more efficacious than all the homilies preached in Lent.

Gari bal di, Gi useppe (July 4, 1807-June 2, 1882), was an Italian general and nationalist leader. He freed Italy from foreign rule and saw Rome once again become it capital. Of the Bible, General Gari bal di said:

This is the cannon that will make Italy free.

In his Autobiography, General Gi useppe Gari bal di wrote:

I am a Christian, and I speak to Christians - I am a true Christian, and I speak to true Christians. I love and venerate the religion of Christ, because Christ came into the world to deliver humanity from slavery, for which God had not created it... You who are here - you, the educated and cultivated portion of the citizenship - you have the duty to educate the people - educate the people - educate them to be Christians - educate them to be Italians... Viva Italia! Viva Christianity!

Whittier, John Greenleaf (December 17, 1807-September 7, 1892), was an American poet. He was known as the "Quaker Poet," as his faith was exhibited in his life and poetry. He wrote Panorama, in 1856, which included the favorites "Barefoot Boy," and "Maud Muller." His other renowned works include: Song of the Vermonters, 1779; Lays of My Home and other poems, 1843; Voices of Freedom, 1846; Snowbound, 1866; Justice and Expediency; Dear Lord and Father of Mankind.

He was the editor of the American Manufacturer, the Essex Gazette, The Pennsylvania Freeman, and the National Era. He bitterly opposed slavery, to the extent that once he was mobbed and severely beaten during a speaking tour. Later his office in Philadelphia was burned. John Greenleaf Whittier, one of the first to suggest the creation of a Republican Party, wrote:

I believe in the Scriptures because they repeat the warnings and promises of the indwelling Light and Truth; I find in them the eternal precepts of the Divine Spirit declared and repeated. They testify of Christ within. . . .

My ground of hope for myself and for humanity is in that Divine fullness which was manifested in the life, teachings, and self-sacrifice of Christ. In the infinite mercy of God so revealed, and not in any work or merit of my own nature, I humbly, yet very hopefully, trust.

In 1876, one hundred years after the signing of the Declaration of Independence and shortly after the Civil War had ended, John Greenleaf Whittier wrote his Centennial Hymn:

We meet today, united free,
And loyal to our land and Thee,
To thank Thee for the era done,
And trust Thee for the opening one.

O make Thou us, through centuries long,
In peace secure, in justice strong;
Around our gift of freedom draw
The safeguards of Thy righteous law:
And, cast in some diviner mould,
Let the new cycle shame the old!

In poetic verse, John Greenleaf Whittier expressed:

The Word of God

Voice of the Holy Spirit, making known
Man to himself, a witness swift and sure,
Warning, approving, true and wise and pure,
Counsel and guidance that misleadeth none!
By Thee the mystery of Life is read;
The picture writing of the world's gray seers,
The myths and parables of the primal years,
Whose letter kills, by thee interpreted
Take healthful meanings fitted to our needs,
And in the soul's vernacular express
The common law of simple righteousness.
Hatred of cant and doubt of human creeds
May well be felt the unpardonable sin
Is to deny the Word of God within!

Our Master

We may not climb the heavenly steeps
To bring the Lord Christ down;
In vain we search the lowest deeps,
For Him no depths can drown.

O Lord and Master of us all!
Whate'er our name or sign,
We own Thy sway, we hear Thy call,
We test our lives by Thine.

Deep strike Thy roots, O heavenly Vine,
Within our earthly sod,
Most human and yet most Divine,
The flower of Man and God!

Chase, Salmon Portland (January 13, 1808-May 7, 1873), was the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury under President Lincoln. He served as the Governor of Ohio, a U.S. Senator and was appointed by President Abraham Lincoln as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. He was a strong opponent of slavery, defending so many escaped slaves when he first started practicing law that he was given the nickname "Attorney-General of Fugitive Slaves."

On November 20, 1861, Secretary of the Treasury Salmon Portland Chase wrote to the Director of the Mint in Philadelphia:

Dear Sir,

No nation can be strong except in the strength of God or safe except in His defense. The trust of our people in God should be declared on our national coins.

You will cause a device to be prepared without unnecessary delay with a motto expressing in the fewest and tersest words possible this national recognition.

Yours truly,

(Sgd). S. P. Chase

On December 9, 1863, Secretary of the Treasury Salmon Portland Chase, wrote to the Director of the Mint, James Pollock:

I approve your mottos, only suggesting that on that with the Washington obverse, the motto should begin with the word "Our," so as to read:

"Our God and our Country." And on that with the shield, it should be changed so as to read: "In God We Trust."

On March 3, 1865, the Congress of the United States of America approved the Treasury Secretary Salmon Portland Chase's instruction to the U.S. mint to prepare a "device" to inscribe U.S. coins with the motto:

In God We Trust.

Salmon Portland Chase declared:

Give me solid and substantial religion; give me an humble, gentle lover of God and man; a man full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy; a man laying himself out in the works of faith, the patience of hope, the labor of love. Let my soul be with those Christians, wheresoever they are, and whatsoever opinion they are of.

When shall I be thoroughly imbued with a humble, self-denying, holy spirit? O Lord, my Saviour, do Thou assist and teach me!...

Today I rose too late; attended private and family prayers; afterwards read several chapters in Leviticus, having again began to read the Scriptures in course, intending to read the Old Testament in private, and the New with the family. It is my deliberate opinion that all the writings of all moral and political writers do not contain so much practical wisdom, whether applicable to state or persons.

Strong, William (May 6, 1808-August 19, 1895), was an Associate Justice of U.S. Supreme Court, 1870-80. He had previously served his country as a U. S. Representative, 1847-51, and as a justice on the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1857-68. He was president of the American Sunday School Union, 1883-95, and president of the American Tract Society, 1873-95. Justice William Strong stated:

You ask me what I think of Christ? He is the Chiefest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely - my Lord, my Saviour, and my God.

What do I think of the Bible? It is the infallible Word of God, a light erected all along the shores of time to warn against the rocks and breakers, and to show the only way to the harbor of eternal rest.

Smith, Samuel Francis (October 21, 1808-November 16, 1895), was an American poet and clergyman. In 1832, he wrote the patriotic hymn, My Country 'Tis Of Thee. He graduated from Harvard University in the same class as the poet Oliver Wendell Holmes, and continued through seminary, becoming a Baptist minister and professor of modern languages at Waterville College.

He edited The Christian Review and devoted much time to helping the American Baptist Missionary Union. As a 23 year old seminary student, Samuel was inspired after hearing the national anthems for England, Sweden and Russia, and within a half hour wrote:

My Country 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing;
Land where my fathers died,
Land of the Pilgrim's pride,
From every mountainside,
Let freedom ring.

The fourth verse proclaims:

Our fathers' God, to thee,
Author of liberty,
To Thee we sing;
Long may our land be bright
With freedom's holy light:
Protect us by Thy might,
Great God, our King.

Johnson, Andrew (December 29, 1808-July 31, 1875), was the 17th President of the United States, 1865-69; Vice-President under Abraham Lincoln, assuming the Presidency upon Lincoln's assassination; continued Lincoln's plan of Reconstruction for the South, pardoned those who had seceded, granted voting rights for all Blacks; acquitted of impeachment accusations, 1868; U. S. Senator, 1874-75; Military Governor of Tennessee, 1862-65; U. S. Senator, 1857-62; Governor of Tennessee, 1853-57; U. S. Representative, 1843-53; Tennessee State Senator, 1841-43; Tennessee State Representative, 1839-41, 1835-37; Mayor of Greenville, 1830-33; Alderman, 1828-30; married Eliza McCordle, 1827; and opened a tailor shop in Greenville, Tennessee, 1826.

In an address upon assuming the Presidency, April 15, 1865, President Andrew Johnson stated:

Duties have been mine; consequences are God's.

On Tuesday, April 25, 1865, President Andrew Johnson issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Humiliation and Mourning:

Whereas, by my direction, the Acting Secretary of State, in a notice to the public of the 17th, requested the various religious denominations to assemble on the 19th instant, on the occasion of the obsequies of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States, and to observe the same with appropriate ceremonies; but

Whereas our country has become one great house of mourning, where the head of the family has been taken away, and believing that a special period should be assigned for again humbling ourselves before Almighty God, in order that the bereavement may be sanctified to the nation:

Now, therefore, in order to mitigate that grief on earth which can only be assuaged by communion with the Father in heaven, and in compliance with the wishes of Senators and Representatives in Congress, communicated to me by resolutions adopted at the National Capitol, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do hereby appoint Thursday, the 25th day of May next, to be observed, wherever in the United States the flag of the country may be respected, as a day of humiliation and mourning, and I recommend my fellow-citizens then to assemble in their respective places of worship, there to unite in solemn service to Almighty God in memory of the good man who has been removed, so that all shall be occupied at the same time in contemplation of his virtues and in sorrow for his sudden and violent end.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, the 25th day of April, A. D. 1865, and of the Independence of the United States of America the eighty-ninth. Andrew Johnson.

By the President: W. Hunter, Acting Secretary of State.

On April 29, 1865, President Andrew Johnson issued recommendations regarding the Proclamation of a National Day of Humiliation and Prayer:

Whereas by my proclamation of the 25th instant Thursday, the 25th day of next month, was recommended as a day for special humiliation and prayer in consequence of the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States; but

Whereas my attention has since been called to the fact that the day aforesaid is sacred to large numbers of Christians as one of rejoicing for the ascension of the Savior:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do hereby suggest that the religious services recommended as aforesaid should be postponed until Thursday, the 1st day of June next.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 29th day of April, A. D. 1865, and of the Independence of the United States of America the eighty-ninth. Andrew Johnson.

By the President: W. Hunter, Acting Secretary of State.

On May 31, 1865, from his Executive Office in Washington, D. C., President Andrew Johnson wrote:

To-morrow, the 1st of June, being the day appointed for special humiliation and prayer in consequence of the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States, the Executive Office and the various Departments will be closed during the day.

On October 28, 1865, President Andrew Johnson issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving:

Whereas it has pleased Almighty God during the year which is now coming to an end to relieve our beloved country from the fearful scourge of civil war and to permit us to secure the blessings of peace, unity, and harmony, with a great enlargement of civil liberty; and

Whereas our Heavenly Father has also during the year graciously averted from us the calamities of foreign war, pestilence, and famine, while our granaries are full of the fruits of an abundant season; and

Whereas righteousness exalteth a nation, while sin is a reproach to any people:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do hereby recommend to the people thereof that they do set apart and observe the first Thursday of December next as a day of national thanksgiving to the Creator of the Universe for these great deliverances and blessings.

And I do further recommend that on that occasion the whole people make confession of our national sins against His infinite goodness, and with one heart and one mind implore the divine guidance in the ways of national virtue and holiness.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 28th day of October, A. D. 1865, and of the Independence of the United States of America the ninetieth. Andrew Johnson.

By the President: William H. Seward, Secretary of State.

On December 4, 1865, in commencing the 1865-66 session, President Andrew Johnson delivered his First Annual Message to Congress:

To express gratitude to God in the name of the people for the preservation of the United States is my first duty in addressing you. Our thoughts next revert to the death of the late President by an act of parricidal treason. The grief of the nation is still fresh. It finds some solace in the consideration that he lived to enjoy the highest proof of its confidence by entering on the renewed term of the Chief Magistracy to which he had been elected; that he brought the civil war substantially to a close; that his loss was deplored in all parts of the Union, and that foreign nations have rendered justice to his memory....

When, on the organization of our Government under the Constitution, the President of the United States delivered his Inaugural Address to the two Houses of Congress, he said to them, and through them to the country and to mankind, that:

"The preservation of the sacred fire of liberty and the destiny of the republican model of government are justly considered, perhaps, as deeply, as finally, staked on the experiment intrusted to the hands of the American people."

And the House of Representatives answered Washington by the voice of Madison:

"We adore the Invisible Hand which has led the American people, through so many difficulties, to cherish a conscious responsibility for the destiny of republican liberty."...

Who of them will not acknowledge, in the words of Washington, that "every step by which the people of the United States have advanced to the character of an independent nation seems to have been distinguished by some token of providential agency"? Who will not join with me in the prayer that the Invisible Hand which has led us through the clouds that gloomed around our path will not so guide us onward to a perfect restoration of fraternal affection that we of this day may be able to transmit our great inheritance of State governments in all their rights, of General Government in its whole constitutional vigor, to our posterity, and they to theirs through countless generations?

On Monday, October 8, 1866, President Andrew Johnson issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving and Praise:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, has been pleased to vouchsafe to us as a people another year of that national life which is an indispensable condition of peace, security, and progress. That year has, moreover, been crowned with many peculiar blessings.

The civil war that so recently closed among us has not been anywhere reopened; foreign intervention has ceased to excite alarm or apprehension; intrusive pestilence has been benignly mitigated; domestic tranquility has improved, sentiments of conciliation have largely prevailed, and affections of loyalty and patriotism have been widely renewed; our fields have yielded quite abundantly, our mining industry has been richly rewarded, and we have been allowed to extend our railroad system far into the interior recesses of the country, while our commerce has resumed its customary activity in foreign seas.

These great national blessings demand a national acknowledgement.

Now, therefore, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do hereby recommend that Thursday, the 29th day of November next, be set apart and be observed everywhere in the several States and Territories of the United States by the people thereof as a day of thanksgiving and praise to Almighty God, with due remembrance that "in His temple doth every man speak of His honor."

I recommend also that on the same solemn occasion they do humbly and devoutly implore Him to grant to our national councils and to our whole people that divine wisdom which alone can lead any nation into the ways of good.

In offering these national thanksgivings, praises, and supplications we have the divine assurance that "the Lord remaineth a king forever; them that are meek shall He guide in judgement and such as are gentle shall He learn His way; the Lord shall give strength to His people, and the Lord shall give to His people the blessing of peace."

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 8th day of October, A.D. 1866, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-first. Andrew Johnson.

On March 23, 1867, President Andrew Johnson concluded a Veto Message:

I pray God that the errors of the past may be forgotten and that once more we shall be a happy, united, and prosperous people.

On Saturday, September 7, 1867, President Andrew Johnson issued a Proclamation of Amnesty and Pardon to the participants of the Confederate insurrection:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do hereby proclaim and declare that the full pardon described in the said proclamation of the 29th day of May, A.D. 1865, shall henceforth be opened and extended to all persons who, directly or indirectly, participated in the late rebellion, with the restoration of all privileges, immunities, and rights of property, except as to property with regard to slaves, and except in cases of legal proceedings under the laws of the United States; but upon this condition, nevertheless, that every person who shall seek to avail himself of this proclamation shall take and subscribe the following oath and shall cause the same to be registered for permanent preservation in the same manner and with the same effect as with the oath prescribed in the said proclamation of the 29th day of May, 1865, namely:

"I, _____, do solemnly swear (or affirm), in presence of Almighty God, that I will henceforth faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States and the Union of the States thereunder, and that I will in like manner abide by and faithfully support all laws and proclamations which have been made during the late rebellion with reference to the emancipation of slaves. So help me God."

On Saturday, October 26, 1867, President Andrew Johnson issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving and Praise:

In conformity with a recent custom that may now be regarded as established on national consent and approval, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do hereby recommend to my fellow-citizens that Thursday, the 28th day of November next, be set apart and observed throughout the Republic as a day of national thanksgiving and praise to the Almighty Ruler of Nations, with whom are dominion and fear, who maketh peace in His high places.

Resting and refraining from secular labors on that day, let us reverently and devoutly give thanks to our Heavenly Father for the mercies and blessings with which He has crowned the now closing year. Especially let us remember that He has covered our land through all its extent with greatly needed and very abundant harvests; that He has caused industry to prosper, not only in our fields, but also in our workshops, in our mines, and in our forests. He has permitted us to multiply ships upon our lakes and rivers and upon the high seas, and at the same time to extend our iron roads so far into the secluded places of the continent as to guarantee speedy overland intercourse between the two oceans. He has inclined our hearts to turn away from domestic contentions and commotions consequent upon a distracting and desolating civil war, and to walk more and more in the ancient ways of loyalty, conciliation, and brotherly love. He has blessed the peaceful efforts with which we have established new and important commercial treaties with foreign nations, while we have at the same time strengthened our national defenses and greatly enlarged our national borders.

While thus rendering the unanimous and heartfelt tribute of national praise and thanksgiving which is so justly due to Almighty God, let us not fail to implore Him that the same Divine protection and care which we have hitherto so undeservedly and yet so constantly enjoyed may be continued to our country and our people throughout all their generations forever.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 26th day of October, A.D. 1867, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-second. Andrew Johnson.

On Tuesday, December 3, 1867, in his Third Annual Message to Congress, President Andrew Johnson stated:

We must all acknowledge that the restoration of the States to their proper legal relations with the Federal Government and with one another, according to the terms of the original compact, would be the greatest temporal blessing which God, in His kindest Providence, could bestow upon this nation....

Christianity and civilization have made such progress that recourse to a punishment so cruel and unjust would meet with condemnation of all unprejudiced and right-minded men.

On October 12, 1868, President Andrew Johnson issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Public Praise, Thanksgiving, and Prayer:

In the year which is now drawing to its end the art, the skill, and the labor of the people of the United States have been employed with greater diligence and vigor and on broader fields than ever before, and the fruits of the earth have been gathered into the granary and the storehouse in marvelous abundance. Our highways have been lengthened, and new and prolific regions have been occupied. We are permitted to hope that long-protracted political and sectional dissensions are at no distant day to give place to returning harmony and fraternal affection throughout the Republic. Many foreign states have entered into liberal agreements with us, while nations which are far off and which heretofore have been unsocial and exclusive have become our friends.

The annual period of rest, which we have reached in health and tranquility, and which is crowned with so many blessings, is by universal consent a convenient and suitable one for cultivating personal piety and practicing public devotion.

I therefore recommend that Thursday, the 26th day of November next, be set apart and observed by all the people of the United States as a day for public praise, thanksgiving, and prayer to the Almighty Creator and Divine Ruler of the Universe, by whose ever-watchful, merciful, and gracious Providence alone states and nations, no less than families and individual men, do live and move and have their being.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 12th day of October, A.D. 1868, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-third. Andrew Johnson.

By the President: William H. Seward, Secretary of State.

On December 9, 1868, in his Fourth Annual Message, President Andrew Johnson stated:

Let us earnestly hope that before the expiration of our respective terms of service, now rapidly drawing to a close, an All-Wise Providence will so guide our counsels as to strengthen and preserve the Federal Union, inspire reverence for the Constitution, restore prosperity and happiness to our whole people, and promote "on earth peace, good will toward men."

In 1875, Andrew Johnson stated:

Men who see not God in our history have surely lost sight of the fact that, from the landing of the Mayflower to this hour, the great men whose names are indissolubly associated with the colonization, rise, and progress of the Republic have borne testimony to the vital truths of Christianity.

President Andrew Johnson stated:

I do believe in Almighty God! And I believe also in the Bible.

Let us look forward to the time when we can take the flag of our country and nail it below the Cross, and there let it wave as it waved in the olden times, and let us gather around it and inscribe for our motto:

"Liberty and Union, one and inseparable, now and forever," and exclaim, "Christ first, our country next!"

Is there a crusade to be commenced against the Church to satiate disappointed party vengeance? Are the persecutions of olden times to be revived? Are the ten thousand temples that have been erected, based upon the sufferings and atonement of our crucified Saviour, with their glittering spires wasting themselves in the very heavens, all to topple and to fall, crushed and buried beneath the ravings of party excitement? Is man to be set upon man, and in the name of God lift his hand against the throat of his fellow?...

Are the fires of heaven that have been lighted up by the Cross, and now burning upon so many altars consecrated to the true and living God, to be quenched in the blood of their innocent and defenseless worshippers, and the gutters of our streets made to flow with human gore? This is but a faint reality of what is shadowed forth in the gentleman's speech.

Poe, Edgar Allen (January 19, 1809-October 7, 1849), was an American poet, literary critic and story writer. His best known works include: The Fall of the House of Usher, 1840; The Raven, 1845; and the short stories: The Cask of Amontillado; The Purloined Letter; The Masque of the Red Death; and The Pit and the Pendulum. In Tamerlane, 1827, Edgar Allen Poe wrote:

O, human love! thou spirit given,
On Earth, of all we hope in Heaven.

Edgar Allen Poe stated:

Because I feel that, in the Heavens above,
The angels, whispering to one another,
Can find, among their burning terms of love,
None so devotional as that of "Mother."

Lincoln, Abraham (February 12, 1809-April 15, 1865), was the 16th President of the United States, 1861-65, responsible for preserving the Union through the Civil War; supported the 13th Amendment prohibiting slavery, ratified 1865; appointed Ulysses
S. Grant as Commander in Chief of the Union forces, 1864; delivered the Gettysburg Address, November 19, 1863; issued the Emancipation Proclamation, 1863; U.S. Senate candidate of the newly formed Republican Party, 1858, gaining national attention through his debates against pro-choice incumbent, Stephen A.
Douglas; U.S. Representative, 1847-49, having defeated the Methodist Circuit rider, Peter Cartwright; member of the Illinois State Legislature, 1834-42; married Mary Todd, 1842; admitted to bar, 1836; Postmaster of New Salem, Illinois, 1833-36; appointed Deputy County Surveyor, 1833; Captain during the Black Hawk War, 1832; piloted flatboat trips to New Orleans, 1828-31; raised in a log cabin, cleared land, split rails, and earned the reputation of being "Honest Abe."

Only one week after being inaugurated as President, the southern states formed the Confederacy, and within a month the Civil War had begun, with the Confederate Army firing on Fort Sumter, April 12, 1861. The Civil War ended four years later,

April 9, 1865, with the surrender of General Robert E. Lee to General Ulysses S. Grant at Appomattox, Virginia. By the conclusion of the war, over a half million men had died, which is more than the combined casualties of all other American wars to date. Five days later, on April 14, 1865, after he had freed millions of slaves, Abraham Lincoln was assassinated in Ford's Theater by John Wilkes Booth.

On March 9, 1832, in his "Communication to the People of Sangamo County," Abraham Lincoln stated:

That every man may receive at least a moderate education, and thereby be enabled to read the histories of his own and other countries, by which he may duly appreciate the value of our free institutions, appears to be an object of vital importance, even on this account alone, to say nothing of the advantages and satisfaction derived from all being able to read the Scriptures, and other works both of a religious and moral nature for themselves.

At age 28, Abraham Lincoln wrote to his friend, Joshua F. Speed, who was a slaveholder:

I also acknowledge your rights and my obligations, under the Constitution, in regards to your slaves. I confess I hate to see the poor creatures hunted down and caught and carried back to their stripes and unrewarded toils; I bite my lip and keep quiet.

In 1841, you and I had together a tedious low-water trip on a steamboat from Louisville to St. Louis. You may remember, as I well do, that from Louisville to the mouth of the Ohio, there were on board ten or a dozen slaves shackled together with irons.

That sight was a continual torment to me; I see something like it every time I touch the Ohio, or any other slave border. It is hardly fair for you to assume that I have no interest in a thing which has, and continually exercises, the power of making me miserable.

In a speech on January 27, 1837, Abraham Lincoln forewarned:

At what point then is the approach of danger to be expected? I answer, if it ever reach us, it must spring up amongst us; it cannot come from abroad. If destruction be our lot we must ourselves be its author and finisher. As a nation of freemen we must live through all time, or die by suicide.

In 1846, when Lincoln was running for Congress from the seventh district of Illinois, a rumor began to spread that he was not a Christian. In response to this, Lincoln made a public statement, published in the Illinois Gazette, August 15, 1846, which read:

That I am not a member of any Christian Church, is true; but I have never denied the truth of the Scriptures; and I have never spoken with intentional disrespect of religion in general, or of any denomination of Christians in particular. . . .

I do not think I could, myself, be brought to support a man for office whom I knew to be an open enemy of, and scoffer at religion.

In 1851, during the last illness of his father, Abraham Lincoln wrote his step-brother, encouraging him:

I sincerely hope father may recover his health; but at all events tell him to remember to call upon and confide in our great and good and merciful Maker, who will not turn away from him in any extremity. He notes the fall of a sparrow and numbers the hairs of our head, and He will not forget the dying man who puts his trust in Him.

On August 24, 1855, in a letter to Joshua F. Speed, Abraham Lincoln wrote:

How can anyone who abhors the oppression of Negroes be in favor of degrading classes of white people? Our progress in degeneracy appears to me to be pretty rapid. As a nation we began by declaring that "all men are created equal." We now practically read it "all men are created equal, except Negroes."

When the Know-Nothings get control, it will read "all men are created equal, except Negroes and foreigners and Catholics." When it comes to this, I shall prefer emigrating to some country where they make no pretense of loving liberty - to Russia, for instance, where despotism can be taken pure, and without the base alloy of hypocrisy.

In the closing remarks of a debate with Judge Douglas, 1858, Abraham Lincoln asserted:

That is the issue that will continue in this country when these poor tongues of Judge Douglas and myself shall be silent. It is the eternal struggle between these two principles - right and wrong - throughout the world. They are the two principles that have stood face to face from the beginning of time, and will ever continue to struggle.

On July 10, 1858, in Chicago, Abraham Lincoln gave a speech in a debate with Stephen A. Douglas:

It is said in one of the admonitions of our Lord, "As your Father in Heaven is perfect, be ye also perfect." The Saviour, I suppose, did not expect that any human being could be perfect as the Father in Heaven; but He said, "As your Father in Heaven is perfect, be ye also perfect." He set that up as a standard, and He who did most toward reaching that standard attained the highest degree of moral perfection.

On September 11, 1858, Abraham Lincoln delivered a speech at Edwardsville, Illinois:

What constitutes the bulwark of our own liberty and independence? It is not our frowning battlements, our bristling sea coasts, our army and our navy. These are not our reliance against tyranny. All of those may be turned against us without making us weaker for the struggle.

Our reliance is in the love of liberty which God has planted in us. Our defense is in the spirit which prized liberty as the heritage of all men, in all lands everywhere.

Destroy this spirit and you have planted the seeds of despotism at your own doors. Familiarize yourselves with the chains of bondage and you prepare your own limbs to wear them.

Accustomed to trample on the rights of others, you have lost the genius of your own independence and become the fit subjects of the first cunning tyrant who rises among you.

On April 6, 1859, Lincoln wrote a letter to H. L. Pierce and others, insisting:

This is a world of compensation; and he who would be no slave must consent to have no slave. Those who deny freedom to others deserve it not for themselves, and under a just God, cannot long retain it.

On February 11, 1861, newly elected President Abraham Lincoln delivered a Farewell Speech to his home state in Springfield, Illinois, as he left for Washington, D. C. :

I now leave, not knowing when or whether ever I may return, with a task before me greater than that which rested upon Washington. Without the assistance of that Divine Being who ever attended him, I cannot succeed. With that assistance I cannot fail. Trusting in Him who can go with me, and remain with you, and be everywhere for good, let us confidently hope that all will yet be well....

Unless the great God who assisted him shall be with me and aid me, I must fail: but if the same omniscient mind and mighty arm that directed and protected him shall guide and support me, I shall not fail - I shall succeed.

Let us all pray that the God of our fathers may not forsake us now. To him I commend you all. Permit me to ask that with equal sincerity and faith you will invoke his wisdom and guidance for me.

On February 22, 1861, in a speech at Independence Hall, Philadelphia, President Lincoln declared:

The Declaration of Independence which gave liberty not alone to the people of this country, but hope to all the world, for all future time. It was that which gave promise that in due time the weights would be lifted from the shoulders of all men, and that all should have an equal chance. This is the sentiment embodied in the Declaration of Independence.... I would rather be assassinated on this spot than surrender it.

On February 23, 1861, in a letter to William Dodge, President Abraham Lincoln stated:

With the support of the people and the assistance of the Almighty, I shall undertake to perform it.... Freedom is the natural condition of the human race, in which the Almighty intended men to live. Those who fight the purpose of the Almighty will not succeed.

They always have been, they always will be, beaten.

On Monday, March 4, 1861, in his First Inaugural Address, President Abraham Lincoln commented on his disagreement with the 1857 Supreme Court case of Dred Scott v. Sanford, wherein Chief Justice Roger B. Taney decided that slaves were not persons or citizens, but were the property of the owner, the same as their body, horse, cattle, etc., and the owner had the freedom of choice to decide what they wanted to do with their own property:

I do not forget the position assumed by some that constitutional questions are to be decided by the Supreme Court... At the same time, the candid citizen must confess that if the policy of the Government upon vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions of the Supreme Court, the instant they are made... the people will have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent practically resigned their Government into the hands of the eminent tribunal....

If the Almighty Ruler of Nations, with His eternal truth and justice, be on your side of the North, or on yours of the South, that truth and that justice will surely prevail by the judgement of this great tribunal of the American people....

Intelligence, patriotism, Christianity, and a firm reliance on Him who has never yet forsaken this favored land, are still competent to adjust in the best way all our present difficulties.

On July 4, 1861, in a Special Session Message to Congress, President Lincoln concluded:

Having thus chosen our course, without guile and with pure purpose, let us renew our trust in God and go forward without fear and with manly hearts.

In 1861, President Abraham Lincoln addressed the New Jersey State Senate:

I am exceedingly anxious that this Union, the Constitution, and the liberties of the people shall be perpetuated in accordance with the original idea for which that struggle was made. And I shall be most happy, indeed, if I shall be an humble instrument in the hands of the Almighty... for perpetuating the object of that struggle.

President Abraham Lincoln once told Noah Brooks, his intended secretary:

I have been driven many times upon my knees by the overwhelming conviction that I had nowhere else to go. My own wisdom, and that of all about me, seemed insufficient for that day.

On Monday, August 12, 1861, after the Union army was defeated at the Battle of Bull Run, President Abraham issued a Proclamation declaring a National Day of Humiliation, Prayer, and Fasting:

Whereas a joint committee of both Houses of Congress has waited on the President of the United States and requested him to "recommend a day of public humiliation, prayer, and fasting to be observed by the people of the United States with religious solemnities and the offering of fervent supplications to Almighty God for the safety and welfare of these States, His blessings on their arms, and a speedy restoration of peace;" and

Whereas it is fit and becoming in all people, at all times, to acknowledge and revere the Supreme Government of God; to bow in humble submission to His chastisement; to confess and deplore their sins and transgressions in the full conviction that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom; and to pray, with all fervency and contrition, for the pardon of their past offenses, and for a blessing upon their present and prospective action; and

Whereas when our own beloved country, once, by the blessings of God, united, prosperous and happy, is now afflicted with faction and civil war, it is peculiarly fit for us to recognize the hand of God in this terrible visitation, and in sorrowful remembrance of our own faults and crimes as a nation and as individuals, to humble ourselves before Him and to pray for His mercy - to pray that we may be spared further punishment, though most justly deserved; that our arms may be blessed and made effectual for the reestablishment of law, order, and peace throughout the wide extent of our country; and that the inestimable boon of civil and religious liberty, earned under His guidance and blessing by the labors and sufferings of our fathers, may be restored in its original excellence:

Therefore I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do appoint the last Thursday in September next as a day of humiliation, prayer, and fasting for all the people of the nation. And I do earnestly recommend to all the people, and especially to all ministers and teachers of religion of all denominations and to all heads of families, to observe and keep that day according to their several creeds and modes of worship in all humility and with all religious solemnity, to the end that the united prayer of the nation may ascend to the Throne of Grace and bring down plentiful blessings upon our country.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed, this 12th day of August, A.D. 1861, and in the Independence of the United States of America the eighty-sixth.

Abraham Lincoln.
By the President:
William H. Seward, Secretary of State.

On December 3, 1861, in his First Annual Message, President Lincoln stated:

In the midst of unprecedented political troubles we have cause of great gratitude to God for unusual good health and most abundant harvests. . . . With a reliance on Providence all the more firm and earnest, let us proceed in the great task which events have devolved upon us.

On February 19, 1862, President Abraham Lincoln issued the Proclamation:

It is recommended to the people of the United States that they assemble in their customary places of meeting for public solemnities on the 22nd day of February instant and celebrate the anniversary of the birth of the Father of his Country [George Washington] by causing to be read to them his immortal Farewell Address.

Given under my hand and the seal of the United States, at Washington, the 19th day of February, A. D. 1862, and of the Independence of the United States of America the eighty-sixth. Abraham Lincoln.

By the President: William H. Seward, Secretary of State.

On March 6, 1862, in a message to Congress concerning the abolishment of slavery, President Abraham Lincoln concluded:

In full view of my great responsibility to my God and to my country, I earnestly beg the attention of Congress and the people to the subject.

On April 10, 1862, President Abraham Lincoln issued the National Proclamation from Washington, D. C. :

It has pleased Almighty God to vouchsafe signal victories to the land and naval forces engaged in suppressing an internal rebellion, and at the same time to avert from our country the dangers of foreign intervention and invasion.

It is therefore recommended to the people of the United States that at their next weekly assemblages in their accustomed places of public worship which shall occur after notice of this proclamation shall have been received they especially acknowledge and render thanks to our Heavenly Father for these inestimable blessings, that they then and there implore spiritual consolation in behalf of all who have been brought into affliction by the casualties and calamities of sedition and civil war, and that they reverently invoke the Divine Guidance for our national counsels, to the end that they may speedily result in the restoration of peace, harmony, and unity throughout our borders and hasten the establishment of fraternal relations among all the countries of the earth.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 10th day of April, A. D. 1862, and of the Independence of the United States the eighty-sixth. Abraham Lincoln.

By the President: William H. Seward, Secretary of State.

On May 15, 1862, in closing a speech to the 12th Indiana Regiment, Lincoln said:

For the part which you and the brave army of which you are a part have, under Providence, performed in this great struggle, I tender more thanks - greatest thanks that can possibly be due - and especially to this regiment, which has been the subject of good report,

The thanks of the nation will follow you and may God's blessing rest upon you now and forever.

On May 19, 1862, in regards to an order issued by Major-General David Hunter, President Lincoln recommended to Congress:

Resolved, That the United States ought to cooperate with any State which may adopt a gradual abolishment of slavery, giving to such State pecuniary aid, to be used by such State, in its discretion, to compensate for the inconveniences, public and private, produced by such change in system....

This proposal makes common sense for a common object, casting no reproaches upon any. It acts not the Pharisee. The change it contemplates would come gently as the dews of heaven, not rendering or wrecking anything. Will you embrace it? So much good has not been done by one effort in all past time as, in the Providence of God, it is now your high privilege to do. May the vast future not have to lament that you have neglected it.

On Wednesday, May 22, 1862, to the House of Representatives, President Lincoln wrote:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 20th instant, requesting information in regard to the indemnity obtained by the consul-general of the United States of Alexandria, Egypt, for the maltreatment of Faris-El-Hakim, an agent in the employ of the American missionaries in that country, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State and the documents by which it was accompanied.

On May 23, 1862, President Lincoln restored the lands in California that had been taken from the missions after the Mexican Secularization Act:

Now know ye...pursuant to the provisions of the Act of Congress...I give and grant unto the said Joseph G. Alemany, Bishop of Monterrey..."in trust for the religious purposes and uses to which the same have been respectively appropriated" the tracts of land embraced and described in the foregoing survey....Given under my hand...this 23rd day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and 62.

In June of 1862, President Abraham Lincoln spoke to the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, James Wilson, in regard to God's direction:

I trust that as He shall further open the way, I will be ready to walk therein, relying on His help and trusting in His goodness and wisdom.

On July 12, 1862, during the Civil War, new wording was written to include chaplains of the Hebrew faith, following a complaint concerning the lack of chaplains to serve Jewish soldiers. The previous law had read: "The chaplain so appointed must be a regular ordained minister of a Christian denomination."

In delivering an address on colonization to a Negro deputation at Washington, August 14, 1862, President Abraham Lincoln pronounced:

It is difficult to make a man miserable while he feels he is worthy of himself and claims kindred to the great God who made him.

On Saturday, September 13, 1862, to Rev. William W. Patterson, Rev. John Dempster, and representatives of the Methodist, Baptist, and Congregational denominations from Chicago, who presented a petition supporting the emancipation of the slaves, President Abraham Lincoln stated:

The subject presented in the memorial is one upon which I have thought much for weeks past, and I may even say for months. I am approached with the most opposite opinions and advice, and that by religious men, who are equally certain that they represent the divine will, I am sure that either the one or the other class is mistaken in that belief, and perhaps in some respects both.

I hope it will not be irreverent for me to say that if it is probable that God would reveal His will to others, on a point so connected with my duty, it might be supposed He will reveal it directly to me; for, unless I am more deceived in myself than I often am, it is my earnest desire to know the will of Providence in this matter. And if I can learn what it is I will do it!

These are not, however, the days of miracles, and I suppose it will be granted that I am not to expect a direct revelation. I must study the plain, physical facts of the case, ascertain what is possible and learn what appears to be wise and right.

The Subject is difficult and good men do not agree... And the same is true of religious people. Why, the rebel soldiers are praying with a great deal more earnestness, I fear, than our own troops, and expecting God to favor their side; for one of our soldiers who had been taken prisoner told Senator Wilson a few days since that he met with nothing so discouraging as the evident sincerity of those he was among in their prayers....

In their minds, no doubt their cause is just. But we will talk over the merits of the case... I can assure you that the subject is on my mind, by day and night, more than any other. Whatever shall appear to be God's will, I will do. I trust that in the freedom with which I have canvassed your views I have not in any respect injured your feelings.

I can assure you that the subject is on my mind, by day and night, more than any other. Whatever shall appear to be God's will I will do.

In September of 1862, after the Union lost the Second Battle of Bull Run, August 29-30, 1862, President Lincoln wrote his Meditation on the Divine Will:

The Will of God prevails. In great contests each party claims to act in accordance with the will of God. Both may be, and one must be wrong. God can not be for and against the same thing at the same time. In the present civil war it is quite possible that God's purpose is something different from the purpose of either party - and yet the human instrumentalities, working just as they do, are of the best adaptation to effect His purpose.

I am almost ready to say this is probably true - that God wills this contest, and wills that it shall not end yet. By His mere quiet power, on the minds of the now contestants, He could have either saved or destroyed the Union without a human contest. Yet the contest began. And having begun He could give the final victory to either side any day. Yet the contest proceeds.

Following the second defeat at Bull Run, President Lincoln commented to the woman who had been his son Willie's nurse:

I have done the best I could. I have asked God to guide me, and now I must leave the result with him.

On September 22, 1862, as reported by Secretary of the Treasury, Salmon Portland Chase, President Abraham Lincoln commented to his Cabinet after the massive Confederate Army lost to the Union troops at the Battle at Antietam, just prior to the issuance of the Emancipation Proclamation:

The time for the annunciation of the emancipation policy can no longer be delayed. Public sentiment will sustain it, many of my warmest friends and supporters demand it, and I have promised God that I will do it.

When asked by Secretary of the Treasury, Salmon Portland Chase, if his understanding of the last statement was clear, President Abraham Lincoln replied:

I made a solemn vow before God, that if General Lee were driven back from Pennsylvania, I would crown the result by the declaration of freedom to the slaves.

On September 22, 1862, President Abraham Lincoln, in direct disregard to the Supreme Court's 1857 Dred Scott v. Sanford decision, proceeded to issue the Emancipation Proclamation, to go into effect January 1, 1863, granting the right to life, freedom and citizenship to all persons irregardless of race, origin, circumstance, etc. This courageous position of valuing all human life had been embraced by the Congress on June 9, 1862, when they prohibited legalized slavery in the free territories. The Emancipation Proclamation stated:

On the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, all persons held as slaves within any State, or designated part of a State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States, shall be then, thenceforward, and forever free...

On September 24, 1862, in a meeting two days after the Emancipation Proclamation was issued, President Lincoln stated:

What I did, I did after a very full deliberation, and under a very heavy and solemn sense of responsibility. I can only trust in God I have made no mistake.

On October 6, 1862, President Lincoln confided with Eliza Gurney and three other Quakers:

We are indeed going through a great trial - a fiery trial. In the very responsible position in which I happen to be placed, being a humble instrument in the hands of our Heavenly Father, as I am, and as we all are, to work out His great purposes, I have desired that all my works and acts may be according to His will, and that it might be so, I have sought His aid; but if, after endeavoring to do my best in the light which He affords me, I find my efforts fail, I must believe that for some purpose unknown to me, He wills it otherwise.

If I had my way, this war would never have been commenced. If I had been allowed my way, this war would have ended before this. But we find it still continues; and we must believe that He permits it for some wise purpose of His own, mysterious and unknown to us; and though with our limited understandings we may not be able to comprehend it, yet we cannot but believe, that He who made the world still governs it.

On November 15, 1862, from his Executive Mansion in Washington, President Lincoln issued a General Order Respecting the Observance of the Sabbath Day in the Army and Navy:

The President, Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, desires and enjoins the orderly observance of the Sabbath by the officers and men in the military and naval service. The importance for man and beast of the prescribed weekly rest, the sacred rights of Christian soldiers and sailors, a becoming deference to the best sentiment of a Christian people, and a due regard for the Divine Will demand that Sunday labor in the Army and Navy be reduced to the measure of strict necessity.

The discipline and character of the national forces should not suffer nor the cause they defend be imperiled by the profanation of the day or name of the Most High. "At this time of public distress," adopting the words of Washington in 1776, "men may find enough to do in the service of God and their country without abandoning themselves to vice and immorality." The first general order issued by the Father of his Country after the Declaration of Independence indicates the spirit in which our institutions were founded and should ever be defended: "The General hopes and trusts that every officer and man will endeavor to live and act as becomes a Christian soldier defending the dearest rights and liberties of his country."

Abraham Lincoln.

On November 15, 1862, President Abraham Lincoln spoke with Reverend Byron Sunderland, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Washington, D. C., where he had attended:

The Ways of God are mysterious and profound beyond all comprehension - "Who by searching can find Him out?" Now, judging after the manner of men, taking counsel of our sympathies and feelings, if it had been left to us to determine it, we would have had no war.

And, going further back to the occasion of it, we would have had no slavery. And, tracing it still further back, we would have had no evil.

There is the mystery of the universe that no man can solve, and it is at that point that the human understanding backs down. And there is nothing left but for the heart of man to take up faith and believe and trust where it cannot reason.

Now, I believe we all are agents and instruments of Divine Providence. On both sides we are working our will of God. Yet, how strange the spectacle! Here is one half of the nation prostrated in prayer that God will help them to destroy the Union and build up a government upon the corner stone of human bondage.

And here is the other half equally earnest in their prayers and efforts to defeat a purpose which they regard as so repugnant to their ideas of human nature and the rights of society, as well as liberty and independence. They want slavery; we want freedom. They want a servile class; we want to make equality practical as far as possible. And they are Christians and we are Christians.

They and we are praying and fighting for results exactly the opposite. What must God think of such a posture of affairs? There is but one solution - self-deception. Somewhere there is a fearful heresy in our religion, and I cannot think it lies in the love of liberty and in the aspirations of the human soul.

What I am to do in the present emergency time will determine. I hold myself in my present position and with the authority vested in me as an instrument of Providence. I have my own views and purposes, I have my convictions of duty, and my notions of what is right to be done. But I am conscious every moment that all I am and all I have is subject to the control of a Higher Power, and that Power can use me or not use me in any manner, and at any time, as His wisdom and might may be pleasing to Him.

Nevertheless, I am no fatalist. I believe in the supremacy of the human conscience, and that men are responsible beings; that God has a right to hold them, and will hold them, to a strict personal account for the deeds done in the body. But, sirs, I do not mean to give you a lecture upon the doctrines of the Christian religion. These are simply with me the convictions and realities of great and vital truths, the power and demonstration of which I see now in the light of this our national struggle as I have never seen before.

God only knows the issue of this business. He has destroyed nations from the map of history for their sins. Nevertheless, my hopes prevail generally above my fears for our Republic. The times are dark, the spirits of ruin are abroad in all their power, and the mercy of God alone can save us.

On December 1, 1862, President Lincoln concluded his Second Annual Message to Congress:

In giving freedom to the slave, we assure freedom to the free - honorable alike in what we give and what we preserve. We shall nobly save - or meanly lose - the last, best hope of earth. Other means may succeed; this could not fail. The way is plain, peaceful, generous, just - a way which if followed the world will forever applaud and God must forever bless.

When a guest told Lincoln that in their State they say that the welfare of the nation depended on God and Abraham Lincoln, the President replied:

My friend, you are half right.

On February 20, 1862, tragedy struck the Lincoln's as their son, William Wallace "Willie" Lincoln, died at the age of 12 years old. "Many noticed that he was seen more frequently with a Bible in his hand and that he spent more time in prayer.... From this time on, Lincoln regularly attended the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church on Sundays - often even going to the Wednesday evening prayer meeting - until his untimely death three years later." Dr. Phineas Gurley, who was Lincoln's pastor at the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church, affirmed that "the death of Willie Lincoln in 1862 and the visit to the Gettysburg battlefield in 1863 finally led Lincoln to personal faith in Christ."

In 1862, in the grief after his son Willie's death,
President Abraham Lincoln recalled of his mother:

I had a good Christian mother, and I remember her prayers. They have always followed me. They have clung to me all my life.

In April of 1862, President Abraham Lincoln was visited by Rev. N.W. Miner, pastor of the First Baptist church in Springfield Illinois, and his wife, shortly after Willie died.
The Union army has recently been defeated at Shiloh, adding to the President's burden. In response to their comments about the people praying for him, President Abraham Lincoln stated:

If I were not sustained by the prayers of God's people, I could not endure the constant pressure. I should have given up hope for success....

You know I am not of a very hopeful temperament. I can take hold of a thing and hold on a good while. By trusting God for help, and believing that our cause is just and right, I firmly believe we shall conquer in the end....

It has pleased Almighty God to place me in my present position, and looking to Him for wisdom and divine guidance, I must work out my destiny as best I can.

On January 1, 1863, the Emancipation Proclamation went into effect:

Whereas on the twenty-second day of September, in the year of the Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two, a proclamation was issued by the President of the United States, containing, among other things, the following, to wit: "That on the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, all persons held as slaves within any State, or designated part of a State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States, shall be then, thenceforward, and forever free...."

American Quotations.txt

Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, by virtue of the power in me vested as commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, in time of actual armed rebellion against authority and government of the United State...do, on the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three...publicly proclaim...the States and parts of States wherein the people thereof, respectively, are this day in rebellion against the United States the following, to wit: Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana... , Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia....

And by virtue of the power and for the purpose aforesaid, I do order and declare that all persons held as slaves within said designated States and parts of States are, and henceforward shall be, free; and that the Executive Government of the United States, including the military and naval authorities thereof, shall recognize and maintain the freedom of said persons.

And I hereby enjoin upon the people so declared to be free to abstain from all violence, unless in necessary self-defense; and I recommend to them that, in all cases where allowed, they labor faithfully for reasonable wages....

And upon this act, sincerely believed to be an act of justice, warranted by the Constitution upon military necessity, I invoke the considerate judgement of mankind and the gracious favor of Almighty God.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 1st day of January, A.D. 1863, and of the Independence of the United States of America the eighty-seventh. Abraham Lincoln.

By the President: William H. Seward, Secretary of State.

On Monday, March 30, 1863, President Abraham Lincoln issued a Proclamation appointing a National Day of Humiliation, Fasting and Prayer:

Whereas, the Senate of the United States devoutly recognizing the Supreme Authority and just Government of Almighty God in all the affairs of men and of nations, has, by a resolution, requested the President to designate and set apart a day for national prayer and humiliation; and

Whereas, it is the duty of nations as well as of men to own their dependence upon the overruling power of God, to confess their sins and transgressions in humble sorrow yet with assured hope that genuine repentance will lead to mercy and pardon, and to recognize the sublime truth, announced in the Holy Scriptures and proven by all history: that those nations only are blessed whose God is the Lord;

And, insomuch as we know that, by His divine law, nations like individuals are subjected to punishments and chastisement in this world, may we not justly fear that the awful calamity of civil war, which now desolates the land may be but a punishment inflicted upon us for our presumptuous sins to the needful end of our national reformation as a whole people?

We have been the recipients of the choicest bounties of Heaven. We have been preserved these many years in peace and prosperity. We have grown in numbers, wealth and power as no other nation has ever grown.

But we have forgotten God. We have forgotten the gracious Hand which preserved us in peace, and multiplied and enriched and strengthened us; and we have vainly imagined, in the deceitfulness of our hearts, that all these blessings were produced by some superior wisdom and virtue of our own.

Intoxicated with unbroken success, we have become too self-sufficient to feel the necessity of redeeming and preserving grace, too proud to pray to the God that made us!

It behooves us then to humble ourselves before the offended Power, to confess our national sins and to pray for clemency and forgiveness.

Now, therefore, in compliance with the request and fully concurring in the view of the Senate, I do, by this my proclamation, designate and set apart Thursday, the 30th day of April, 1863, as a day of national humiliation, fasting and prayer.

And I do hereby request all the people to abstain on that day from their ordinary secular pursuits, and to unite, at their several places of public worship and their respective homes, in keeping the day holy to the Lord and devoted to the humble discharge of the religious duties proper to that solemn occasion.

All this being done, in sincerity and truth, let us then rest humbly in the hope authorized by the Divine teachings, that the united cry of the nation will be heard on high and answered with blessing no less than the pardon of our national sins and the restoration of our now divided and suffering country to its former happy condition of unity and peace.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

In June of 1863, just weeks before the Battle of Gettysburg, (July 1-3), a college president asked Lincoln if he thought the country would survive. President Lincoln replied:

I do not doubt that our country will finally come through safe and undivided. But do not misunderstand me...I do not rely on the patriotism of our people...the bravery and devotion of the boys in blue... (or) the loyalty and skill of our generals....

But the God of our fathers, who raised up this country to be the refuge and asylum of the oppressed and downtrodden of all nations, will not let it perish now. I may not live to see it...I do not expect to see it, but God will bring us through safe.

On July 4, 1863, at 10 a.m., President Lincoln sent an announcement from Washington to the War Department:

The President announces to the country that news from the Army of the Potomac up to 10 o'clock p.m. of the 3d is such as to cover that army with the highest honor, to promise a great success to the cause of the Union, and to claim the condolence of all for the many gallant fallen; and that for this he especially desires that on this day He whose Will, not ours, should ever be done be everywhere remembered and ever revered with profoundest gratitude.

On July 15, 1863, President Abraham Lincoln issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving, Praise and Prayer:

It has pleased Almighty God to hearken to the supplications and prayers of an afflicted people and to vouchsafe to the Army and the Navy of the United States victories on land and on the sea so signal and so effective as to furnish reasonable grounds for augmented confidence that the Union of these States will be maintained, their Constitution preserved, and their peace and prosperity permanently restored. But these victories have been accorded not without sacrifices of life, limb, health, and liberty, incurred by brave, loyal, and patriotic citizens. Domestic affliction in every part of the country follows in the train of these fearful bereavements. It is meet and right to recognize and confess the presence of the Almighty Father and the power of His hand equally in these triumphs and in these sorrows.

Now, therefore, be it known that I do set apart Thursday, the 6th day of August next, to be observed as a day for national thanksgiving, praise, and prayer, and I invite the people of the United States to assemble on that occasion in their customary places of worship and in the forms approved by their own consciences render the homage due to the Divine Majesty for the wonderful things He has done in the nation's behalf and invoke the influence of His Holy Spirit to subdue the anger which has produced and so long sustained a needless and cruel rebellion, to change the hearts of the insurgents, to guide the counsels of the Government with wisdom adequate to so great a national emergency, and to visit with tender care and consolation throughout the length and breadth of our land all those who, though the vicissitudes of marches, voyages, battles, and sieges, have been brought to suffer in mind, body, or estate, and finally to lead the whole nation through the paths of repentance and submission to the divine will back to the perfect enjoyment of union and fraternal peace.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

On October 3, 1863, President Abraham Lincoln issued a formal Proclamation, passed by an Act of Congress, initiating the first annual National Day of Thanksgiving and Praise:

The year that is drawing to its close has been filled with the blessings of fruitful fields and healthful skies. To these bounties, which are so constantly enjoyed that we are prone to forget the source from which they come, others have been added which are of so extraordinary a nature that they can not fail to penetrate and soften even the heart which is habitually insensible to the ever-watchful Providence of Almighty God.

In the midst of a civil war of unequalled magnitude and severity, which has sometimes seemed to foreign states to invite and to provoke their aggression, peace has been preserved with all nations, order has been maintained, the laws have been respected and obeyed, and harmony has prevailed everywhere, except in the theater of military conflict, while that theater has been greatly contracted by the advancing armies and navies of the Union.

Needful diversions of wealth and of strength from the fields of peaceful industry to the national defense have not arrested the plow, the shuttle, or the ship; the ax has enlarged the borders of our settlements, and the mines, as well of iron and coal as of the precious metals, have yielded even more abundantly than heretofore. Population has steadily increased notwithstanding the waste that has been made in the camp of the siege, and the battlefield, and the country, rejoicing in the consciousness of augmented strength and vigor, is permitted to expect continuance of years with large increase of freedom.

No human counsel hath devised, nor hath any mortal hand worked out these great things. They are the gracious gifts of the most high God, who, while dealing with us in anger for our sins, hath nevertheless remembered mercy.

It has seemed to me fit and proper that they should be solemnly, reverently, and gratefully acknowledged, as with one heart and one voice, by the whole American people.

I do, therefore, invite my fellow citizens in every part of the United States, and those who are sojourning in foreign lands, to set apart and observe the last Thursday of November next as a day of Thanksgiving and Praise to our beneficent Father who dwelleth in the heavens. And I recommend to them that while offering up the ascriptions justly due to Him for such singular deliverances and blessings they do also, with humble penitence for our national perverseness and disobedience, commend to His tender care all those who have become widows, orphans, mourners, or sufferers in the lamentable civil strife in which we are unavoidably engaged, and fervently implore the interposition of the Almighty hand to heal the wounds of the nation and to restore it, as soon as may be consistent with the divine purposes, to the full enjoyment of peace, harmony, tranquillity, and union.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

On October 24, 1863, Abraham Lincoln said in a speech to the Presbyterians of Baltimore:

I saw upon taking my position here I was going to have an administration, if an administration at all, of extraordinary difficulty. It was without exception a time of the greatest difficulty this country ever saw. I was early brought to a lively reflection that nothing in my powers whatever, or others, to rely upon would succeed without direct assistance of the Almighty.

I have often wished that I was a more devout man than I am. Nevertheless, amid the greatest difficulties of my Administration, when I could not see any other resort, I would place my whole reliance in God, knowing that all would go well, and that He would decide for the right.

When a friend informed President Abraham Lincoln that the Nomination Convention in Cleveland, Ohio did not draw the large numbers of Lincoln supporters expected, but rather only about 400, Lincoln reached for a Bible on his desk and read from it:

And everyone that was in distress, and everyone that was in debt, and everyone that was discontented, gathered themselves unto him; and he became captain over them; and there were with him about four hundred men.

As General Lee led his army of 76,000 men into Pennsylvania, panic took hold of Washington, D.C. In the midst, President Lincoln remained strangely confident. He later related to a general wounded at Gettysburg:

When everyone seemed panic-stricken...I went to my room...and got down on my knees before Almighty God and prayed...Soon a sweet comfort crept into my soul that God Almighty had taken the whole business into His own hands....

On November 19, 1863, President Abraham Lincoln delivered his Gettysburg Address. The Battle of Gettysburg, consisting of three intense days of fighting, (July 1, 2, and 3, 1863), resulted in over 50,000 deaths. This battle was the beginning of the end for the valiant Confederate Army. Lincoln's ten-sentence speech of 267 words has become world renowned and is engraved in stone in the Lincoln Memorial in Washington, D.C.:

Fourscore and seven years ago our fathers brought forth upon this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure.

We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

But in a larger sense we cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it far above our poor power to add or detract.

The world will little note, nor long remember, what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced.

It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us - that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion - that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain - that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom - and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

On December 3, 1863, in his Third Annual Message to Congress, President Abraham Lincoln stated:

Another year of health and of sufficiently abundant harvests has passed. For these, and especially for the improved condition of our national affairs, our renewed and profoundest gratitude to God is due....

The supplemental treaty between the United States and Great Britain for the suppression of the African slave trade, made on the 17th day of February last, has been duly ratified and carried into execution. It is believed that so far as American ports and American citizens are concerned that inhuman and odious traffic has been brought to an end....

It is hoped that the effect of [Indian] treaties will result in the establishment of permanent friendly relations with such of these tribes as have been brought into frequent and bloody collision with our outlying settlements and emigrants. Sound policy and our imperative duty to these wards of the Government demand our anxious and constant attention to their material well-being, to their progress in the arts of civilization, and, above all, to that moral training which under the blessing of Divine Providence will confer upon them the elevated and sanctifying influences, hopes and consolations, of the Christian faith.

On December 8, 1863, President Abraham Lincoln issued a Proclamation of Amnesty and Pardon to the participants of the Confederate insurrection:

Whereas it is now desired by some persons heretofore engaged in said rebellion to resume their allegiance to the United States and to reinaugurate loyal state governments within and for their respective States:

Therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do proclaim, declare, and make known to all persons who have, directly or by implication, participated in the existing rebellion, except as hereinafter excepted, that a full pardon is hereby granted to them and each of them, with restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves and in property cases where rights of third parties shall have intervened, and upon the condition that every such person shall take and subscribe an oath and thenceforward keep and maintain said oath inviolate, and which oath shall be registered for permanent preservation and shall be of the tenor and effect following, to wit:

"I, _____, do solemnly swear, in presence of Almighty God, that I will henceforth faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States and the Union of the States thereunder, and that I will in like manner abide by and faithfully support all acts of Congress passed during the existing rebellion with reference to slaves...and that I will in like manner abide by and faithfully support all proclamations of the President made during the existing rebellion having reference to slaves.... So help me God."

On December 23, 1863, President Lincoln related to John Hay:

Common-looking people are the best in the world; that is the reason the Lord makes so many of them.

In encouraging hospital staff to allow ministers to pray and read Scriptures with the soldiers, President Abraham Lincoln stated:

If there were more praying and less swearing, it would be far better for our country, and we all need to be prayed for, officers as well as privates; and if I were near death, I think I should like to hear prayer.

In 1863, during the Civil War, President Lincoln overheard someone remark that they hoped "the Lord was on the Union's side." Lincoln gave a straightforward reply:

I am not at all concerned about that, for I know that the Lord is always on the side of the right. But it is my constant anxiety and prayer that I and this nation should be on the Lord's side.

In speaking to a minister of the Christian Commission, an organization that ministered to the soldiers during the Civil War, President Lincoln said:

If it were not for my firm belief in an overruling Providence, it would be difficult for me, in the midst of such complications of affairs, to keep my reason on its seat. But I am confident that the Almighty has His plans, and will work them out; and, whether we see it or not, they will be the best for us.

In the spring of 1864, President Lincoln remarked:

When the war began, three years ago, neither party, nor any man, expected it would last till now. Each looked for the end, in some way, long ere today.... But here we are; the war has not ended.... So true is it that man proposes, but God disposes.

On May 9, 1864, from his Executive Mansion in Washington, President Abraham Lincoln wrote:

To the Friends of the Union and Liberty:
Page 607

Enough is known of the army operations within the last five days to claim our especial gratitude to God, while what remains undone demands our most sincere prayers to and reliance upon Him, without whom all human efforts are in vain. I recommend that all patriots, at their homes, in their places of public worship, and wherever they may be, unite in common thanksgiving and prayer to Almighty God.

On July 7, 1864, President Abraham Lincoln issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Humiliation and Prayer:

Whereas the Senate and House of Representatives at their last session adopted a concurrent resolution, which was approved on the 2d day of July instant and which was in the words following, namely:

That the President of the United States be requested to appoint a day for humiliation and prayer by the people of the United States; that he request his constitutional advisers at the head of the Executive Departments to unite with him as Chief Magistrate of the nation, at the city of Washington, and the members of Congress, and all magistrates, all civil, military, and naval officers, all soldiers, sailors, and marines, with all loyal and law-abiding people, to convene at their usual places of worship, or wherever they may be, to confess and to repent of their manifold sins; to implore the compassion and forgiveness of the Almighty, that, if consistent with His will, the existing rebellion may be speedily suppressed and the supremacy of the Constitution and laws of the United States may be established throughout all the States; to implore Him, as the Supreme Ruler of the World, not to destroy us as a people, nor suffer us to be destroyed by the hostility or connivance of other nations or by obstinate adherence to our own counsels, which may be in conflict with His eternal purposes, and to implore Him to enlighten the mind of the nation to know and do His will, humbly believing that it is in accordance with His will that our place should be maintained as a united people among the family of nations; to implore Him to grant to our armed defenders and the masses of the people that courage, power of resistance, and endurance necessary to secure that result; to implore Him in His infinite goodness to soften the hearts, enlighten the minds, and quicken the consciences of those in rebellion, that they may lay down their arms and speedily return to their allegiance to the United States, that they may not be utterly destroyed, that the effusion of blood may be stayed, and that unity and fraternity may be restored and peace established throughout all our borders:

Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, cordially concurring with the Congress of the United States in the penitential and pious sentiments expressed in the aforesaid resolution and heartily approving of the devotional design and purpose thereof, do hereby appoint the first Thursday of August next to be observed by the people of the United States as a day of national humiliation and prayer.

I do hereby further invite and request the heads of the Executive Departments of this Government, together with all legislators, all judges and magistrates, and all other persons exercising authority in the land, whether civil, military, or naval, and all soldiers, seamen, and marines in the national service, and all the other loyal and law-abiding people of the United States, to assemble in their preferred places of public worship on that day, and there and then to render to the Almighty and Merciful Ruler of the Universe such homages and such confessions and to offer to Him such supplications as the Congress of the United States have in their aforesaid resolution so solemnly, so earnestly, and so reverently recommended.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

In the summer of 1864, an old friend of Lincoln's, Joshua F. Speed, observed the President reading a Bible, and remarked: "I am glad to see you so profitably engaged... if you have recovered from your skepticism; I am sorry to say that I have not." President Lincoln then placed his hand on his friend's shoulder, and replied:

You are wrong, Speed. Take all that you can of this Book upon reason, and the balance on faith, and you will live and die a happier man.

On September 3, 1864, President Abraham Lincoln issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving:

The signal success that Divine Providence has recently vouchsafed to the operations of the United States fleet and army in the harbor of Mobile, and the reduction of Fort Powell, Fort Gaines, and Fort Morgan, and the glorious achievements of the army under Major-General Sherman in the State of Georgia, resulting in the capture of the city of Atlanta, call for devout acknowledgement to the Supreme Being, in whose hands are the destinies of nations.

It is therefore requested that on next Sunday, in all places of public worship in the United States, thanksgiving be offered to Him for His mercy in preserving our national existence against the insurgent rebels who so long have been waging a cruel war against the Government of the United States for its overthrow; and also that prayer be made for the divine protection to our brave soldiers and their leaders in the field, who have so often and so gallantly periled their lives in battling with the enemy, and for blessing and comfort from the Father of Mercies to the sick, wounded, and prisoners, and to the orphans and widows of those who have fallen in the service of their country; and that He will continue to uphold the Government of the United States against all the efforts of public enemies and secret foes.

As reported in the Washington Chronicle, September 5, 1864, President Abraham Lincoln addressed the Committee of Colored People from Baltimore, acknowledging the elegant Bible they had presented him:

In regard to this Great Book, I have but to say, I believe the Bible is the best gift God has given to man. All the good Saviour gave to the world was communicated through this Book. But for this Book we could not know right from wrong. All things most desirable for man's welfare, here and hereafter, are to be found portrayed in it. To you I return my most sincere thanks for the elegant copy of the great Book of God which you present.

On October 20, 1864, President Abraham Lincoln issued the Second Annual National Day of Thanksgiving and Praise:

It has pleased Almighty God to prolong our national life another year, defending us with His guardian care against unfriendly designs from abroad and vouchsafing to us in His mercy many and signal victories over the enemy, who is of our own household.

It has also pleased our Heavenly Father to favor as well our citizens in their homes as our soldiers in their camps and our sailors on the rivers and seas with unusual health. He has largely augmented our free population by emancipation and by immigration, while He has opened to us new sources of wealth and has crowned the labor of our workmen in every department of industry with abundant rewards.

Moreover, He has been pleased to animate and inspire our minds and hearts with fortitude, courage, and resolution sufficient for the great trial of civil war into which we have been brought by our adherence as a nation to the cause of freedom and humanity, and to afford to us reasonable hopes of an ultimate and happy deliverance from all our dangers and afflictions:

Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do hereby appoint and set apart the last Thursday in November next as a day which I desire to be observed by all my fellow-citizens, wherever they may then be, as a day of thanksgiving and praise to Almighty God, the beneficent Creator and Ruler of the Universe.

And I do further recommend to my fellow-citizens aforesaid that on that occasion they do reverently humble themselves in the dust and from thence offer up penitent and fervent prayers and supplications to the Great Disposer of Events for a return of the inestimable blessings of peace, union, and harmony throughout the land which it has pleased Him to assign as a dwelling place for ourselves and for our posterity throughout all generations.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

On November 21, 1864, President Lincoln sent a letter to Mrs. Lydia Bixby of Boston, who had lost five sons in the Civil War:

Dear Madam, I have been shown in the files of the War Department a statement of the Adjutant-General of Massachusetts that you are the mother of five sons who have died gloriously on the field of battle.

I feel how weak and fruitless must be any words of mine which should attempt to beguile you from the grief of a loss so overwhelming. But I cannot refrain from tendering to you the consolation that may be found in the thanks of the Republic they died to save.

I pray that our Heavenly Father may assuage the anguish of your bereavement, and leave you only the cherished memory of the loved and lost, and the solemn pride that must be yours to have laid so costly a sacrifice upon the altar of freedom.

In 1864, President Abraham Lincoln recorded:

I believe in national humiliation, fasting, and prayer, in keeping a day holy to the Lord, devoted to the humble discharge of the religious duties proper to such a solemn occasion....

I believe in Him whose will, not ours, should be done. I believe the people of the United States, in the forms approved by their own consciences, should render the homage due to the Divine Majesty for the wonderful things He has done in the nation's behalf, and invoke the influence of His Holy Spirit to subdue anger....

I believe in His eternal truth and justice. I believe the will of God prevails; without Him all human reliance is vain; without the assistance of that Divine Being I cannot succeed; with that assistance I cannot fail. I believe I am a humble instrument in the hands of our Heavenly Father; I desire that all my works and acts may be according to His will; and that it may be so, I give thanks to the Almighty and seek His aid. I believe in praise to Almighty God, the beneficent Creator and Ruler of the Universe.

On Saturday, March 4, 1865, in his Second Inaugural Address, just 45 days before his assassination, President Abraham Lincoln stated:

Neither party expected for the war the magnitude or the duration which it has already attained....

Both read the same Bible and pray to the same God, and each invokes His aid against the other. It may seem strange that any men should dare ask a just God's assistance in wringing their bread from the sweat of other men's faces, but let us judge not, that we be not judged.

The prayers of both could not be answered. That of neither has been answered fully. The Almighty has His own purposes. "Woe unto the world because of offenses; for it must needs be that offenses come, but woe to that man by whom the offense cometh."

If we shall suppose that American slavery is one of those offenses which, in the providence of God, must needs come, but which, having continued through His appointed time, He now wills to remove, and that He gives to both North and South this terrible war as the woe due to those by whom the offense came, shall we discern therein any departure from those divine attributes which the believers in a living God always ascribe to Him?

Fondly do we hope, fervently do we pray, that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet, if God will that it continue until all the wealth piled by the bondsmen's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said three thousand years ago, so still it must be said "the judgements of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."

With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in, to bind up the nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow, and his orphan - to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations.

On March 17, 1865, President Lincoln addressed the Indiana Regiment:

Whenever I hear anyone arguing for slavery, I feel a strong impulse to see it tried on him personally.

In 1865, President Lincoln made his last speech to a crowd in front of the White House:

The evacuation of Petersburg and Richmond, and the surrender of the principal insurgent army, give hope of a righteous and speedy peace, whose joyous expression cannot be restrained. In the midst of this, however, He from whom all blessings flow must not be forgotten. A call for a national thanksgiving is being prepared and will be duly promulgated.

In answering a question from L. E. Chittenden, Register of the Treasury, President Abraham Lincoln is reported to have stated:

That the Almighty does make use of human agencies, and directly intervenes in human affairs, is one of the plainest statements of the Bible. I have had so many evidences of his direction - so many instances when I have been controlled by some other power than my own will - that I cannot doubt that this power comes from above.

I frequently see my way clear to a decision when I have no sufficient facts upon which to found it. But I cannot recall one instance in which I have followed my own judgement, founded upon such a decision, where the results were unsatisfactory; whereas, in almost every instance where I have yielded to the views of others, I have had occasion to regret it.

I am satisfied that when the Almighty wants me to do or not to do a particular thing, He finds a way of letting me know it. I am confident that it is His design to restore the Union. He will do it in his own good time.

Recorded in the work, Recollections of President Lincoln, and his Administration, written by Lincoln's Register of the Treasury L. E. Chittenden, President Lincoln stated:

American Quotations.txt

The character of the Bible is easily established, at least to my satisfaction. We have to believe many things which we do not comprehend. The Bible is the only history that claims to be God's Book - to comprise His laws, His history. It contains an immense amount of evidence as to its authenticity....

Now let us treat the Bible fairly. If we had a witness on the stand whose general story was true, we would believe him even when he asserted the facts of which we have no other evidence. We ought to treat the Bible with equal fairness. I decided long ago that it was less difficult to believe that the Bible was what it claimed to be than to disbelieve it.

President Abraham Lincoln stated:

Here without contemplating consequences, before High Heaven, and in the face of the world, I swear eternal fidelity to the just cause, as I deem it, of the land of my life, my liberty, and my love.... Let none falter, who thinks he is right, and we may succeed.

I have always taken Counsel of Him, and referred to Him my plans, and have never adopted a course of proceeding without being assured, as far as I could be, of His approbation.

Surely God would not have created such a being as man, with an ability to grasp the infinite, to exist only for a day. No, no, man was made for immortality.

Whenever any church will inscribe over its altar as a qualification for membership the Savior's statement of the substance of the law and gospel, "Thou shalt love the Lord Thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and thy neighbor as thyself," that church will I join with all my heart and soul.

No man is poor who has had a godly mother.

All that I am or hope to be I owe to my angel mother... I remember my mother's prayers and they have always followed me. They have clung to me all my life.

Abraham Lincoln is attributed to have stated:

A child is a person who is going to carry on what you have started. He is going to sit where you are sitting, and when you are gone, attend to those things you think are important. You may adopt all the policies you please, but how they will be carried out depends on him.

He will assume control of your cities, states, and nations. He is going to move in and take over your churches, schools, universities, and corporations. All your books are going to be judged by him. The fate of humanity is in his hands.

The philosophy of the school room in one generation will be the philosophy of government in the next.

The only assurance of our nation's safety is to lay our foundation in morality and religion.

In 1865, shortly before Lee's surrender, Abraham Lincoln began his second term. In visiting with State Senator James Scovel of New Jersey, he shared:

Young man, if God gives me four years more to rule this country, I believe it will become what it ought to be - what its Divine Author intended it to be - no longer one vast plantation for breeding human beings for the purpose of lust and bondage. But it will become a new Valley of Jehoshaphat, where all the nations of the earth will assemble together under one flag, worshipping a common God, and they will celebrate the resurrection of human freedom.

In 1865, not long before he was assassinated, a clergyman from Illinois asked Lincoln, "Do you love Jesus?" President Abraham Lincoln told him how being at Gettysburg had affected him in that regard:

When I left Springfield, I asked the people to pray for me. I was not a Christian. When I buried my son, the severest trial of my life, I was not a Christian. But when I went to Gettysburg and saw the graves of thousands of our soldiers, I then and there consecrated myself to Christ. Yes, I do love Jesus.

On April 14, 1865, just five days after the Civil War had ended, Abraham Lincoln went to Ford's theatre with his wife, Mary Todd Lincoln. She recalled his last words as they sat there:

He said he wanted to visit the Holy Land and see those places hallowed by the footprints of the Saviour. He was saying there was no city he so much desired to see as Jerusalem. And with the words half spoken on his tongue, the bullet of the assassin entered the brain, and the soul of the great and good President was carried by the angels to the New Jerusalem above.

On April 15, 1865, Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy, communicated news of President Lincoln's death to the Department of the Navy in General Order No. 51:

The Department announces with profound sorrow to the officers and men of the Navy and Marine Corps the death of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States. Stricken down by the hand of an assassin on the evening of the 14th instant, when surrounded by his family and friends, he lingered a few hours after receiving the fatal wound, and died at 7 o'clock 22 minutes this morning.

A grateful people had given their willing confidence to the patriot and statesman under whose wise and successful administration the nation was just emerging from the civil strife which for four years has afflicted the land when this terrible calamity fell upon the country. To him our gratitude was justly due, for to him, under God, more than to any other person, are we indebted for the successful vindication of the integrity of the Union and the maintenance of the power of the Republic.

On April 17, 1865, at noon, the members of the Thirty-ninth Congress then in Washington, D.C., met in the Senate reception room of the Capitol and passed the action:

The members of the Senate and House of Representatives now assembled in Washington, humbly confessing their dependence upon Almighty God, who rules all that is done for human good, make haste at this informal meeting to express the emotions with which they have been filled by the appalling tragedy which has deprived the nation of its head and covered the land with mourning; and in further declaration of their sentiments unanimously resolve:

That in testimony of their veneration and affection for the illustrious dead, who has been permitted, under Providence, to do so much for his country and for liberty, they will unite in the funeral services and by an appropriate committee will accompany his remains to their place of burial in the State from which he was taken for the national service.

On Wednesday, April 19, 1865, the pastor of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church, Rev. Phineas D. Gurley, D.D., who had prayed with Lincoln at his deathbed, delivered the sermon at the funeral of President in the East Room of the White House:

He saw his duty as the Chief Magistrate of a great and imperiled people, and he determined to do his duty, and his whole duty, seeking the guidance and leaning on the arm of Him of whom it is written, "He giveth power to the faint, and to them that have no might He increaseth strength."

Yes, he leaned upon His arm. He recognized and received the truth that the "Kingdom is the Lord's, and He is the Governor among the nations." He remembered that "God is in history," and he felt that nowhere had His hand and His mercy been so marvelously conspicuous as in the history of this nation.

He hoped and prayed that the same Hand would continue to guide us, and that the same mercy continue to abound to us in the time of our greatest need.

I speak what I know, and testify what I have often heard him say, when I affirm that that guidance and mercy were the props upon which he humbly and habitually leaned; they were the best hope he had for himself and for his country.

Hence, when he was leaving his home in Illinois... he said to the old and tried friends who gathered tearfully around him to bade him farewell, "I leave you with this request: pray for me." They did pray for him; and millions of other people prayed for him; nor did they pray in vain.

Their prayer was heard, and the answer appears in all his subsequent history; it shines forth with Heavenly radiance in the whole course and tenor of his administration....

Never shall I forget the emphasis and the deep emotion with which he said in this very room, to a company of clergymen and others, who called to pay him their respects in the darkest days of our civil conflict:

"Gentlemen, my hope of success in this great and terrible struggle rests on that immutable foundation, the justice and goodness of God. And when events are threatening, and prospects very dark, I still hope that, in some way which man cannot see, all will be well in the end, because our cause is just, and God is on our side."

He is dead; but the God in whom he trusted lives, and He can guide and strengthen his successor, as He guided and strengthened him.

In a Memorial Address for President Lincoln, April 24, 1865, Schuyler Colfax, Speaker of the House of Representatives stated:

Nor should I forget to mention here that the last act of Congress ever signed by him was one requiring that the motto, in which he sincerely believed, "In God We Trust," should hereafter be inscribed upon all our national coin.

In describing President Abraham Lincoln, Count Leo Tolstoi, the Russian novelist and playwright, declared him:

A Christ in miniature.

In 1896, President William McKinley gave his assessment of President Abraham Lincoln:

The purposes of God, working through the ages, were, perhaps, more clearly revealed to him than to any other. . . . He was the greatest man of his time, especially approved of God for the work He gave him to do.

Abraham Lincoln's own words are inscribed into the walls of the Lincoln Memorial in Washington D.C.:

That this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

At the opposite end, on the north wall, his Second Inaugural Address alludes to "God," the "Bible," "providence," "the Almighty," and "divine attributes." It then continues:

As was said 3000 years ago, so it still must be said, "The judgements of the Lord are true and righteous al together."

Darwin, Charles Robert (February 12, 1809-April 19, 1882), was a British naturalist. He propounded the evolutionary theory of origins. In his work, Origin of Species, 1859, Charles Darwin wrote:

To suppose that the eye with all its inimitable contrivances for adjusting the focus to different distances, for admitting different amounts of light, and for the correction of spherical and chromatic aberration, could have been formed by natural selection, seems, I freely confess, absurd in the highest degree.

May we not believe that a living optical instrument might thus be formed as superior to one of glass, as the works of the Creator are to those of man?

Why then is not every geological formation and every stratum full of such intermediate links? Geology assuredly does not reveal any such finely graduated organic chain; and this, perhaps, is the most obvious and serious objection which can be urged against the theory.

For I am well aware that scarcely a single point is discussed in this volume on which facts cannot be adduced, often apparently leading to conclusions directly opposite to those at which I arrived.

There is a grandeur in this view of life, with its several powers, having been originally breathed by the Creator into a few forms or into one.

Lady Hope, born Elizabeth Reic Cotton (1842-1922), who married widower retired Admiral Sir James Hope in 1877, writes of a conversation she had with Charles Darwin shortly before his death. She was engaged in tent evangelism and is verified to have visited the sick and elderly in Kent in the 1880's. In 1922, she died of cancer in Sydney, Australia, where her tomb may still be seen. Darwin's biographer, James Moore, lecturer in the history of science and technology at The Open University in the United Kingdom, concluded that Lady Hope most likely visited Charles between Wednesday, September 28 and Sunday October 2, 1881, when his children, Francis and Henrietta were not present. Moore agrees that her report does contain authentic details, though the summer house referred to would have difficulty accommodating 30 people, and that Darwin's family members are inimical to any conversion reports. The account of her conversation with Darwin was reprinted August 19, 1915, in The Watchman Examiner (Boston: American Baptist Journal), in the Christian Witness (147 Commonwealth St., Sydney, Australia) and the Christian Reader's Digest, December 1941.

Reflecting on his work near the end of his life, Charles Darwin expressed:

I was a young man with unformed ideas. I threw out queries, suggestions, wondering all the time over everything; and to my astonishment the ideas took like wildfire. People made a religion of them.

Being bedridden many months before his death, Darwin was often found reading. When the visitor asked what it was he was studying, he replied:

Hebrews, still Hebrews. "The Royal Book," I call it.

After speaking on "the holiness of God" and "the grandeur of this Book," Darwin is reported to have stated:

Christ Jesus and his salvation. Is not that the best theme?

Winthrop, Robert Charles (May 12, 1809-November 16, 1894), was a U. S. Representative, author and orator. He served as the Speaker of the House of Representatives, 1847-49. He was a descendant of Governor John Winthrop. On May 28, 1849, Robert Charles Winthrop spoke at the Annual Meeting of the Massachusetts Bible Society in Boston, stating:

The voice of experience and the voice of our own reason speak but one language. . . . Both united in teaching us, that men may as well build their houses upon the sand and expect to see them stand, when the rains fall, and the winds blow, and the floods come, as to found free institutions upon any other basis than that of morality and virtue, of which the Word of God is the only authoritative rule, and the only adequate sanction.

All societies of men must be governed in some way or other. The less they have of stringent State Government, the more they must have of individual self-government. The less they rely on public law or physical force, the more they must rely on private moral restraint.

Men, in a word, must necessarily be controlled either by a power within them, or a power without them; either by the word of God, or by the strong arm of man; either by the Bible or by the bayonet.

It may do for other countries, and other governments to talk about the State supporting religion. Here, under our own free institutions, it is Religion which must support the State.

Robert Charles Winthrop stated:

The Bible itself is its own best witness. No evolution produced that Volume, and no revolution of thought, or action, or human will can ever prevail against it. Revisions and new versions may improve or may impair the letter, but they can never change its essential character. The Gospel of Jesus Christ, through which He brought life and immortality to light, like its Divine Author, is the same "yesterday, today, and forever."

In 1866, Robert Winthrop addressed the American Bible Society in New York on its jubilee, saying:

Beyond all doubt, my friends, we are dealing here today with the great enginery of the world's progress, with the greatest of all instrumentalities for social advancement as well as for individual salvation.

Mitchell, Ormsby Macknight (July 28, 1809-October 30, 1862), was an American astronomer and a Major-General in the Civil War. He was famous for having led the raid which captured Huntsville, Alabama, in April of 1862.

As director of the Dudley Observatory in Albany, New York, Ormsby Mitchell wrote: Planetary and Stellar Worlds, 1848; Popular Astronomy, 1860; and a book entitled, The Astronomy of the Bible, in which he stated:

Let us turn to the language of the Bible; it furnishes the only vehicle to express the thoughts which overwhelm us, and we break out involuntarily in the language of God's own inspiration:

"Have ye not known, hath it not been told to you from the beginning, have ye not understood from the foundation of the earth? It is He who sitteth upon the circle of the earth, that stretcheth out the heavens like a curtain, and spreadeth them out as a tent to dwell in.

"Lift up your eyes on high, and behold. Who hath created all these things, that bringeth out their host by number? It is He who meted out the heavens with a span, and comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, and weighed the mountains in scales and the hills in balances.

"It is He who stretcheth out the north over the empty place, and hangeth the earth upon nothing. He telleth the number of the stars. He calleth them all by their names."

Chiniquy, Charles Paschal Telesphor (July 30, 1809-January 16, 1899), was ordained a priest in Canada, 1833. He became known as the "Apostle of Temperance of Canada." In 1851, he brought 7,500 French Canadians into Illinois to found the French Colony of St. Anne. The church he built, at 334 South St. Louis Avenue, in St. Anne, Illinois, still stands. Late in life he was befriended by Abraham Lincoln. In 1859, he returned to Canada and began traveling and ministering in Europe, Australia and New Zealand. A prolific writer, he relayed his experience after studying the Scriptures:

It seemed that God was far away, but He was very near. Suddenly the thought entered my mind: "You have your Gospel; read it, and you will find the light." On my knees, and with trembling hand, I opened the book. Not I, but God opened it, for my eyes fell on I Cor. 7:23: "You have been bought with a price; do not become the slaves of men."

With these words the light came to me, and for the first time I saw the great mystery of salvation, as much as man can see it. I said to myself, "Jesus has bought me. Then, if Jesus has bought me, He has saved me. I am saved! Jesus is my God! All the works of God are perfect! I am, then, perfectly saved - Jesus could not save me by half. I am saved by the blood of the Lamb. I am saved by the death of Jesus...."

I then felt such a joy, such a peace, that the angels of God could not be more happy than I was....

It was thus I found the Light and the great mystery of our salvation, which is so simple and so beautiful, so sublime and so grand.

Tennyson, Alfred, Lord (August 6, 1809-October 6, 1892), 1st Baron Tennyson, was accorded the royal honor of being named an English poet-laureate. He authored the poem Charge of the Light Brigade, memorializing the courage of the British Cavalry as they charged to their death against the Russian guns at the Battle of Balaklava, October 25, 1854. He wrote Idylls of the King, 1859-85, which described the legends of King Arthur's Court, the Knights of the Round Table, Queen Guinevere, Sir Lancelot, Sir Galahad and the search for the Holy Grail.

Alfred, Lord Tennyson wrote:

Bible reading is an education in itself.

The life after death is the cardinal point of Christianity. I believe that God reveals Himself in every individual soul; and my idea of heaven is the perpetual ministry of one soul to another. There are two things which I believe to be beyond the intelligence of man: the one the intellectual genius of Shakespeare, and the other the religious genius of Christ.

My mother was as mild as any saint, and nearly canonized by all she knew, so gracious was her tact and tenderness.

In 1850, Alfred, Lord Tennyson wrote his work In Memoriam, a poem written after the death of his close friend, Arthur Henry Hallam. Queen Victoria once said, "Next to the Bible, 'In Memoriam' is my comfort." In it Tennyson wrote:

And so the Word had breath, and wrought
With human hands the creed of creeds
In loveliness of perfect deeds,
More strong than all poetic thought.

Ring in the valiant man and free,
The larger heart, the kindlier hand;
Ring out the darkness of the land,
Ring in the Christ that is to be.

In 1850, Tennyson married Emily Sellwood, to whom he had been engaged for a long time. He later wrote:

The peace of God came into my life before the altar when I wedded her.

In Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington, 1852, st. 9, Tennyson wrote:

Speak no more of his renown.
Lay your earthly fancies down,
And in the vast cathedral leave him,
God accept him, Christ receive him.

In Maud, 1855, Part II, sec. iv, st. 3, Tennyson wrote:

Oh, Christ, that it were possible
For one short hour to see
The souls we loved, that they might tell us
What and where they be.

In Enoch Arden, 1864, line 222, Tennyson wrote:

Cast all your cares on God; that anchor holds.

In The Higher Pantheism, 1869, st. 6, Tennyson wrote:

Spirit can meet -
Speak to Him thou for He hears, and Spirit with Closer is He than breathing, and nearer than hands and feet.

In other works, Alfred, Lord Tennyson wrote:

In Grief

Strong Son of God! Immortal Love,
Whom we, that have not seen Thy face,
By faith, and faith alone, embrace,
Believing where we can not prove!

Thine are these orbs of light and shade;
Thou madest life in man and brute;
Thou madest Death; and lo, Thy foot
Is on the skull which Thou hast made!

Thou wilt not leave us in the dust;
Thou madest man, he knows not why;
He thinks he was not made to die;
And Thou hast made Him: Thou art just.

Thou seemest human and Divine,
The highest, holiest manhood, Thou;
Our wills are ours, we know not how;
Our wills are ours to make them Thine.

Lazarus

When Lazarus left his charnel-cave,
And home to Mary's house returned,
Was this demanded - if he yearned
To hear her weeping by his grave?

"Where wert thou, brother, those four days?"
There lives no record of reply,
Which, telling what it is to die,
Had surely added praise to praise.

From every house the neighbors met,
The streets were filled with joyful sound;
A solemn gladness even crowned
The purple brows of Olivet.

Behold a man raised up by Christ;
The rest remained unrevealed;
He told it not, or something sealed
The lips of that Evangelist.

In Flower in the Crannied Wall, 1869, Tennyson wrote:

Flower in the crannied wall,
I pluck you out of the crannies,
I hold you here, root and all, in my hand,
Little flower - but if I could understand
What you are, root and all, and all in all,
I should know what God and man is.

In Idylls of the King, 1859-85, Tennyson wrote The Passing of Arthur, line 9:

I found Him in the shining of the stars,
I marked Him in the flowering of His fields,
But in His ways with men I find Him not.

In line 407:

And slowly answered Arthur from the barge:
The old order changeth, yielding place to new;
And God fulfills himself in many ways,
Lest one good custom should corrupt the world.

In Crossing the Bar, 1889, st. 3, Tennyson wrote:

I hope to see my Pilot face to face
When I have crossed the bar.

Bennett, Sir Risdon (September 29, 1809-December 14, 1891), was the President of the Royal Society of Physicians. In 1890, Sir Risdon Bennett wrote in the Report of the Christian Evidence Society:

It has been truly said that "the real evidence of Christianity is in its power." And how can we look around the world and fail to see proof of this power wherever the Gospel is known, among all races of mankind, all classes of society, all ranks of intellect.

What is there comparable to the religion of Jesus Christ in promoting the happiness and welfare of mankind? The full influence of its power, even as regards the present life, we have indeed yet to see; and we can but faintly appreciate the inestimable light as shed on the life to come, the full glory of which has yet to be revealed.

Carson, "Kit" Christopher (December 24, 1809-May 23, 1868), was an American frontiersman, fur trapper, guide, Indian agent and soldier. He was a contemporary of the mountainmen explorers: Jedediah Smith (1798-1831), Jim Bridger (1804-1881) and Thomas Fitzpatrick (1799-1854); and his ventures west of the Mississippi were as famous as Daniel Boone's were to the east.

Kit Carson was born in Kentucky, ninth of fourteen children, and moved to the Boone's Lick district of Missouri with his family when he was about a year and a half old. At the onset of his last illness, while bringing Indian Chiefs to meet American leaders, Kit Carson stated:

Suddenly the bed seemed to rise with me - I felt my head swell and my breath leaving me. Then, I woke up at the window. It was open and my face and head all wet. I was on the floor and the chief was holding my head on his arm and putting water on me. He was crying. He said "I thought you were dead. You called your Lord Jesus, then you shut your eyes and couldn't speak."

I did not know that I spoke... I do not know that I called on the Lord Jesus, but I might - it's only Him that can help me where I stand now.

I must take the chiefs to Boston. They depend on me. I told them I would. Then we go home, straight. My wife must see me. If I was to write about this, or died out here, it would kill her. I must get home, and I think I can do it.

Gladstone, William Ewart (December 29, 1809-May 19, 1898), was an author and British Prime Minister four different times during Queen Victoria's reign. He asserted:

I have known ninety-five of the world's great men in my time, and of these eighty-seven were followers of the Bible. The Bible is stamped with a Specialty of Origin, and an immeasurable distance separates it from all competitors.

Most men at the head of great movements are Christian men. During the many years in the Cabinet I was brought in contact with some sixty master minds, and not more than perhaps three or four of whom were in sympathy with the skeptical movements of the day.

In his book, The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture, the Right Honorable W. E. Gladstone wrote:

They lead upward and onwards to the idea that the Scriptures are well called Holy Scriptures; and that, though assailed by camp, by battery, and by mine, they are, nevertheless, an house built upon a rock, and that rock impregnable; that the weapon of offense which shall impair their efficiency for aiding in the redemption of mankind has not yet been forged; that the Sacred Canon, which it took (perhaps) two thousand years from the accumulations of Moses down to the acceptance of the Apocalypse to construct, is like to wear out the storms and the sunshine of the world, and all the wayward aberrations of humanity, not merely for a term as long, but until time shall be no more.

The Christian faith and the Holy Scriptures arm us with the means of neutralizing and repelling the assaults of evil in and from ourselves. Mist may rest upon the surrounding landscape, but our own path is visible from hour to hour, from day to day.

"I do not ask to see

The distant scene; one step enough for me."

Our Saviour astonished the people because, instead of being lost in the mazes of arbitrary and vicious excrescences that darkened the face of religion, He taught them "with authority," and "not as the scribes."

If God has given us a revelation of His will, whether in the laws of our nature, or in the kingdom of grace, that revelation not only illuminates, but binds. Like the credentials of an earthly ambassador, it is just and necessary that the credentials of that revelation should be tested.

But if it be found genuine, if we have proofs of its being genuine, equal to those of which, in ordinary concerns of life, reason acknowledges the obligatory character, then we find ourselves to be not independent beings, engaged in an optional inquiry, but the servants of a Master, the pupils of a Teacher, the children of a Father, and each of us already bound with the bonds which those relations imply.

Morris, Benjamin Franklin (1810-1867) was an American historian. He wrote many insightful works, including: Memorial Record of the Nation's Tribute to Abraham Lincoln, 1865; The Life of Thomas Morris - Pioneer and Long a Legislator of Ohio, and U.S. senator from 1833 to 1839, 1856; Historical Sketch of Rising Sun, Indiana, and the Presbyterian Church - A Fortieth Anniversary Discourse, delivered Sept. 15, 1856, 1858; and The Christian Life and Character of the Civil Institutions of the United States - developed in the Official and Historical Annals of the Republic, in 1864, in which he expounded:

These fundamental objects of the Constitution are in perfect harmony with the revealed objects of the Christian religion. Union, justice, peace, the general welfare, and the blessings of civil and religious liberty, are the objects of Christianity, and always secured under its practical and beneficent reign.

The state must rest upon the basis of religion, and it must preserve this basis, or itself must fall. But the support which religion gives to the state will obviously cease the moment religion loses its hold upon the popular mind.

This is a Christian nation, first in name, and secondly because of the many and mighty elements of a pure Christianity which have given it character and shaped its destiny from the beginning. It is pre-eminently the land of the Bible, of the Christian Church, and of the Christian Sabbath. . . . The chief security and glory of the United States of America has been, is now, and will be forever, the prevalence and domination of the Christian Faith.

Black, Jeremiah Sullivan (January 10, 1810-August 19, 1883), was the U.S. Secretary of State, 1860-61, and U.S. Attorney General under President James Buchanan, 1857-60. He was the president of the Court of Common Pleas in Pennsylvania, 1842-51; State Supreme Court Justice, 1852-57; and U.S. Supreme Court Reporter, 1861-64. He wrote in the North American Review, August of 1881:

As a matter of fact, Jesus Christ died that sinners might be reconciled to God, and in that sense He died for them; that is, to furnish them with the means of averting Divine justice, which their crimes had provoked.

A man who, by any contrivance, causes his own offense to be visited on the head of an innocent person is unspeakably depraved. But are Christians guilty of this baseness, because they accept the blessings of an institution which their great Benefactor died to establish?

Loyalty to the King who erected a most magnificent government for us at the cost of His life - fidelity to the Master who bought us with His blood - is not the fraudulent substitution in place of the criminal.

Pope Leo XIII (March 2, 1810-July 20, 1903), whose given name was Gioacchino Pecci, stated in his encyclical on the condition of labor, Rerum Novarum, May 15, 1891:

Every man has by nature the right to possess property as his own.

Sears, Edmund Hamilton (April 6, 1810-January 16, 1876), was an American clergyman. He ministered in Wayland, Massachusetts, 1848-66; and in Weston, Massachusetts, 1866-76. In 1850, Edmund Hamilton Sears wrote The Angel's Song:

It came upon the midnight clear,
That glorious song of old,
From Angels bending near the earth
To touch their harps of gold:
"Peace on earth, good will to men
From heav'n's all gracious King."
The world in solemn stillness lay
To hear the angels sing.

Seymour, Horatio (May 31, 1810-February 12, 1886), was Governor of New York, 1853-55, and the War Governor of New York during the Civil War, 1863-65. Horatio Seymour, who was instrumental in gaining government sanction for the building of Erie Canal, was also the Democratic Presidential candidate in 1868.

On July 4, 1876, Horatio Seymour gave an oration entitled, The Future of the Human Race, delivered at Rome, New York. In it, he declared:

He who studies with care the jurisprudence of the Old Testament will see that this feeling of reverence for forefathers and devotion to country is made the substance of positive law in the command that men should honor their fathers and mothers. But sacred poetry is filled with appeals to these sentiments, and the narratives of the Bible abound with proofs of the great truth that the days of those who fear them shall be long upon the land which God hath given them.

Men cross the ocean and encounter the fatigues, dangers of a journey to the other side of the earth, that they may walk through the streets of Jerusalem where our Saviour trod, or look out from the hill of Zion, or wander amid sacred places. These scenes bring to their minds the story of the past in a way that thrills their nerves....

You will find that all history, all jurisprudence, all just reasonings, force us to the conclusion that not only does a Divine command, but that reason and justice call upon us all to honor our ancestors, and that there is a great practical truth which concerns the welfare and the power of all communities in the words of the inspired penman: "Honor thy father and thy mother that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."

Barnum, Phineas Taylor (July 5, 1810-April 7, 1891), was an American exhibitor and philanthropist. He originated The Greatest Show of Earth. Phineas Taylor Barnum stated:

Christ was sent into the world by our kind Father in Heaven to teach that "God is Love"; that love is the fulfilling of the law; and turn us away from our transgressions by showing us that the "way of the transgressor is hard," and always will be hard as long as we transgress; but charity, unselfishness, and a godly life is filled with joy and peace - that at the last the Almighty Father, being Almighty, and being our Father, will bring about immediate harmony.

The old Bible I believe to be as correct a history as could have been formed in remote ages - containing accounts of various lives and experiences by which we ought to profit. The New Testament abounds in testimony of the undying love of our Saviour for all, and especially for the poor, the unfortunate, and the erring. His mission was to teach them, and to save them from their sins by reconciling them to their Heavenly Father, and not reconciling Him to His created beings, for He was never unreconciled.

Most persons, on the whole, are humbugged by believing too little, than by believing too much.

Parker, Theodore (August 24, 1810-May 10, 1860), was an American abolitionist, clergyman, and graduate of Harvard. Strongly opposing slavery, he declared:

The Bible goes equally to the cottage of the peasant, and the palace of the king. It is woven into literature, and colors the talk of the street. The bark of the merchant cannot sail without it; and no ship of war goes to the conflict but it is there. It enters men's closets; directs their conduct, and mingles in all the grief and cheerfulness of life.

On May 29, 1850, Theodore Parker wrote The American Idea, in which he stated:

A democracy - that is a government of all the people, by all the people, for all the people; of course, a government of the principles of eternal justice, the unchanging law of God; for shortness' sake I will call it the idea of Freedom.

Clay, Cassius Marcellus (October 19, 1810-July 22, 1903), was an American abolitionist, statesman and politician. He served as a diplomat to Russia under both President Lincoln and President Grant, 1861-62, 1863-69. A strong opponent of slavery, he founded the anti-slavery journal True American, in Lexington, Kentucky, 1845. In 1854, he help found the Republican party.

Cassius Marcellus Clay stated:

The Bible, the record of Divine Revelation, is the one Book of religion and morals. Of all religious systems the Christian is most in unison with the law of God and the needs of man. The spirit of God inspires all living things. Jesus Christ is the leading inspiration, and is, therefore Divine.

New York Supreme Court (1811), in the case of the People v. Ruggles, 8 Johns 545-547, Chief Justice Chancellor Kent rendered:

The defendant was indicted... in December, 1810, for that he did, on the 2nd day of September, 1810... wickedly, maliciously, and blasphemously, utter, and with a loud voice publish, in the presence and hearing of divers good and Christian people, of and concerning the Christian religion, and of and concerning Jesus Christ, the false, scandalous, malicious, wicked and blasphemous words following: "Jesus Christ was a bastard, and his mother must be a whore," in contempt of the Christian religion... the defendant was tried and found guilty, and was sentenced by the court to be imprisoned for three months, and to pay a fine of $500.

The argument which the prosecuting attorney had presented to the court, explained:

While the constitution of the State has saved the rights of conscience, and allowed a free and fair discussion of all points of controversy among religious sects, it has left the principal engrafted on the body of our common law, that Christianity is part of the laws of the State, untouched and unimpaired.

Chief Justice Kent delivered the courts decision in this case:

Such words uttered with such a disposition were an offense at common law. In Taylor's case the defendant was convicted upon information of speaking similar words, and the Court... said that Christianity was parcel of the law, and to cast contumelious reproaches upon it, tended to weaken the foundation of moral obligation, and the efficacy of oaths.

And in the case of Rex v. Woolston, on a like conviction, the Court said... that whatever strikes at the root of Christianity tends manifestly to the dissolution of civil government... the authorities show that blasphemy against God and... profane ridicule of Christ or the Holy Scriptures (which are equally treated as blasphemy), are offenses punishable at common law, whether uttered by words or writings... because it tends to corrupt the morals of the people, and to destroy good order.

Such offenses have always been considered independent of any religious establishment or the rights of the Church. They are treated as affecting the essential interests of civil society...

We stand equally in need, now as formerly, of all the moral discipline, and of those principles of virtue, which help to bind society together.

The people of this State, in common with the people of this country, profess the general doctrines of Christianity, as the rule of their faith and practice; and to scandalize the author of these doctrines is not only, in a religious point of view, extremely impious, but, even in respect to the obligations due to society, is a gross violation of decency and good order.

Nothing could be more injurious to the tender morals of the young, than to declare such profanity lawful....

The free, equal, and undisturbed enjoyment of religious opinion, whatever it may be, and free and decent discussions on any religious subject, is granted and secured; but to revile... the religion professed by almost the whole community, is an abuse of that right....

We are a Christian people, and the morality of the country is deeply engrafted upon Christianity, and not upon the doctrines or worship of those impostors [other religions]....

[We are] people whose manners are refined and whose morals have been elevated and inspired with a more enlarged benevolence, by means of the Christian religion. Though the constitution has discarded religious establishments, it does not forbid judicial cognizance of those offenses against religion and morality which have no reference to any such establishment.... [offenses which] strike at the root of moral obligation, and weaken the security of the social ties....

This [constitutional] declaration (noble and magnanimous as it is, when duly understood) never meant to withdraw religion in general, and with it the best sanctions of moral and social obligation from all consideration and notice of the law....

To construe it as breaking down the common law barriers against licentious, wanton, and impious attacks upon Christianity itself, would be an enormous perversion of its meaning....

Christianity, in its enlarged sense, as a religion revealed and taught in the Bible, is not unknown to our law....

The Court are accordingly of opinion that the judgement.... must be affirmed.

Sumner, Charles (January 6, 1811-March 11, 1874), was a U. S. Senator from Massachusetts for 23 years, 1851-74. He was strongly opposed to slavery and was persecuted for taking that unpopular stand. So firm was his conviction against slavery, that he was once physically assaulted on the floor of the House by Representative Preston S. Brooks of South Carolina, receiving injuries from which he never fully recovered. As one of the founders of the Republican Party, Charles Sumner declared:

Familiarity with that great story of redemption, when God raised up the slave-born Moses to deliver His chosen people from bondage, and with that sublimer story where our Saviour died a cruel death that all men, without distinction of race, might be saved, makes slavery impossible.

Because Christians are in the minority there is no reason for renouncing Christianity, or for surrendering to the false religions; nor do I doubt that Christianity will yet prevail over the earth as the waters cover the sea.

Grealey, Horace (February 3, 1811-November 29, 1872), was an American journalist, newspaper editor and politician. He made famous the phrase, "Go West, Young Man!" Horace Grealey founded and edited the New York Tribune daily paper and The New Yorker magazine.

Called by the poet, John Greenleaf Whittier, "our later Franklin," Grealey's strong anti-slavery editorials helped to stir the North to oppose slavery. He was one of the founders of the Republican Party and used his influence to secure the nomination of Abraham Lincoln for the Presidency. In his Autobiography, Horace Greeley wrote:

It is impossible to mentally or socially enslave a Bible-reading people. The principles of the Bible are the groundwork of human freedom.

Your reference to the "blameless Christian wife" - and what is "more pleasing in the sight of God"? - impels me to say that I must consider Jesus of Nazareth a better authority as to what is Christian and what pleases God than you are.

His testimony on the subject is expressed and unequivocal (Matt. xix. 9) that a marriage can be ruthfully dissolved because of adultery alone. You well know that was not the law either of the Jews or Romans in His day, so that He can not have been misled by custom or tradition, even were it possible for Him to have been mistaken. I believe He was wholly right.

I am not, therefore, to be classed with those who claim to have been converted from one creed to another by studying the Bible alone.

Certainly, upon re-reading that Book in the light of my new convictions, I found therein abundant proofs to their correctness in the averments of patriarchs, Genesis iii. 15; xii. 3; Prophets, Isaiah xxv. 8; Apostles, Romans v. 12-21; viii. 19-21; I. Cor. xv. 42-54; Eph. i. 8-10; Col. i. 19-21; I. Tim. 2, 3-6; and of the Messiah Himself, Matthew xv. 13; John xii. 32....

In the light of this faith the dark problem of evil is irradiated, and virtually solved. "Perfect through suffering" was the way traced out by the great Captain of our Salvation.

Simpson, Sir James Young (June 7, 1811-May 6, 1870), was a Scottish obstetrician. He pioneered modern anesthesiology through his discovery of "Chloroform," 1847. He stated that his research was inspired by the "deep sleep" that Adam was put into.

Sir James Young Simpson, considered a chief founder of the medical field of gynecology, served as Professor of Obstetric Medicine at Edinburgh University. He invented the Simpson forceps, introduced iron wire sutures, and acupuncture. His writings on medical history, fetal pathology and hermaphroditism are highly regarded.

James Simpson declared his greatest discovery was:

That I have a Saviour!

A gospel tract he wrote concluded:

But again I looked and saw Jesus, my substitute, scourged in my stead and dying on the cross for me. I looked and cried and was forgiven. And it seems to be my duty to tell you of that Saviour, to see if you will not also look and live. "He was wounded for our transgressions... and with His stripes we are healed" (Isai ah 53: 5, 6).

Sir James Young Simpson stated:

The unregenerate, unbelieving soul is compared to a corpse; it is "dead in sins." Of all of you who are now living by faith in Christ it may be truthfully said to-day, as it was said eighteen centuries ago of the Ephesian converts to whom the Apostle Paul wrote, "You hath He quickened, who were dead."

As many of you as are unbelievers are, in the strong language of Scripture, "dead." You are dead in the eye of Divine justice; for as the condemned criminal is as a "dead man," when his crimes have brought on him the legal doom of death, you are likewise "dead," because "he that believeth not is condemned already."

Further, you are also spiritually dead on account of being cut off by your sins from communion with the living God. For as a corpse moves not, stirs not, feels not, and can not be aroused, so are you dead to all love of God, and to everything pertaining to the wondrous Gospel of Jesus Christ. Of the dread and crushing burden of their own sins your souls are not all conscious; for the dead feel not.

But in the infinitude of His love to our fallen race, God offers to each of us individually a free and full pardon, and life now and forever, if we only believe on Jesus Christ, His Son, whom He sent to suffer in our stead - to die that we might live - if we rely and rest entirely on Him as the all-sufficient sacrifice for our sins - as our substitute and security.

Stowe, Harriet Elizabeth Beecher (June 14, 1811-July 1, 1896), was an American teacher and author. She became famous for authoring the book Uncle Tom's Cabin, 1852. She was the daughter of the New England minister Lyman Beecher, and the sister of Henry Ward Beecher, one of the most renowned preachers of the day.

Her book, Uncle Tom's Cabin, published first in serial form between 1851-52, gained international fame and greatly stirred up the abolitionist movement. When President Lincoln met her, he greeted her by saying:

So you're the little lady who started the big war.

Her book ends by saying:

A day of grace is yet held out to us. Both North and South have been guilty before God; and the Christian church has a heavy account to answer. Not by combining together, to protect injustice and cruelty, and making a common capital of sin, is this Union to be saved, but by repentance, justice and mercy.

Dickens, Charles (February 7, 1812-June 9, 1870), was a distinguished English author. His works include: Pickwick Papers, 1837; Oliver Twist, 1838; David Copperfield, 1849-50; Great Expectations, 1860-61; Tale of Two Cities, 1859; and the favorite, A Christmas Carol, 1843, which sold 6,000 copies its first day. Perhaps the most touching moment in Dickens' novel, A Christmas Carol, was Tiny Tim's line:

God bless us every one.

Charles Dickens remarked:

I love little children, and it is not a slight thing when they, who are fresh from God, love us.

In 1849, 21 years before his death, Charles Dickens wrote a work expressly for his children, of which he and his wife, Catherine, had ten. Entitled The Life of Our Lord, the work included the miraculous events surrounding Jesus' birth, His miracle ministry, His death on the cross and His resurrection. The work, written without thought of publication, was left in the possession of his sister-in-law, Miss Georgia Hogarth. At her death in 1917, it came into the possession of his son, Sir Henry Fielding Dickens, who made provision in his Last Will and Testament for it to be published. In March of 1934, Marie Dickens proceeded to have it published, in serial form, by the Associated Newspapers, Ltd., of London. In it, Charles Dickens expressed:

My dear children, I am very anxious that you should know something about the History of Jesus Christ. For everybody ought to know about Him. No one ever lived, who was so good, so kind, so gentle, and so sorry for all people who did wrong, or were in anyway ill or miserable, as he was. And he is now in Heaven, where we hope to go, and to meet each other after we are dead, and there be happy always together, you never can think what a good place Heaven is, without knowing who he was and what he did....

When the Star stopped, the wise men went in, and saw the Child with Mary his Mother....

John said, "Why should I baptize you, who are so much better than I!" Jesus Christ made answer, "Suffer it to be so now." So John baptized him. And when he was baptized, the sky opened, and a beautiful bird like a dove came flying down, and the voice of God, speaking up in Heaven, was heard to say, "This is my beloved son, in whom I am well pleased!"...

When he came out of the Wilderness, he began to cure sick people by only laying his hand upon them; for God had given him power to heal the sick, and to give sight to the blind, and to do many wonderful and solemn things of which I shall tell you more by and by, and which are called "The Miracles" of Christ. I wish you would remember that word, because I shall use it again, and I should like you to know that it means something which is very wonderful and which could not be done without God's leave and assistance....

Jesus turned this water into wine, by only lifting up his hand....

For God had given Jesus Christ the power to do such wonders; and he did them, that people might know he was not a common man, and might believe what he taught them, and also believe that God had sent him; and many people, hearing this, and hearing that he cured the sick, did begin to believe in him....

He stopped, and went into Simon Peter's boat, and asked him if he had caught many fish. Peter said No; though they had worked all night with their nets, they had caught nothing. Christ said, "let down the net again." They did so; and it was immediately so full of fish, that it required the strength of many men (who came and helped them) to lift it out of the water, and even then it was very hard to do. This was another of the miracles of Jesus Christ....

This Leper fell at the feet of Jesus Christ, and said "Lord! If thou wilt, thou cans't make me well!" Jesus, always full of compassion, stretched out his hand, and said "I will! Be thou well!" And his disease went away, immediately, and he was cured....

Jesus, full of pity, said "Arise! Take up thy bed, and go to thine own home!" And the man rose up and went away quite well; blessing him, and thanking God....

Then Jesus Christ, glad that the Centurion believed in him so truly, said "Be it so!" And the servant became well, from that moment....

Then he commanded the room to be cleared of the people that were in it, and going to the dead child, took her by the hand, and she rose up quite well, as if she had been only asleep. Oh what a sight it must have been to see her parents clasp her in their arms, and kiss her, and thank God, and Jesus Christ his Son, for such great Mercy!....

For they brought sick people out into the streets and roads through which he passed, and cried out to him to touch them, and when he did, they became well....

The bearers of the bier standing still, he walked up to it and touched it with his hand, and said "Young Man! Arise." The dead man, coming to life again at the sound of the Saviour's voice, rose up and began to speak....

Jesus, coming near him, perceived that he was torn by an Evil Spirit, and cast the madness out of him, and into a herd of swine....

Our Saviour said to him, "take up thy bed and go away." And he went away, quite well....

Jesus ordered the stone to be rolled away, which was done. Then, after casting up his eyes, and thanking God, he said, in a loud and solemn voice, "Lazarus, come forth!" and the dead man, Lazarus, restored to life, came out among the people, and went home with his sisters. At this sight, so awful and affecting, many of the people there, believed that Christ was indeed the Son of God, come to instruct and save mankind....

Pilate was troubled in his mind to hear them so clamorous against Jesus Christ. His wife, too, had dreamed all night about it, and sent to him upon the Judgement Seat saying "Have nothing to do with that just man!"....

Bearing his cross, upon his shoulder, like the commonest and most wicked criminal, our blessed Saviour, Jesus Christ, surrounded by the persecuting crowd, went out of Jerusalem to a place called in the Hebrew language, Golgotha....

And crying "Father! Into thy hands I commend my Spirit!" - died. Then, there was a dreadful earthquake; and the great wall of the Temple, cracked; and the rocks were rent asunder. The guards, terrified at these sights, said to each other, "Surely this was the Son of God!"....

When that morning began to dawn, Mary Magdalene and the other Mary, and some other women, came to the Sepulchre, with some more spices which they had prepared. As they were saying to each other, "How shall we roll away the stone?" the earth trembled and shook, and an angel, descending from Heaven, rolled it back, and then sat resting on it. His countenance was like lightning, and his garments were white as snow....

As she gave this answer, she turned round, and saw Jesus standing behind her... Jesus pronounced her name, "Mary." Then she knew him, and starting, exclaimed "Master!"...

When they all three sat down to supper, he took some bread, and blessed it, and broke it.... Looking on him in wonder they found that his face was changed before them, and that it was Christ himself; and as they looked on him, he disappeared....

While they were speaking, Jesus suddenly stood in the midst of all the company, and said "Peace be unto ye!" Seeing that they were greatly frightened, he shewed them his hands and feet, and invited them to touch Him; and, to encourage them and give them time to recover themselves, he ate a piece of broiled fish and a piece of honeycomb before them all....

And conducting his disciples at last, out of Jerusalem as far as Bethany, he blessed them, and ascended in a cloud to Heaven, and took His place at the right hand of God....

Two white-robed angels appeared among them, and told them that as they had seen Christ ascend to Heaven, so He would, one day, come descending from it, to judge the World....

When Christ was seen no more, the Apostles began to teach the People as He had commanded them.... And through the power He had given them they healed the sick, and gave sight to the Blind, and speech to the Dumb, and Hearing to the Deaf....

They took the name of Christians from Our Saviour Christ, and carried Crosses as their sign, because on a Cross He had suffered Death....

So thousands upon thousands of Christians sprung up and taught the people and were cruelly killed, and were succeeded by other Christians, until the Religion gradually became the great religion of the World.

The End.

In a letter to his youngest son, Edward, Charles Dickens wrote:

Try to do to others as you would like to have them do to you; and do not be discouraged if they fail sometimes. It is much better for you that they should fail in obeying the greatest rule laid down by our Saviour than that you should.

I have put a New Testament among your books for the very same reasons, and with the very same hopes, that made me write an easy account of it for you when you were a child, because it is the best Book that ever was or ever will be known in the world; and because it teaches you the best lessons by which any human creature who tries to be truthful and faithful to duty can possibly be guided.

In a letter to his daughter, Charles Dickens wrote:

As your brothers have gone away, one by one, I have written to each such words as I am writing to you, and have entreated them all to guide themselves by this Book, putting aside the interpretations of men. You will remember that you have never at home been wearied about religious observances or mere formalities. I have always been anxious not to weary my children with such things before they were old enough to form opinions respecting them.

You will, therefore, understand the better that I now most solemnly impress upon you the truth and beauty of the Christian religion as it came from Jesus Christ Himself, and the impossibility of your going far wrong if you humbly and heartily respect it. Only one thing more on this head: The more we are in earnest as to feeling it, the less we are disposed to hold forth about it.

Never abandon the wholesome practice of saying your own private prayers night and morning. I have never abandoned it myself, and I know the comfort of it.

Charles Dickens remarked:

The New Testament is the very best book that ever was or ever will be known in the world.

Charles Dickens wrote in his Last Will and Testament:

I commit my soul to the mercy of God through our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and I exhort my children to try and guide themselves by the teachings of the New Testament in its broad spirit, and to put no faith in any man's narrow construction of its letter here or there.

Wilson, Henry (February 16, 1812-November 22, 1875), was a U. S. Senator, 1855-72; and Vice-President under Ulysses S. Grant, 1873-75. He took a strong stand against slavery, and in 1848 he helped found the Free Soil Party. Henry Wilson declared:

Men who see not God in our history have surely lost sight of the fact that, from the landing of the Mayflower to this hour, the great men whose names are indissolubly associated with the colonization, rise, and progress of the Republic have borne testimony to the vital truths of Christianity.

On December 23, 1866, in speaking at Natick, Massachusetts, to the Young Men's Christian Association, Henry Wilson said:

God has given us an existence in this Christian republic, founded by men who proclaim as their living faith, amid persecution and exile: "We give ourselves to the Lord Jesus Christ and the Word of His Grace, for the teaching, ruling and sanctifying of us in matters of worship and conversation."

Privileged to live in an age when the selectest influences of the religion of our fathers seem to be visibly descending upon our land, we too often hear the Providence of God, the religion of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, the inspiration of the Holy Bible doubted, questioned, denied with an air of gracious condescension.

Remember ever, and always, that your country was founded, not by the "most superficial, the lightest, the most irreflective of all European races," but by the stern old Puritans who made the deck of the Mayflower an altar of the living God, and whose first act on touching the soil of the new world was to offer on bended knees thanksgiving to Almighty God.

Louisiana, State of (April 30, 1812), was the 18th State admitted to the Union. The Constitution of the State of Louisiana, adopted 1921, stated:

Preamble. We, the people of the State of Louisiana, grateful to Almighty God for the civil, political and religious liberties we enjoy, and desiring to secure the continuance of these blessings, do ordain and establish this Constitution.

Article I, Section 4. Every person has the natural right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience.

Browning, Robert (May 7, 1812-December 12, 1889), was an English poet. His works include: Pauline, My Last Duchess; Men and Women, 1855; and The Ring and the Book, 1868-69. Robert Browning wrote:

Grow old along with me. The best is yet to be; the last of life, for which the first was made. Our times are in His hands who saith, "A whole I planned, youth shows but half. Trust God; see all, nor be afraid."

In The Guardian Angel, 1842, Robert Browning wrote:

O world, as God has made it! All is beauty.

Robert Browning wrote in Instans Tyrannus, 1845:

Just my vengeance complete,
The man sprang to his feet,
Stood erect, caught at God's skirts, and prayed!
- So, I was afraid!

Dana, James Dwight (February 12, 1813-April 14, 1895), was an American geologist. He taught at Yale College as a professor, succeeding the renowned Professor Silliman. He was the president of the Geological Society of America, as well as the American Association for the Advancement of Science. James Dana became the editor-in-chief of The American Journal of Science and was the author of numerous books on mineralogy and geology, including System of Mineralogy and Manual of Geology. James Dana stated:

That grand old Book of God still stands; and this old earth, the more its leaves are turned over and pondered, the more it will sustain and illustrate the Sacred Word.

Livingstone, David (March 19, 1813-May 1, 1873), was a Scottish missionary and African explorer. He discovered: Lake Ngami and the Zuga River in 1849; the Zambezi River in 1851; Victoria Falls in 1855; and Lake Nyasa and Lake Shirwa in 1858-62. His wife, Mary Moffat Livingstone, died in 1862 and was buried at Shupanga.

In 1866-73 he ventured forth searching for the source of the Nile, and was met by Henry M. Stanley, a correspondent of the New York Herald, at Ujiji on Lake Tanganyika in late 1871.

So loved was Dr. Livingstone by his African followers, that when he died on the shore of Lake Bangweulu in 1873, they buried his heart in Africa, and sent his body, packed in salt, back to England to be buried in Westminster Abbey. David Livingstone once declared:

All that I am I owe to Jesus Christ, revealed to me in His divine Book.

In his work, Missionary Travels and Researches in South Africa, David Livingstone wrote:

Great pains had been taken by my parents to instill the doctrines of Christianity into my mind, and I had no difficulty in understanding the theory of free salvation by the atonement of our Savior; but it was only about this time that I really began to feel the necessity and value of a personal application of the provisions of the atonement to my own case. The change was like that of "colorblindness."

The perfect fullness with which the pardon of all our guilt is offered in God's Book drew forth feelings of affectionate love to Him who bought us with His blood, and a sense of deep obligation to Him for His mercy has influenced, in some small measure, my conduct ever since. This book will speak, not so much of what has been done, as of what remains to be performed before the Gospel can be said to be preached to all nations.

In the glow of love which Christianity inspires I soon resolved to devote my life to the alleviation of human misery.

David Livingstone expressed:

God had an only Son, and he was a missionary and a physician.

In 1872, Henry Morton Stanley (1841-1904), the English correspondent for the New York Herald, found David Livingstone at Ujiji on Lake Tanganyika in the heart of Africa. He greeted him with the now-classic salutation, "Dr. Livingstone, I presume?" Henry M. Stanley described the famous old missionary:

Here is a man who is manifestly sustained as well as guided by influences from Heaven. The Holy Spirit dwells in him. God speaks through him. The heroism, the nobility, the pure and stainless enthusiasm as the root of his life come, beyond question, from Christ.

There must, therefore, be a Christ; - and it is worth while to have such a Helper and Redeemer as this Christ undoubtedly is, and as He here reveals Himself to this wonderful disciple.

Porter, David Dixon (June 8, 1813-February 13, 1891), was an Admiral in the U.S. Navy, the second man to hold that position, (the first was his adopted brother, David Farragut). In the Civil War, David Dixon Porter helped Ulysses S. Grant at the siege of Vicksburg, Mississippi, 1863, and the attack on Fort Fisher,

North Carolina, 1864-65. He eventually became the superintendent of U.S. Naval Academy at Annapolis. Admiral David Dixon Porter explained:

When one sees how much has been done for the world by the disciples of Christ and those professing the Christian religion, he must be astonished to find anyone who hesitates to believe in the Divine origin of Jesus and the wonderful works He performed, all of which are so beautifully portrayed by the author of the work under consideration; and no man or woman of real intelligence would hesitate to believe that it is only through Christ that sinners can be saved, unless their vanity is so great that they are capable of saving themselves without an intermediary.

Beecher, Henry Ward (June 24, 1813-March 8, 1887), was an American clergyman, editor and abolitionist. He was the son of the New England theologian Lyman Beecher, and brother of Harriet Beecher Stowe, the novelist and reformer who wrote the book Uncle Tom's Cabin.

Over 2,500 people flocked to hear him each week at the Plymouth Church of Brooklyn, New York. He increasingly used his pulpit to denounce civil corruption, support women's suffrage (the right to vote), and preach against slavery:

Sink the Bible to the bottom of the ocean, and still man's obligations to God would be unchanged. He would have the same path to tread, only his lamp and his guide would be gone; the same voyage to make, but his chart and compass would be overboard.

If a man cannot be a Christian in the place where he is, he cannot be a Christian anywhere.

A Christian is nothing but a sinful man who has put himself to school to Christ for the honest purpose of becoming better.

Christianity works while infidelity talks. She feeds the hungry, clothes the naked, visits and cheers the sick, and seeks the lost, while infidelity abuses her and babbles nonsense and profanity. "By their fruits ye shall know them."

There's not much practical Christianity in the man who lives on better terms with angels and seraphs, than with his children, servants, and neighbors.

"I can forgive but I cannot forget" is only another way of saying "I cannot forgive."

The Bible is God's chart for you to steer by, to keep you from the bottom of the sea, and to show you where the harbor is, and how to reach it without running on the rocks or bars.

On November 18, 1869, after the Civil War had concluded, Henry Ward Beecher spoke on the need for the North and South to cooperate, rather than to continue the practice on regionalism and denominationalism:

American Quotations.txt

In the unity of the nation and the reduction of its materials, we hope much from religion; very little from sectarian churches; much from the Spirit of God blessing the Truth of his Word to the hearts of individual men; much from the individual men that are nobler than their sect; much from free men whose adhesion to forms and ceremonies is the least part of their existence; much from religion as it exists in its higher forms in individual nature and in public sentiment; very little from dogmas; very little from theology as such.... Let us implore the God of our fathers, by his own wise providence, to save us from our wanton passions, from impertinent egotism, from pride, arrogance, cruelty, and sensual lusts, that as a nation we may show forth his praise in all the earth.

O' Sullivan, John Louis (November 1813-February 24, 1895), was an American journalist and diplomat. He was the first to use the term "manifest destiny." Appointed U. S. Minister to Portugal, he also was the founder and editor of the United States Magazine and Democratic Review, and the editor of the New York Morning News. From September to November, 1839, he wrote a series of editorials in the Democratic Review, in which he stated:

In this ennobling influence, Christianity and democracy are one. What, indeed, is democracy but Christianity in its earthly aspect, Christianity made effective among the political relations of men.

In another of the editorials written for the Democratic Review, 1839, John L. O' Sullivan commented:

We are entering on its untrodden space, with the truths of God in our minds, beneficent objects in our hearts, and with a clear conscience unsullied by the past.

We are the nation of human progress; and who will, what can, set limits to our onward march? Providence is with us, and no earthly power can.

We point to the everlasting truth on the first page of our national declaration, and we proclaim to the millions of other lands that "the gates of hell" - the powers of aristocracy and monarchy - "shall not prevail against it."

The far-reaching, the boundless future will be the era of American greatness. In its magnificent domain of space and time, the nation of many nations is destined to manifest the excellence of divine principles; to establish on earth the noblest temple ever dedicated to the worship of the Most High - the Sacred and the True. Its floor shall be a hemisphere; its roof the firmament of the star-studded heavens; and its congregation a unison of many republics, comprising hundreds of happy millions, calling, owning no man master, but governed by God's natural and moral law of equality.

In the fall of 1839, in an editorial for the Democratic Review, John L. O' Sullivan detailed:

American Quotations.txt

All this will be our future history, to establish on earth the moral dignity and salvation of man - the immutable truth and beneficence of God.

For this blessed mission to the nations of the world which are shut out from the life-giving light of truth has America been chosen; and her high example shall smite unto death the tyranny of kings, hierarchs, and oligarchs, and carry glad tidings of peace and goodwill where myriads now endure an existence scarcely more enviable than that of beasts of the field.

Who, then, can doubt that our country is destined to be the great nation of futurity?

In 1845, John L. O'Sullivan was the first to use the term "manifest destiny" in regards to America's westward growth. He explained the term:

Our manifest destiny [is] to overspread the continent allotted by Providence for the free development of our yearly multiplying millions.

Bross, William (November 4, 1813-January 27, 1890), was an American journalist. He was the editor of the Chicago Tribune. In an interview, William Bross gave his reply to three questions inquiring how he attained success:

1. What maxims have had a strong influence on your life, and helped to your success?:

The Proverbs of Solomon and other Scriptures. They were quoted a thousand times by my honored father, and caused an effort to do my duty each day, under a constant sense of obligation to my Saviour and fellow man.

2. What do you consider essential elements of success for a young man entering upon such a profession as yours?:

Sterling, unflinching integrity in all matters, public and private. Let everyone do his whole duty, both to God and man. Let him follow earnestly the teachings of the Scriptures and eschew infidelity in all its forms.

3. What, in your observation, have been the chief causes of the numerous failures in the life of business and professional men?:

Want of integrity, careless of the truth, reckless in thought and expression, lack of trust in God, and a disregard of the teachings of His Holy Word, bad company, and bad morals in any of their many phases.

Pennsylvania Supreme Court (1815), in the case of The Commonwealth v. Jesse Sharpless and others, 2 Serg. & R. 91-92, 97, 101-104 (1815), rendered the grand jury indictment as follows:

Jesse Sharpless... John Haines... George Haines... John Steel... Ephriam Martin... and Mayo... designing, contriving, and intending the morals, as well of youth as of divers other citizens of this commonwealth, to debauch and corrupt, and to raise and create in their minds inordinate and lustful desires... in a certain house there... scandalously did exhibit and show for money... a certain lewd... obscene painting, representing a man in an obscene... and indecent posture with a woman, to the manifest corruption and subversion of youth, and other citizens of this commonwealth... offending... [the] dignity of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Judge Duncan delivered the court's verdict:

The defendants have been convicted, upon their own confession, of conduct indicative of great moral depravity... This court is... invested with power to punish not only open violations of decency and morality, but also whatever secretly tends to undermine the principles of society...

Whatever tends to the destruction of morality, in general, may be punishable criminally. Crimes are public offenses, not because they are perpetrated publicly, but because their effect is to injure the public. Burglary, though done in secret, is a public offense; and secretly destroying fences is indictable.

Hence, it follows, that an offence may be punishable, if in its nature and by its example, it tends to the corruption of morals; although it be not committed in public.

The defendants are charged with exhibiting and showing... for money, a lewd... and obscene painting. A picture tends to excite lust, as strongly as writing; and the showing of a picture is as much a publication as the selling of a book...

If the privacy of the room was a protection, all the youth of the city might be corrupted, by taking them, one by one, into a chamber, and there inflaming their passions by the exhibition of lascivious pictures. In the eye of the law, this would be a publication, and a most pernicious one.

In a demonstration of the strong feelings of the court on this issue, a second Justice, by the name of Judge Yeates, added to the pronouncement of the court's decision:

Although every immoral act, such as lying, etc., is not indictable, yet where the offence charged is destructive of morality in general... it is punishable at common law.

The destruction of morality renders the power of the government invalid...

The corruption of the public mind, in general, and debauching the manners of youth, in particular, by lewd and obscene pictures exhibited to view, must necessarily be attended with the most injurious consequences...

No man is permitted to corrupt the morals of the people; secret poison cannot be thus disseminated.

Missouri, State of (January 21, 1815), in the Missouri Probate Code, 1 Terr.L., p. 411, ? 45, lists what inherited property is exempt from creditors. This list of items which are considered essential for living, revised numerous times through January 1, 1981, still contains that "family Bible" as in the original version:

EXEMPT PROPERTY, FAMILY ALLOWANCE AND HOMESTEAD ALLOWANCE
V. A. M. S. ? 474.250

Text of Code

? 474.250. Exempt Property of Surviving Spouse or Minor Children.

The surviving spouse, or unmarried minor children of a decedent are entitled absolutely to the following property of the estate without regard to its value: The family Bible and other books, one automobile or other passenger motor vehicle with its means of propulsion, all wearing apparel of the family, all household electrical appliances, . . . all household and kitchen furniture, appliances, utensils and implements. Such property shall belong to the surviving spouse, if any, otherwise to the unmarried minor children in equal shares.

Bingham, John Armor (January 21, 1815-March 19, 1900), was a U. S. Representative, 1855-63, 1865-73. He served as the U. S. Minister to Japan, 1873-85. He was Judge Advocate at the trial of President Abraham Lincoln's assassin, and one of the managers of President Andrew Johnson's impeachment trial. John Armor Bingham stated:

I was instructed in early youth by precept and example of my father and mother. I hereby became convinced of the truth of Christ's teaching, and of the inspiration of the Holy Scriptures. My convictions on this subject must suffice for me; I will not surrender them to any man.

I do not hesitate to say, however, as a strong belief of mine, that Christ, by His living and His dying and His reappearance after crucifixion brought life and immortality to light. It seems to me not to be a question that the Christ of the New Testament lived and will live forevermore.

My inner consciousness teaches me that in His discourse on the Mount He is chiefly revealed to be more than a man, and that He was and is Divine.

Bismarck, Otto Eduard Leopold von (April 1, 1815-July 30, 1898), was a Prussian statesman. Serving under Emperor William I, he was largely responsible for uniting the German people. Known as the Iron Chancellor, he served as the Prussian foreign minister, 1862-71, and the first Chancellor of the new German Empire, 1871-90. Otto Eduard Leopold von Bismarck declared:

Would to God that, apart from what is known in the world, I had no other sins upon my soul, for which I only hope to be forgiven by trusting in the blood of Christ. I know not whence I should derive my sense of duty if not from God. Orders and titles have no charm for me; I firmly believe in a life after death. . .

To my steadfast faith alone do I owe the power of resisting all manner of absurdities which I have seen displayed throughout the past ten years. Deprive me of my faith, and you rob me of my Fatherland. Were I not a staunch Christian, did I not stand upon the miraculous basis of religion, you would never have possessed a Federal Chancellor in my person.

In a speech to the Reichstag, February 6, 1888, Chancellor Otto von Bismarck stated:

We Germans fear God, but nothing else in the world.

In describing the Otto von Bismarck, Chancellor of the newly united German Empire, President James A. Garfield stated:

I am struck with the fact that Bismarck, the great statesman of Germany, probably the foremost man in Europe today, stated as an unquestioned principle, that the support, the defense, and propagation of the Christian Gospel is the central object of the German government.

Anthony, Henry Bowen (April 1, 1815-September 2, 1884), was a U.S. Senator. On January 9, 1872, he delivered a eulogy of Roger Williams in Congress:

He knew, for God, whose prophet he was, revealed it to him, that the great principles for which he contended, and for which he suffered, founded in the eternal fitness of things, would endure forever. He did not inquire if his name would survive a generation. In his vision of the future he saw mankind emancipated from... the blindness of bigotry, from the cruelties of intolerance. He saw the nations walking forth into the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free.

Meade, George Gordon (December 31, 1815-November 6, 1872), was a Major-General in the U.S. Army. He led the Union troops to victory at the Battle of Gettysburg, thus turning the tide of the Civil War. Colonel George Meade, the son of General Meade, reported the facts surrounding his father's last days in 1872:

Death came suddenly, with the sound of a foot-fall. There were a few days when friends waited on medical skill, but his heart was on the country whither he was going. He looked to the Saviour, who was the only one in Heaven or earth who could help him. He asked for the Holy Communion, and by the Lord's table gathered manna for the last journey. The words of penitence and the look of faith were blended with his dying prayers.

General Meade's religious principles were exhibited in his daily life, in his intercourse with his fellow men, and the Christian example he set. As far as his outward profession of belief was concerned, he was an active and attentive communicant in our Church from an early day, and died in the triumphs of faith in the great Captain of his salvation.

Indiana, State of (December 11, 1816), was 19th State admitted to the Union. On August 7, 1789, President George Washington signed into law an Act of Congress which prohibited slavery from entering the territory, entitled "An Ordinance for the Government of the Territory of the United States, North-West of the River Ohio," Article VI. On April 13, 1816, President James Madison signed The Enabling Act for Indiana, which required the government being formed in that territory to be:

...not repugnant to the [Northwest Ordinance].

The Northwest Ordinance stated:

SECTION 13. And, for extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, which form the basis whereon these republics, their laws and constitutions are erected: to fix and establish those principles as the basis of all laws, constitutions and governments, which forever hereafter shall be formed in the said territory: to provide also for the establishment of states, and permanent government therein, and for their admission to a share in the federal councils in an equal footing with the original states, at as early period as may be consistent with the general interest:

SECTION 14. It is hereby ordained and declared by the authority aforesaid, That the following articles shall be considered as articles of compact, between the original states and the people and states of the said territory, and forever remain unalienable, unless by common consent, to wit:

ARTICLE I. No person, demeaning himself in a peaceable and orderly manner, shall ever be molested on account of his mode of worship or religious sentiments in the said territory....

ARTICLE III. Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged.

The Constitution of the State of Indiana, adopted 1851, stated:

Preamble. We, the People of the State of Indiana, grateful to Almighty God for the free exercise of the right to chose our form of government, do ordain this Constitution.

Article I, Section 1. We declare, That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights.

Article I, Section 2. All men shall be secure in their natural right to worship Almighty God.

Pennsylvania Supreme Court (1817), in the case of The Commonwealth v. Wolf, 3 Serg. & R. 48, 50 (1817), stated the court's opinion as follows:

Laws cannot be administered in any civilized government unless the people are taught to revere the sanctity of an oath, and look to a future state of rewards and punishments for the deeds of this life. It is of the utmost moment, therefore, that they should be reminded of their religious duties at stated periods... A wise policy would naturally lead to the formation of laws calculated to subserve those salutary purposes.

The invaluable privilege of the rights of conscience secured to us by the constitution of the commonwealth, was never intended to shelter those persons, who, out of mere caprice, would directly oppose those laws for the pleasure of showing their contempt and abhorrence of the religious opinions of the great mass of the citizens.

Douglas, Frederick (February 1817-February 20, 1895), was a commanding abolitionist and spokesman for slaves, having been a former slave himself. Thousands of people were brought out of their indifferent attitude toward the value of human life by his powerful orations exposing the silent scream of the slaves. Many were deeply moved away from the opinion that it was a person's choice whether or not to enslave another person, and multitudes began supporting the right to life for all humans, regardless of their race or circumstances.

Frederick Douglass included this story in retelling his conversion:

I loved all mankind, slaveholder not excepted, though I abhorred slavery more than ever. I saw the world in a new light... I gathered scattered pages of the Bible from the filthy street gutters, and washed and dried them, that in moments of leisure I might get a word or two of wisdom from them.

In the Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, 1845, he wrote in chapter 2:

Every tone [of the songs of the slaves] was a testimony against slavery, and a prayer to God for deliverance from chains.

Jay, John (June 23, 1817-May 5, 1894), was an American lawyer and diplomat. He was the son of Judge William Jay and the grandson of John Jay, the Founding Father who was the first Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. He was the manager of the New York Young Men's Anti-Slavery Society in 1834; secretary of the Irish Relief Commission during the potato famine in 1847; U.S. Minister to Austria, 1869-75; and the vice-president of the Civil Service Reform Association of the State of New York. He served as the president of the American Historical Society, 1890; as well as being an active member of the Metropolitan Museum of Art and the National Academy of Design. John Jay authored many papers, including: "America Free or America Slave," 1856; "On the Passage of the Constitutional Amendment," 1864; and "Abolishing Slavery," 1864.

In 1887, as the president of the Westchester County Bible Society, John Jay delivered his message "National Perils and Opportunities":

"It is high time to wake out of sleep!" This gathering of citizens from distant parts, representing the millions who hold to the Bible, and cherish the institutions founded upon its inspired truths, shows that the nation is awakening to the perils, foreign and domestic, which threatens the purity of its Christian civilization.

Its intellectual and moral strength in our Revolutionary struggle were recognized by the world, and Burke rightly attributed that strength to the character of the emigrants from various lands exhibiting "the dissidence of dissent and the Protestantism of the Protestant religion."

They brought with them the best and most heroic blood of the peoples of Europe - of the Hollanders, the Walloons of Flanders, the Huguenots of France, the English, Welsh, Scotch, and Irish, of the Norwegians and Swedes, the Germans and the Swiss, of the Bohemian followers of John Hus, of the Albigenses and Waldenses of the Italian Alps, of the Salisbury exiles, the Moravian brothers, with refugees from the Pallatinate, Alsace and southern Germany.

They all brought the Bible, for which they and their ancestors had been ready to suffer and to die; and their devotion to that Book descended to the Continental Congress, which, a week before it was driven from Philadelphia, ordered an importation of twenty thousand Bibles.

At the Centennial celebration, at Philadelphia, of the Declaration of Independence, the Acting Vice-President, Ferry, said that the American statesmen who had to choose between the royal authority or popular sovereignty had been inspired by the truth uttered on Mars Hill, and repeated in the opening prayer of the morning, that "God hath made of one blood all nations of men."

Mississippi, State of (December 10, 1817), was the 20th State admitted to the Union. The U. S. Congress, March 1, 1817, during the administration of President James Monroe, passed The Enabling Act for Mississippi, which required the government being formed in that territory to be:

...not repugnant to the principles of the [Northwest Ordinance].

The Northwest Ordinance stated:

Article III. Religion, morality, and knowledge, being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged.

The Constitution of the State of Mississippi, adopted 1817, stated:

Article IX, Section 16. Religion, morality, and knowledge, being necessary to good government, the preservation of liberty and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall be forever encouraged in this state.

No person who denies the being of God or a future state of rewards and punishments shall hold any office in the civil department of the State.

The Constitution of the State of Mississippi, adopted 1890, stated:

American Quotations.txt

Preamble. We, the people of Mississippi in convention assembled, grateful to Almighty God, and invoking His blessing on our work, do ordain and establish this Constitution.

Article XIV, Section 265. No person who denies the existence of a Supreme Being shall hold any office in this state.

Fields, James Thomas (December 31, 1817-April 2, 1881), was the editor of the Atlantic Monthly, 1862-70. In The Captain's Daughter; or The Ballad of the Tempest, written in 1858, he penned the line:

But his little daughter whispered,
As she took his icy hand,
Isn't God upon the ocean,
Just the same as on the land?

Opukahai'a, Henry (d. 1818), was the first Hawaiian convert to Christianity. Orphaned at age 10, he was raised by his uncle to be a pagan priest (kahuna) of the Hawaiian religion. He grew disillusioned with the rituals and chants, and left on an American ship bound for New England with his Hawaiian friend, Thomas Hopu. There he was befriended by students and professors of Yale College and soon became a Christian. He studied Greek and Hebrew and translated sections of the Bible into the Hawaiian language. In his memoirs, which sold 500,000 copies after his death, Henry Opukahai'a wrote:

My poor countrymen, without knowledge of the true God, and ignorant of the future world, have no Bible to read, no Sabbath...

Henry Opukahai'a's zeal for Christ and love for the Hawaiian people inspired the first American Board of Missions to Hawaii in 1820. It was led by his friend, Thomas Hopu, Hiram Bingham, and a small group of New Englanders. They reduced the Hawaiian language to writing, set up schools and churches, and convinced the Hawaiian women to wear dresses. Amid much solemnity and rejoicing the remains of Henry Opukahai'a were returned to Hawaii in 1993, 175 years after his death in Connecticut, and were reinterred at Napo'opo'o, Kona, Hawaii

Neale, John Mason (1818-1866), was an English poet and language scholar, knowing over 20 languages. In 1842, he was ordained a clergyman and translated many hymns from their original Greek and Latin tongues. Many Christmas hymns were written or translated by him, including: Jerusalem the Golden; The Day is Past and Over; Come, Ye Faithful; and the favorite Good King Wenceslas:

Good King Wenceslas looked out
On the feast of Stephen,
When the snow lay round about,
Deep and crisp and even.

In 1861, John Mason Neale translated the twelfth century Latin hymn, Veni, Veni, Emmanuel into English:

O come, O come, Emmanuel,
And ransom captive Israel.

Froude, James Anthony (April 23, 1818-October 20, 1894), was an English historian. He was a professor at Oxford and published the History of England from the Fall of Wolsey to the Defeat of the Spanish Armada, in twelve volumes. James Anthony Froude professed:

The Bible, thoroughly known, is literature in itself - the rarest and richest in all departments of thoughts and imagination which exists.

Marx, Karl Heinrich (May 5, 1818-March 14, 1883), was a German philosopher, economist and revolutionary. He was known for founding the theory of Communism. He wrote: The Communist Manifesto, 1848; The Class Struggles in France, 1850; The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte, 1852; A Contribution to the Critique of Political Economy, 1859; and Das Kapital, 1867. Karl Marx attended the University of Berlin, where he became involved with the radical anti-religious group, the Young Hegelians.

After being refused a university post because of his radical views, Karl Marx began publishing a paper in 1842, which was banned in Germany. He fled to Paris, then Brussels, and finally to London. Marx founded the International Workingmen's Association and the Social Democrat Labor Party. His philosophy influenced both Adolph Hitler, in starting the Nazi Party, and Vladimir Lenin, in starting the Communist Party. Karl Marx stated:

Take away the heritage of a people and they are easily destroyed.

The theory of the Communists may be summed up in the single sentence: Abolition of private property.

Illinois, State of (December 3, 1818), was the 21st State admitted to the Union. On August 7, 1789, President George Washington signed into law an Act of Congress which prohibited slavery from entering the territory, entitled "An Ordinance for the Government of the Territory of the United States, North-West of the River Ohio," Article VI. On December 3, 1818, President James Monroe, signed the Act of Congress enabling the establishment of the government of Illinois, provided it followed the general tenets of the Northwest Ordinance of 1787.

The Northwest Ordinance stated:

SECTION 13. And, for extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, which form the basis whereon these republics, their laws and constitutions are erected: to fix and establish those principles as the basis of all laws, constitutions and governments, which forever hereafter shall be formed in the said territory: to provide also for the establishment of states, and permanent government therein, and for their admission to a share in the federal councils in an equal footing with the original states, at as early period as may be consistent with the general interest:

SECTION 14. It is hereby ordained and declared by the authority aforesaid, That the following articles shall be considered as articles of compact, between the original states and the people and states of the said territory, and forever remain unalienable, unless by common consent, to wit:

ARTICLE I. No person, demeaning himself in a peaceable and orderly manner, shall ever be molested on account of his mode of worship or religious sentiments in the said territory....

ARTICLE III. Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged.

The Constitution of the State of Illinois, adopted 1870, stated:

Preamble. We, the people of the State of Illinois, grateful to Almighty God for the civil, political and religious liberty which He hath so long permitted us to enjoy, and looking to Him for a blessing upon our endeavors to secure and transmit the same unimpaired to succeeding generations... establish this Constitution.

Wallace, William Ross (1819-May 3, 1881), was an American poet. In The Hand That Rules the World, st. I, he stated:

The hand that rocks the cradle is the hand that rules the world.

Ruskin, John (February 8, 1819-January 20, 1900), was an English critic, author and philanthropist. He stated:

Whatever merit there is in anything that I have written is simply due to the fact that when I was a child my mother daily read me a part of the Bible and daily made me learn a part of it by heart.

To my early knowledge of the Bible I owe the best part of my taste in literature, and the most precious, and on the whole, the one essential part of my education.

In Volume II of Ruskin's Praeterita, he wrote:

A firm word concerning Christianity itself... what was the total meaning of it?... The total meaning was, and is, that the God who made earth and its creatures took at a certain time upon the earth the flesh and form of man; in that flesh sustained pain, and died the death of the creature He had made; rose again after the dead into a glorious human life, and when the date of the human race is ended will return in visible form and render to every man according to his work. Christianity is the belief in, and the love of, God thus manifested.

In the Preface to The Crown of Olives, John Ruskin exclaims:

The English people are in possession of a Book which tells them, straight from the lips of God, all they ought to do and need to know. I have read that Book with as much care as the most of them for some forty years; and am thankful that on those who trust it I can press its pleadings.

My endeavor has uniformly been to make them trust it more deeply than they do; trust it, not in their own favorite verses only, but in the sum of all; trust it, not as a fetich or talisman which they are to be saved by daily repetition of, but as a Captain's order, to be obeyed at their peril.

To The Pall Mall Gazette, John Ruskin expounds:

I see in your columns, as in other literary journals, more and more buzzing and fussing about what M. Renan has found the Bible to be; or Mr. Huxley, not to be; or the school-board, that it must not be; etc., etc., etc. Let me tell your readers who care to know, in the fastest possible words, what it is.

It is the grandest group of writings existent in the rational world, translated in the first strength of the Christian faith; translated with beauty and felicity into every language of the Christian world; and the guide, so translated, of all the arts and acts of that world which has been noble, fortunate, and happy.

Lowell, James Russell (February 22, 1819-August 12, 1891), was an American poet, editor and diplomat. He was the son of Charles Lowell, minister of the West Church in Boston. A graduate of Harvard Law School, James Russell Lowell wrote poetry and prose which received wide acclaim. His well-known works include: Fable For Critics, 1848; and Bi glow Papers, 1848-67. He edited the Atlantic Monthly, 1857-61; and the North American Review, 1862-72.

He received honorary degrees from both Oxford and Cambridge, and became a professor at Harvard. Lowell was appointed by President Rutherford B. Hayes as U. S. Minister to Spain, 1877-80, and England, 1880-85, where he was immensely popular. James Russell Lowell was once asked by Francois Guizot (1787-1874), the French historian and diplomat, "How long will the American Republic endure?" Lowell replied:

As long as the ideas of the men who founded it continue dominant.

On November 20, 1885, in his International Copyright, James Russell Lowell stated:

In vain we call old notions fudge,
And bend our conscience to our dealing;
The Ten Commandments will not budge,
And stealing will continue stealing.

In volume II of his Literary Essays, 1810-90, James Russell Lowell wrote New England Two Centuries Ago:

Puritanism, believing itself quick with the seed of religious liberty, laid, without knowing it, the egg of democracy.

Victoria (May 24, 1819-January 22, 1901), Alexandrina Victoria was the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, 1837-1901, and the Empress of India, 1876-1901. Married to Prince Albert in 1840, she bore him nine children. She mourned the rest of her life after his death in 1861. She became immensely popular in her old age, being a symbol of Britain's imperial greatness.

Upon her coronation at Westminster Abbey, June 28, 1837, three presents were given to her: the Sword of State, the Imperial Robe, and the Holy Bible. These words accompanied the Bible:

Our gracious Queen, we present you this Book, the most valuable thing the world affords. Here is wisdom; this is the royal law; these are the timely oracles of God. Blessed is he that readeth and they that hear the words of this Book; that keep and do the things contained in it. For these are the words of eternal life, able to make you wise unto salvation, and so happy forever more, through faith in Christ Jesus, to whom be the glory forever and ever. Amen.

In commenting on the Bible, the Queen stated:

That book accounts for the supremacy of England.

In 1849, the Queen instructed the Earl of Chichester to write the African Chieftain, Sagbua, a letter which contained the words:

Commerce alone will not make a nation great and happy like England. England has become great and happy by the knowledge of the true God through Jesus Christ. In order to show how much the queen values God's Word, she sends with this as a present a copy of the Word.

After hearing a sermon preached on the subject of the second coming of Christ, Queen Victoria stated:

I wish He would come during my lifetime so that I could take my crown and lay it at His feet.

Howe, Julia Ward (May 27, 1819-October 17, 1910), was the author of the Civil War song, The Battle Hymn of the Republic, which was a favorite of President Abraham Lincoln. She was the daughter of a Wall Street banker, and wife of Doctor Samuel Gridley Howe (1801-1876), who ran a school for the blind in Boston, (later the Perkins School for the Blind.) Doctor Howe and Julia together published the anti-slavery journal Commonwealth.

Julia Ward Howe was very active in the abolition of the slavery movement, and later became a leader in the women's suffrage movement. In 1907, she became the first woman member of the American Academy of Arts and Letters. She and her husband worked hard against slavery and even entertained John Brown in their home.

In 1861, she traveled to Washington, D.C., and saw the city teeming with military, horses galloping all around and innumerable campfires burning. Sleeping unsoundly one night, she wrote the words to her poem. In February, 1862, the poem, The Battle Hymn of the Republic, was published in the Atlantic Monthly Magazine (she received $5 for the poem):

My eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord: He is trampling out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored; He has loosed the fateful lightning of His terrible swift sword: His truth is marching on.

I have seen Him in the watch-fires of a hundred circling camps; They have builded Him an altar in the evening dews and damps; I can read His righteous sentence by the dim and flaring lamps: His day is marching on.

I have read a fiery gospel writ in burnished rows of steel; 'As ye deal with my contemners, so with you my grace shall deal; Let the Hero, born of woman, crush the serpent with his heel, Since God is marching on.

He has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat; He is sifting out the hearts of men before His judgement-seat: Oh, be swift, my soul, to answer Him! Be jubilant, my feet! Our God is marching on.

In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea; With a glory in his bosom that transfigures you and me: As he died to make men holy, let us die to make men free, While God is marching on.

Whitman, Walt (May 31, 1819-March 26, 1892), was an American poet. He had worked as a teacher, journalist and printer. He gained renown through his poems, Leaves of Grass, 1855-92. During the Civil War, he nursed wounded soldiers, eventually becoming ill himself. His free-verse poems expressed a democratic idealism, as seen in his Democratic Vistas, 1871. His other works include: Drum Taps, 1865, and Specimen Days, 1882-83.

In "Starting from Paumanok," from his Leaves of Grass, Walt Whitman wrote:

I say the whole earth and all the stars in the sky are for religion's sake....
I say that the real and permanent grandeur of these States must be their religion.

Walt Whitman expressed:

To me every hour of the light and dark is a miracle. Every cubic inch of space is a miracle.

Holland, Josiah Gilbert (July 24, 1819-October 12, 1881), was a founder and editor of the popular Scribner's Monthly (later Century Magazine) and the Springfield Republican. He established the publishing policies of using contributors' names and receiving payment for everything published. A celebrated speaker on social topics and conduct of life, Josiah Gilbert Holland also wrote under the pen name "Timothy Titcomb." His well-read narrative works include the poems Kathrina and Bitter-Sweet. In 1872, Holland wrote in his Gradatim:

Heaven is not reached in a single bound.

In his work, Wanted, also written in 1872, Josiah Gilbert Holland penned:

God give us men! A time like this demands Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and ready hands;
Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men who have honor; men who will not lie.

Melville, Herman (August 1, 1819-September 28, 1891), was an American author. He is considered to be one of the world's greatest novelists. In 1841 he had joined the crew of the whaling ship Acushnet, bound for the South Seas, the experiences of which proved invaluable in providing material for his novels. He sailed around Cape Horn, deserted in the Marquesas Islands, was held captive by Polynesian cannibals, escaped on the Australian whaler Lucy Ann, and finally ended up on the Island of Tahiti. He served on the frigate United States from 1843 to 1844, before settling near Pittsfield, Massachusetts. In 1856, he traveled to Palestine by way of Liverpool, where Nathaniel Hawthorne was serving as U.S. Consul. From 1866 to 1885, Melville served as a U.S. customs inspector on the New York docks.

In addition to his work, Moby Dick, 1851, Herman Melville wrote many successful books, such as: Typee, 1846; Omoo, 1847; Mardi, 1849; Redburn, 1849; White Jacket, 1850; Pierre, 1852; and Billy Budd, which was published in 1924 after his death. Melville described America's mission in his book White Jacket:

Escaped from the house of bondage, Israel of old did not follow after the ways of the Egyptian. To her was given an express dispensation; to her were given new things under the sun.

And we Americans are a peculiar, chosen people...we bear the ark of the liberties of the world...In our youth is our strength, in our inexperience, our wisdom...

In the forward to Moby Dick, Melville mused on dignity and democracy:

Thou shalt see it shining in the arm that wields a pick and drives a spike; that democratic dignity which,
on all hands, radiates without end from God Himself!
The great God absolute! The centre and circumference of all democracy! His omnipresence, our divine quality!

Dana, Charles Anderson (August 8, 1819-October 17, 1897), was an American newspaper journalist. He was the editor-in-chief of the New York Sun, under whose management it grew to become one of the largest newspapers in the country. He also served as Assistant Secretary of War during the Civil War. Charles Dana wrote:

I believe in Christianity; that it is the religion taught to men by God Himself in Person on earth. I also believe the Bible to be a Divine revelation.
Christianity is not comparable with any other religion.
It is the religion which came from God's own lips, and therefore the only true religion. The incarnation is a fact, and Christianity is based on revealed truth.

There are some books that are absolutely indispensable to the kind of education that we are contemplating, and to the profession that we are now considering; and of all these, the most indispensable, the most useful, the one whose knowledge is most effective, is the Bible.

There is no Book from which more valuable lessons can be learned. I am considering it now as a manual of utility, or professional preparation, and professional use for a journalist.

There is no Book whose style is more suggestive and more instructive, from which you learn more directly that sublime simplicity which never exaggerates, which recounts the greatest event with solemnity, of course, but without sentimentality or affection, none which you open with such confidence and lay down with such reverence; there is no Book like the Bible.

When you get into a controversy and want exactly the right answer, when you are looking for an expression, what is there that closes a dispute like a verse from the Bible? What is it that sets up the right principle for you, which pleads for a policy, for a cause, so much as the right passage of the Holy Scripture?

Rosecrans, William Starke (September 6, 1819-March 11, 1898), was a Union General during the Civil War. He was noted for having increased the number of chaplains in his company, insisting that his troops not fight on the Sabbath, and conversed often with his staff in religious discussions, once till 4 a.m. for ten nights in a row. Having been a significant part of many major battles, General Rosecrans motto was:

God never fails those who truly trust.

Alabama, State of (December 14, 1819), was the 22nd State admitted to the Union. The Constitution of the State of Alabama, adopted 1901, stated:

Preamble. We, the people of the State of Alabama, in order to establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and to our posterity, invoking the favor and guidance of Almighty God, do ordain and establish the following Constitution and form of government for the State of Alabama.

Article I, Section 1. Inalienable Rights. That all men are equally free and independent; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

Article I, Section 3. Religious Freedom. That no religion shall be established by law; that no preference shall be given by law to any religious sect, society, denomination, or mode of worship; that no one shall be compelled by law to attend any place of worship; nor to pay any tithes, taxes, or other rate for building or repairing any place of worship, or for maintaining any minister or ministry; that no religious test shall be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under this state; and that the civil rights, privileges, and capacities of any citizen shall not be in any manner affected by his religious principles.

Article XVI, Section 279. Oath of Office. All members of the legislature, and all officers, executive and judicial, before they enter upon the execution of the duties of their respective offices, shall take the following oath or affirmation: "I, solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that I will support the Constitution of the United States, and the Constitution of the State of Alabama, so long as I continue a citizen thereof; and that I will faithfully and honestly discharge the duties of the office upon which I am about to enter, to the best of my ability. So help me God."

Article I, Section 26. Right to Bear Arms. That every citizen has a right to bear arms in defense of himself and the state.

Article I, Section 32. Slavery. That no form of slavery shall exist in this state; and there shall not be any involuntary servitude, otherwise than for punishment of crime, of which the party shall have been duly convicted.

Article IV, Section 65. Lotteries. The legislature shall have no power to authorize lotteries or gift enterprises for any purpose, and shall pass laws to prohibit the sale in this state of lottery or gift enterprise tickets, or tickets in any scheme in the nature of a lottery.

Article IV, Section 86. Dueling. The legislature shall pass such penal laws as it may deem expedient to suppress the evil practice of dueling.

Article V, Section 125. Approval, Veto of Bills....If any bill shall not be returned by the governor within six days, Sunday excepted, after it shall have been presented, the same shall become a law in like manner as if he had signed it.

Article VIII, Section 182. Disqualification of voters. The following persons shall be disqualified both from registering, and from voting, namely: All idiots and insane persons; those who shall be reason of conviction of crime be disqualified from voting at the time of the ratification of this Constitution; those who shall be convicted of treason, murder, arson, embezzlement, malfeasance in office, larceny, receiving stolen property, obtaining property or money under false pretenses, perjury, subordination of perjury, robbery, assault with intent to rob, burglary, forgery, bribery, assault and battery on the wife, bigamy, living in adultery, sodomy, incest, rape...

Article VIII, Section 186. Registration of electors....Fifth - The board of registrars shall have power to examine, under oath or affirmation, all applicants for registration, and to take testimony touching the qualifications of such applicants. Each member of such board is authorized to administer the oath to be taken by the applicants and witnesses, which shall be in the following form, and subscribed by the person making it, and preserved by the board, namely: "I solemnly swear (or affirm) that in the matter of the application of for registration as an elector, I will speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help me God."

Tubman, Harriet (c.1820-March 10, 1913), was a former slave. She repeatedly risked her life to free over 300 slaves through what has become known as the Underground Railroad. After the Civil War, she helped set up schools for freed slaves. Harriet Tubman stated:

I always told God: I'm gwine to hole stiddy on to you, and you got to see me trou...Jes so long as He wants to use me, He'll tak ker of me, and when He don't want me any longer, I'm ready to go.

To her biographer, Sarah H. Bradford, Harriet Tubman related in 1868:

'Twant me, 'twas the Lord. I always told him, "I trust to you. I don't know where to go or what to do, but I expect you to lead me," and he always did.

Maine, State of (March 15, 1820), was the 23rd State admitted to the Union. The Constitution of the State of Maine, adopted 1820, stated:

Preamble. We the people of Maine...acknowledging with grateful hearts the goodness of the Sovereign Ruler of the Universe in affording us an opportunity, so favorable to the design; and, imploring His aid and direction...establish this Constitution.

Article I, Section 3. All men have a natural and unalienable right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences.

Tyndall, John (August 2, 1820-December 4, 1893), was a British physicist and philosopher. He was the director of the Royal Institute. His scientific studies included: the flow of glaciers; transmission and radiation of heat; and "the Tyndall effect," which demonstrates how light is scattered by microscopic particles such as dust and colloids in suspension. In Fragments of Science, Vol. II, "Professor Virchow and Evolution," John Tyndall stated:

Religious feeling is as much a verity as any other part of human consciousness; and against it, on the subjective side, the waves of science beat in vain.

Florida, State of (1821), in the treaty whereby Spain relinquished the territory of Florida to the United States, it was stated:

Article V. The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be secured in the free exercise of their religion, without any restrictions.

Longstreet, James (January 8, 1821-1904), was a Confederate Major-General during the Civil War, having fought at the Battle of Gettysburg. He became a diplomat, serving as the U.S. Minister to Turkey, 1880-81; and the U.S. Railroad Commissioner, 1898-1904. He wrote in a letter:

Replying to your request, I am pleased to say: I believe in God, the Father, and in His only begotten Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord. It is my custom to read one or more chapters of my Bible daily for comfort, guidance, and instruction. Knowing myself a sinner, I am greatly relieved by the happy assurance that for such our Saviour died, and that under lowly penitence He will surely forgive, and make our acceptance certain through His holy pleasure.

Brown, Joseph Emerson (April 15, 1821-November 30, 1894), was an American politician. He served as a U.S. Senator and for four terms as Governor of Georgia. He replied to a letter inquiring as to his beliefs:

In reply to your letter asking a few lines as to my opinion of Christ and the Bible, I have to state with pleasure that I believe the Holy Bible is the inspired Word of God, and contains the only true rule of faith and practice. I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, the Sovereign of the universe, and the Saviour of all who believe in Him.

Missouri, State of (August 10, 1821), was the 24th State admitted to the Union. The Constitution of the State of Missouri, adopted 1945 stated:

Preamble. We, the people of Missouri, with profound reverence for the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, and grateful for His goodness... establish this Constitution.

Bill of Rights, Article I, Section 5. That all men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences.

Williams, Sir George (October 11, 1821-November 6, 1905), was the founder of the Young Men's Christian Association (Y. M. C. A.) in 1844. He declared:

My life-long experience as a business man, and as a Christian worker among young men, has taught me that the only power in this world that can effectually keep one from evil and sin, in all the varied and often attractive forms which they assume, is that which comes from an intimate knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ as a present Saviour.

And I can also heartily testify that the safe Guide-Book by which one may be led to Christ is the Bible, the Word of God, which is inspired by the Holy Ghost.

Dostoevski, Fedor Mikhailovich (November 11, 1821-February 9, 1881), was a Russian writer. His works rank with Tolstoi as masterpieces of the psychological novel. He was sentenced by the czar to ten years of hard labor in Siberia as a result of his revolutionary involvement. This provided him with great insight upon which to write on the human spirit and suffering. His works include: Crime and Punishment, 1866; The Idiot, 1868-69; The Possessed, 1869-72; in addition to The House of the Dead; Insulted and the Injured; and Memoirs from Underground.

In his work, Brothers Karamazov, written 1879-80, Dostoevski wrote:

If you were to destroy in mankind the belief in immortality, not only love but every living force maintaining the life of the world would at once be dried up.

United States Congress (1822), ratified in both the House and Senate of the United States, along with Great Britain and Ireland, the Convention for Indemnity under Award of Emperor of Russia as to the True Construction of the First Article of the Treaty of December 24, 1814. It begins with these words:

In the name of the Most Holy and Indivisible Trinity.

Colgate, Samuel (1822-1897), was an American soap manufacturer and philanthropist. He expanded the business of his father, William Colgate, into one of the largest establishments of its kind in the world. His father was also noted for giving at least a tenth of his net yearly earnings to charities, and organizing both the American Bible Society and the American and Foreign Bible Society. Samuel Colgate was a benefactor and trustee of Madison University in Hamilton, N. Y., which was renamed in 1890 to Colgate University.

Being an influential American manufacturer and philanthropist, Samuel Colgate avouched:

The only spiritual light in the world comes through Jesus Christ and the inspired Book; redemption and forgiveness of sin alone through Christ. Without His presence and the teachings of the Bible we would be enshrouded in moral darkness and despair.

The condition of those nations without a Christ, contrasted with those where Christ is accepted, reveals so marked a difference that no arguments are needed. It is an object-lesson so plain that it can be seen and understood by all. May "the earth be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."

Hale, Edward Everett (April 3, 1822-June 10, 1909), was an American author. He wrote The Man Without a Country, 1863, and over fifty other books. He was the editor of the Boston Daily Advertiser and later became Chaplain of the U. S. Senate, 1903-1909. Everett Hale was the nephew of Nathan Hale, the revolutionary patriot who was executed by the British after uttering his last words, "I only regret that I have but one life to lose for my country." Everett Hale proclaimed:

I am only one, but I am one. I cannot do everything, but I can do something. What I can do, I should do and, with the help of God, I will do!

In 1897, Everett Hale wrote "Challenge to the Youth of Boston":

As a boy goes on his errand he shall say, "To such duty I, too, am born. I am God's messenger." As the young man tells the story to his sweetheart, he shall say, "We are God's children also, you and I, and we have our duties." They look backwards, only to look forward.

"God needs me, that this city may still stand in the forefront of his people's land. Here am I. God may draft me for some spiritual duty, as he drafted Warren and Franklin. Present! Ready for service! Thank God I come from men who are not afraid in battle. Thank God, I am born from women whose walk was close to him. Thank God I am his son."

And she shall say, "I am his daughter." He has nations to call to his service. "Here am I."

He has causeways to build, for the march forward of his people. "Here am I." There are torrents to bridge, highways in deserts, "Here am I." He has oceans to cross. He has the hungry world to feed. He has the wilderness to clothe in beauty. "Here am I."

God of Heaven, we will be with Thee, as the fathers were. Boys and girls; young men and maidens, listen to the voice which speaks here.

Grant, Ulysses Simpson (April 27, 1822-July 23, 1885), was the 18th President of United States, 1869-77; Secretary of War under Andrew Johnson, 1867; Union General-in-Chief during the Civil War, receiving General Robert E. Lee's surrender at the Appomattox Courthouse, Virginia, April 9, 1865; defeated the Confederate forces in the Wilderness Campaign, Spottsylvania, Cold Harbor, and the siege of Petersburg, 1864-65; Major General, winning victories at Shiloh, Vicksburg, and Chattanooga, 1863; Brigadier General, capturing Fort Henry and Fort Donelson, 1862; Colonel of the 21st Illinois Volunteers, 1861; farmer, real estate dealer, clerk in Missouri and Illinois, 1854-61; married Julia Boggs Dent, 1848; Captain, decorated for gallantry in the Mexican War, 1846-48, fighting under both General Zachary Taylor and General Winfield Scott; graduated from West Point, 1843, and assigned as 2nd Lieutenant in the 4th U.S. Infantry at Jefferson Barracks near St. Louis; born Hiram Ulysses Grant, but changed to Ulysses Hiram to avoid the initials "H. U. G.," his name was later incorrectly registered in his West Point appointment by his Representative as Ulysses Simpson Grant, 1839.

On Thursday, March 4, 1869, in his First Inaugural Address, President Ulysses S. Grant expressed:

A great debt has been contracted in securing to us and our posterity the Union... To protect the national honor, every dollar of Government indebtedness should be paid in gold....It looks as though Providence had bestowed upon us a strong box in the precious metals locked up in the sterile mountains of the far West, and which we are now forging the key to unlock, to meet the very contingency that is now upon us....

In conclusion I ask patient forbearance one toward another throughout the land, and a determined effort on the part of every citizen to do his share toward cementing a happy union; and I ask the prayers of the nation to Almighty God in behalf of this consummation.

On Tuesday, October 5, 1869, President Ulysses S. Grant issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving, Praise and Prayer:

The year which is drawing to a close has been free from pestilence; health has prevailed throughout the land; abundant crops reward the labors of the husbandman; commerce and manufactures have successfully prosecuted their peaceful paths; the mines and forests have yielded liberally; the nation has increased in wealth and in strength; peace has prevailed, and its blessings have advanced every interest of the people in every part of the Union; harmony and fraternal intercourse restored are obliterating the marks of past conflict and estrangement; burdens have been lightened; means have been increased; civil and religious liberty are secured to every inhabitant of the land, whose soil is trod by none but freemen.

It becomes a people thus favored to make acknowledgement to the Supreme Author from whom such blessings flow of their gratitude and their dependence, to render praise and thanksgiving for the same, and devoutly to implore a continuance of God's mercies.

Therefore, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do recommend that Thursday, the 18th day of November next, be observed as a day of thanksgiving and of praise and of prayer to Almighty God, the Creator and the Ruler of the Universe; and I do further recommend to all the people of the United States to assemble on that day in their accustomed places of public worship and to unite in the homage and praise due to the bountiful Father of All Mercies and in fervent prayer for the continuance of the manifold blessings He has vouchsafed to us as a people.

In testimony whereof I have set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed, this 5th day of October, A.D. 1869, and of the Independence of the United States of America the ninety-fourth. U. S. Grant.

By the President Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State.

On December 6, 1869, in his First Annual Message to Congress, President Ulysses S. Grant stated:

In coming before you for the first time as Chief Magistrate of this great nation, it is with gratitude to the Giver of All Good for the many benefits we enjoy....

From the foundation of the Government to the present the management of the original inhabitants of this continent - the Indians - has been a subject of embarrassment and expense, and has been attended with continuous robberies, murders, and wars. From my own experience upon the frontiers and in Indian countries, I do not hold either legislation or the conduct of the whites who come most in contact with the Indians blameless for these hostilities. The past, however, cannot be undone, and the question must be met as we now find it. I have attempted a new policy toward these wards of the nation (they can not be regarded in any other light than as wards), with fair results so far as tried, and which I hope will be attended ultimately with great success. The Society of Friends is well known as having succeeded in living in peace with the Indians in the early settlement of Pennsylvania. . . . They are known for their opposition to all strife, violence, and war, and are generally noted for their strict integrity and fair dealings. These considerations induced me to give the management of a few reservations of Indians to them and to throw the burden of the selection of agents upon the Society itself. The result has proven most satisfactory. . . .

The building of railroads, and the access thereby given to all the agricultural and mineral regions of the country, is rapidly bringing civilized settlements into contact with all tribes of Indians. No matter what ought to be the relations between such settlements and the aborigines, the fact is they do not harmonize well, and one or the other has to give way in the end. A system which looks to the extinction of a race is too horrible for a nation to adopt without entailing upon itself the wrath of all Christendom and engendering in the citizen a disregard for human life and the rights of others, dangerous to society. I see no substitute for such a system, except in placing all the Indians on large reservations. . . and giving them absolute protection there.

On October 21, 1870, President Ulysses S. Grant issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving:

Whereas it behooves a people sensible of their dependence on the Almighty publicly and collectively to acknowledge their gratitude for His favors and mercies and humbly to beseech for their continuance, and

Whereas the people of the United States during the year now about to end have special cause to be thankful for general prosperity, abundant harvests, exemption from pestilence, foreign war, and civil strife:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, concurring in any similar recommendations from chief magistrates of States, do hereby recommend to all citizens to meet in their respective places of worship on Thursday, the 24th day on November next, there to give thanks for the bounty of God during the year about to close and to supplicate for its continuance hereafter.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done as the city of Washington, this 21st day of October, A. D. 1870, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-fifth. U. S. Grant.

By the President: Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State.

On Monday, December 5, 1870, in his Second Annual Message to Congress, President Ulysses S. Grant stated:

We have, through a kind Providence, been blessed with abundant crops, and have been spared from complications and war with foreign nations....

The massacres of French and Russian residents at Tien-Tsin, under circumstances of great barbarity, was supposed by some to have been premeditated, and to indicate a purpose among the populace to exterminate foreigners in the Chinese Empire.... Unfortunately, the news of the war between the German States and France reached China soon after the massacre. It would appear that the popular mind became possessed with the idea that this contest, extending to the Chinese waters, would neutralize the Christian influence and power, and that the time was coming when the superstitious masses might expel all foreigners and restore mandarin influence. Anticipating trouble from this cause, I invited France and North Germany to make an authorized suspension of hostilities in the East (where they were temporarily suspended by act of the commanders), and to act together for the future protection in China of the lives and properties of Americans and Europeans....

Reform in the management of Indian affairs has received the special attention of the Administration from its inauguration to the present day. The experiment of making it a missionary work was tried with a few agencies given to the denomination of Friends, and has been found to work most advantageously.... Indian agencies being civil offices, I determined to give all the agencies to such religious denominations as had heretofore established missionaries among the Indians, and perhaps to some other denominations who would undertake the work on the same terms - i. e., as a missionary work. The societies selected are allowed to name their own agents, subject to the approval of the Executive, and are expected to watch over them and aid them as missionaries, to Christianize and civilize the Indians, and to train him in the arts of peace.... I entertain the confident hope that the policy now pursued will in a few years bring all the Indians upon reservations, where they will live in houses, and have schoolhouses and churches, and will be pursuing peaceful and self-sustaining avocations....

I would sum up the policy of the Administration... finally, in securing a pure, untrammelled ballot, where every man entitled to cast a vote may do so, just once at each election, without fear of molestation or proscription on account of his political faith, nativity, or color.

On January 1, 1871, in writing from the Executive Mansion to the Senate and House of Representatives, President Ulysses S. Grant stated:

It would seem highly desirable that the civilized Indians of the country should be encouraged in establishing for themselves forms of Territorial government compatible with the Constitution of the United States....

This is the first indication of the aborigines desiring to adopt our form of government, and it is highly desirable that they become self-sustaining, self-relying, Christianized, and civilized.

On October 28, 1871, President Ulysses S. Grant issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving:

The process of the seasons has again enabled the husbandman to garner the fruits of successful toil. Industry has been generally well rewarded. We are at peace with all nations, and tranquillity, with few exceptions, prevails at home. Within the past year we have in the main been free from ills which elsewhere have afflicted our kind. If some of us have had calamities, these should be an occasion for sympathy with the sufferers, of resignation on their part to the will of the Most High, and of rejoicing to the many who have been more favored.

I therefore recommend that on Thursday, the 30th day of November next, the people meet in their respective places of worship and there make the usual annual acknowledgements to Almighty God for the blessings He has conferred upon them, for their merciful exemptions from evils, and invoke His protection and kindness for their less fortunate brethren, whom in His wisdom He has deemed it best to chastise.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 28th day of October, A.D. 1871, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-sixth. U. S. Grant.

By the President: Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State.

On December 4, 1871, in his Third Annual Message to Congress, President Ulysses S. Grant stated:

The past year has, under a wise Providence, been one of general prosperity to the nation...

In Utah there still remains a remnant of barbarism, repugnant to civilization, to decency, and to the laws of the United States. Territorial officers, however, have been found who are willing to perform their duty in a spirit of equity and with a due sense of the necessity of sustaining the majesty of the law. Neither polygamy nor any other violation of existing statutes will be permitted within the territory of the United States. It is not with the religion of the self-styled Saints that we are now dealing, but with their practices. They will be protected in the worship of God according to the dictates of their consciences, but they will not be permitted to violate the laws under the cloak of religion. It may be advisable for Congress to consider what, in the execution of the laws against polygamy, is to be the status of plural wives and their offspring. The propriety of Congress passing an enabling act authorizing the Territorial Legislature of Utah to legitimize all children born prior to a time fixed in the act might be justified by its humanity to these innocent children...

The policy pursued toward the Indians has resulted favorably, so far as can be judged from the limited time during which it has been in operation. Through the exertions of the various societies of Christians to whom has been intrusted the execution of the policy, and the board of commissioners authorized by the law of April 10, 1869, many tribes of Indians have been induced to settle upon reservations, to cultivate the soil, to perform productive labor of various kinds, and to partially accept civilization. They are being cared for in such a way, it is hoped, as to induce those still pursuing their old habits of life to embrace the only opportunity which is left them to avoid extermination. I recommend liberal appropriations to carry out the Indian peace policy, not only because it is humane, Christianlike, and economical, but because it is right.

On May 14, 1872, President Ulysses S. Grant wrote to the Senate:

In answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 28th of March last, I transmit herewith copies of the correspondence between the Department of State and the consul of the United States at Bucharest relative to the persecution and oppression of the Israelites in the Principality of Romania.

On May 22, 1872, President Ulysses S. Grant wrote to the House of Representatives:

In answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 20th instant, requesting me to join the Italian Government in a protest against the intolerant and cruel treatment of the Jews in Romania, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State relative to the subject.

On October 11, 1872, President Ulysses S. Grant issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving:

Whereas the revolution of another year has again brought the time when it is usual to look back upon the past and publicly to thank the Almighty for His mercies and His blessings; and

Whereas if any one people has more occasion than another for such thankfulness it is the citizens of the United States, whose Government is their creature, subject to their behests; who have reserved to themselves ample civil and religious freedom and equality before the law; who during the last twelve months have enjoyed exemption from any grievous or general calamity, and to whom prosperity in agriculture, manufactures, and commerce has been vouchsafed:

Now, therefore, by these considerations, I recommend that on Thursday, the 28th day of November next, the people meet in their respective places of worship and there make their acknowledgements to God for His kindness and bounty.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 11th day of October, A. D. 1872, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-seventh. U. S. Grant.

By the President: Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State.

On December 2, 1872, in his Fourth Annual Message to Congress, President Ulysses S. Grant stated:

In transmitting to you this my fourth annual message it is with thankfulness to the Giver of All Good that as a nation we have been blessed for the past year with peace at home, peace abroad, and a general prosperity vouchsafed to but few peoples....

I can not doubt that the continued maintenance of slavery in Cuba is among the strongest inducements to the continuance of this strife. A terrible wrong is the natural cause of a terrible evil. The abolition of slavery and the introduction of other reforms in the administration of the government in Cuba could not fail to advance the restoration of peace and order. It is greatly to be hoped that the present liberal Government of Spain will voluntarily adopt this view. The law of emancipation, which was passed more than two years since, has remained unexecuted in the absence of regulations for its enforcement. It was but a feeble step toward emancipation, but it was the recognition of right, and was hailed as such, and exhibited Spain in harmony with sentiments of humanity and of justice and in sympathy with the other powers of the Christian and civilized world.

On Tuesday, March 4, 1873, in his Second Inaugural Address, President Ulysses S. Grant stated:

Under Providence, I have been called a second time to act as Executive over this great nation.... I do believe that our Great Maker is preparing the world, in His own good time, to become one nation, speaking one language, and then armies and navies will no longer be required.

On October 14, 1873, President Ulysses S. Grant issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving:

The approaching close of another year brings with it the occasion for renewed thanksgiving and acknowledgement to the Almighty Ruler of the Universe for the unnumbered mercies which He has bestowed upon us. Abundant harvests have been among the rewards of industry. With local exceptions, health has been among the many blessings enjoyed. Tranquillity at home and peace with other nations have prevailed. Frugal industry is regaining its merited recognition and its merited rewards.

Gradually but, under the providence of God, surely, as we trust, the nation is recovering from the lingering results of a dreadful civil strife. For these and all the other mercies vouchsafed it becomes us as a people to return heartfelt and grateful acknowledgements, and with our thanksgiving for blessings we may unite in prayers for the cessation of local and temporary sufferings.

I therefore recommend that on Thursday, the 27th day of November next, the people meet in their respective places of worship to make their acknowledgements to Almighty God for His bounties and His protection, and to offer to Him prayers for their continuance.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 14th day of October, A.D. 1873, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-eighth. U.S. Grant.

By the President: Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State.

On December 1, 1873, in his Fifth Annual Message to Congress, President Ulysses S. Grant stated:

The existence of this new Republic was inaugurated by striking the fetters from the slaves in Porto Rico. This beneficent measure was followed by the release of several thousand persons illegally held as slaves in Cuba. Next, the Captain-General of that colony was deprived of the power to set aside the orders of his superiors at Madrid, which had pertained to the office since 1825. The sequestered estates of American citizens, which had been the cause of long and fruitless correspondence, were ordered to be restored to their owners. All these liberal steps were taken in the face of a violent opposition directed by the revolutionary slaveholders of Havana, who are vainly striving to stay the march of ideas which has terminated slavery in Christendom, Cuba only excepted.

In 1875, President Ulysses S. Grant gave an address to the Army of Tennessee:

Now in the centennial year of our national existence, I believe, is a good time to begin the work of strengthening the foundation of the structure commenced by our patriotic forefathers one hundred years ago at Lexington.

Let us all labor to add all needful guarantees for the security of free thought, free speech, a free press, pure morals, unfettered religious sentiment, and of equal rights and privileges to all men, irrespective of nationality, color, or religion.

On Wednesday, October 27, 1875, President Ulysses S. Grant issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving:

In accordance with a practice at once wise and beautiful, we have been accustomed, as the year is drawing to a close, to devote an occasion to the humble expression of our thanks to Almighty God for the ceaseless and distinguished benefits bestowed upon us as a nation and for His mercies and protection during the closing year.

Amid the rich and free enjoyment of all our advantages, we should not forget the source from whence they are derived and the extent of our obligation to the Father of All Mercies.

We have full reason to renew our thanks to Almighty God for favors bestowed upon us during the past year.

American Quotations.txt

By His continuing mercy civil and religious liberty have been maintained, peace has reigned within our borders, labor and enterprise have produced their merited rewards; and to His watchful providence we are indebted for security from pestilence and other national calamity.

Apart from national blessings, each individual among us has occasion to thoughtfully recall and devoutly recognize the favors and protection which he has enjoyed.

Now, therefore, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do recommend that on Thursday, the 25th day of November, the people of the United States, abstaining from all secular pursuits and from their accustomed avocations, do assemble in their respective places of worship, and, in such form as may seem most appropriate in their own hearts, offer to Almighty God their acknowledgments and thanks for all His mercies and their humble prayers for a continuance of His divine favor.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

On December 7, 1875, in his Seventh Annual Message to Congress, President Ulysses S. Grant stated:

The past year has furnished no evidence of an approaching termination of the ruinous conflict which has been raging for seven years in the neighboring island of Cuba. The same disregard of the laws of civilized warfare and of the just demands of humanity which has heretofore called forth expressions of condemnation from the nations of Christendom has continued to blacken the sad scene. Desolation, ruin, and pillage are pervading the rich fields of one of the most fertile and productive regions of the earth...

In nearly every annual message that I have had the honor of transmitting to Congress I have called attention to the anomalous, not to say scandalous, condition of affairs existing in the Territory of Utah, and have asked for definite legislation to correct it. That polygamy should exist in a free, enlightened, and Christian country, without the power to punish so flagrant a crime against decency and morality, seems preposterous. True, there is no law to sustain this unnatural vice; but what is needed is a law to punish it as a crime, and at the same time to fix that status of the innocent children, the offspring of this system, and of the possibility innocent plural wives. But as an institution polygamy should be banished from the land...

I deem of vital importance [to]...drive out licensed immorality, such as polygamy and the importation of women for illegitimate purposes.

On June 6, 1876, President Ulysses S. Grant wrote from Washington to the Editor of the Sunday School Times in Philadelphia:

American Quotations.txt

Your favor of yesterday asking a message from me to the children and the youth of the United States, to accompany your Centennial number, is this morning received.

My advice to Sunday schools, no matter what their denomination, is: Hold fast to the Bible as the sheet anchor of your liberties; write its precepts in your hearts, and practice them in your lives.

To the influence of this Book are we indebted for all the progress made in true civilization, and to this must we look as our guide in the future. "Righteousness exalteth a nation; but sin is a reproach to any people." Yours respectfully,

U. S. Grant

On June 26, 1876, President Ulysses S. Grant issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Public Thanksgiving:

The centennial anniversary of the day on which the people of the United States declared their right to a separate and equal station among the powers of the earth seems to demand an exceptional observance.

The founders of the Government, at its birth and in its feebleness, invoked the blessings and the protection of a Divine Providence, and the thirteen colonies and three millions of people have expanded into a nation of strength and numbers commanding the position which then was asserted and for which fervent prayers were then offered.

It seems fitting that on the occurrence of the hundredth anniversary of our existence as a nation a grateful acknowledgment should be made to Almighty God for the protection and the bounties which He has vouchsafed to our beloved country.

I therefore invite the good people of the United States, on the approaching 4th day of July, in addition to the usual observances with which they are accustomed to greet the return of the day, further, in such manner and at such time as in their respective localities and religious associations may be most convenient, to mark its recurrence by some public religious and devout thanksgiving to Almighty God for the blessings which have been bestowed upon us as a nation during the century of our existence, and humbly to invoke a continuance of His favor and of His protection.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 26th day of June, A. D. 1876, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundredth. U. S. Grant.

On October 26, 1876, President Ulysses S. Grant issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving:

From year to year we have been accustomed to pause in our daily pursuits and set apart a time to offer our thanks to Almighty God for the special blessings He has vouchsafed to us, with our prayers for a continuance thereof.

We have at this time equal reason to be thankful for His continued protection and for the many material blessings which His bounty has bestowed.

In addition to these favors accorded to us as individuals, we have especial occasion to express our hearty thanks to Almighty God that by His providence and guidance our Government, established a century ago, has been enabled to fulfill the purpose of its founders in offering an asylum to the people of every race, securing civil and religious liberty to all within its borders, and meting out to every individual alike justice and equality before the law.

It is, moreover, especially our duty to offer our humble prayers to the Father of All Mercies for a continuance of His divine favor to us as a nation and as individuals.

By reason of all these considerations, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do recommend to the people of the United States to devote the 30th day of November next to the expression of their thanks and prayers to Almighty God, and, laying aside their daily avocations and all secular occupations, to assemble in their respective places of worship and observe such day as a day of thanksgiving and rest.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 26th day of October, A.D. 1876, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and first.

In 1884, while fighting the battle against throat cancer, Ulysses S. Grant began writing his Memoirs at the behest of Mark Twain, who agreed to publish them. Encouraged by the affection and honor of the people of the country during his illness, Ulysses S. Grant, who was a Methodist, wrote:

I believe in the Holy Scriptures, and whoso lives by them will be benefitted thereby. Men may differ as to the interpretation, which is human, but the Scriptures are man's best guide....

I did not go riding yesterday, although invited and permitted by my physicians, because it was the Lord's day, and because I felt that if a relapse should set in, the people who are praying for me would feel that I was not helping their faith by riding out on Sunday....

Yes, I know, and I feel very grateful to the Christian people of the land for their prayers in my behalf. There is no sect or religion, as shown in the Old or New Testament, to which this does not apply.

Hayes, Rutherford Birchard (October 4, 1822-January, 17, 1893), was the 19th President of the United States, 1877-81; Governor of Ohio, 1868-72, 1876-77; U.S. Representative, 1864-67; Brigadier General during the Civil War, 1864; Lieutenant Colonel, 1861, wounded in the Battle of South Mountain, 1862; Major in the 23rd Ohio Volunteers, 1861; City Solicitor of Cincinnati, Ohio, 1858-61; delegate to the Ohio Republican Convention, 1855; married Lucy Ware Webb, 1852; graduated from Harvard Law School and admitted to bar, 1845; and graduated from Kenyon College, Ohio, 1842.

Rutherford B. Hayes requested that his Presidential Inauguration be moved to Monday, March 5, rather than violate the Sabbath. He took the oath of office as President of the U.S. on March 5, 1877, with his open palm placed on Psalm 118:13, and, after repeating the oath, he kissed the open Bible. On Monday, March 5, 1877, in his Inaugural Address, President Rutherford Birchard Hayes stated:

Looking for the guidance of that Divine Hand by which the destinies of nations and individuals are shaped, I call upon you, Senators, Representatives, judges, fellow-citizens, here and everywhere, to unite with me in an earnest effort to secure to our country the blessings, not only of material property, but of justice, peace, and union - a union depending not upon the constraint of force, but upon the loving devotion of a free people; and that all things may be so ordered and settled upon the best and surest foundations that peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety, may be established among us for all generations.

On October 29, 1877, President Rutherford B. Hayes issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer:

The completed circle of summer and winter, seedtime and harvest, has brought us to the accustomed season at which a religious people celebrates with praise and thanksgiving the enduring mercy of Almighty God. This devout and public confession of the constant dependance of man upon the divine favor for all the good gifts of life and health and peace and happiness, so early in our history made the habit of our people, finds in the survey of the past year new grounds for its joyful and grateful manifestation.

In all the blessings which depend upon benignant seasons, this has indeed been a memorable year. Over the wide territory of our country, with all its diversity of soil and climate and products, the earth has yielded a bountiful return to the labor of the husbandman. The health of the people has been blighted by no prevalent or widespread diseases. No great disasters of shipwreck upon our coasts or to our commerce on the seas have brought loss and hardship to merchants or mariners and clouded the happiness of the community with sympathetic sorrow.

In all that concerns our strength and peace and greatness as a nation; in all that touches the permanence and security of our Government and the beneficent institutions on which it rests; in all that affects the character and dispositions of our people and tests our capacity to enjoy and uphold the equal and free condition of society, now permanent and universal throughout the land, the experience of the last year is conspicuously marked by the protecting providence of God and is full of promise and hope for the coming generations.

Under a sense of these infinite obligations to the Great Ruler of Times and Seasons and Events, let us humbly ascribe it to our own faults and frailties if in any degree that perfect concord and happiness, peace and justice, which such great mercies should diffuse through the hearts and lives of our people do not altogether and always and everywhere prevail. Let us with one spirit and with one voice lift up praise and thanksgiving to God for His manifold goodness to our land, His manifest care for our nation.

Now, therefore, I, Rutherford B. Hayes, President of the United States, do appoint Thursday, the 29th day of November next, as a day of national thanksgiving and prayer; and I earnestly recommend that, withdrawing themselves from secular cares and labors, the people of the United States do meet together on that day in their respective places of worship, there to give thanks and praise to Almighty God for His mercies and to devoutly beseech their continuance.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 29th day of October, A.D. 1877, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and second. R. B. Hayes.

By the President: Wm. M. Evarts, Secretary of State.

On Monday, December 3, 1877, in his First Annual Message, President Rutherford B. Hayes stated:

With devout gratitude to the bountiful Giver of All Good, I congratulate you that at the beginning of your first regular session you find our country blessed with health and peace and abundant harvests, and with encouraging prospects of an early return of general prosperity....

The Government of the Samoan Islands has sent an envoy, in the person of its secretary of state, to invite the Government of the United States to recognize and protect their independence, to establish commercial relations with their people, and to assist them in their steps toward regulated and responsible government. The inhabitants of these islands, having made considerable progress in Christian civilization and the development of trade, are doubtful of their ability to maintain peace and independence without the aid of some stronger power.

On October 30, 1878, President Rutherford B. Hayes issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer:

The recurrence of that season at which it is the habit of our people to make devout and public confession of their constant dependence upon the divine favor for all the good gifts of life and happiness and of public peace and prosperity exhibits in the record of the year abundant reasons for our gratitude and thanksgiving.

Exuberant harvests, productive mines, ample crops of the staples of trade and manufactures, have enriched the country.

The resources thus furnished to our reviving industry and expanding commerce are hastening the day when discords and distresses through the length and breadth of the land will, under the continued favor of Providence, have given way to confidence and energy and assured prosperity.

Peace with all nations has been maintained unbroken, domestic tranquillity has prevailed, and the institutions of liberty and justice which the wisdom and virtue of our fathers established remain the glory and defense of their children.

The general prevalence of the blessings of health through our wide land has made more conspicuous the sufferings and sorrows which the dark shadow of pestilence has cast upon a portion of our people. This heavy affliction even the Divine Ruler has tempered to the suffering communities in the universal sympathy and succor which have flowed to their relief, and the whole nation may rejoice in the unity of spirit in our people by which they cheerfully share one another's burdens.

Now, therefore, I, Rutherford B. Hayes, President of the United States, do appoint Thursday, the 28th day of November next, as a day of national thanksgiving and prayer; and I earnestly recommend that, withdrawing themselves from secular cares and labors, the people of the United States do meet together on that day in their respective places of worship, there to give thanks and praise to Almighty God for His mercies and to devoutly beseech their continuance.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

On December 2, 1878, in his Second Annual Message to Congress, President Rutherford B. Hayes stated:

Our heartfelt gratitude is due to the Divine Being who holds in His hands the destinies of nations for the continued bestowal during the last year of countless blessings upon our country.

On Monday, November 3, 1879, President Rutherford B. Hayes issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer:

At no recurrence of the season, which the devout habit of a religious people has made the occasion for giving thanks to Almighty God and humbly invoking His continued favor, has the material prosperity enjoyed by our whole country been more conspicuous, more manifold, or more universal.

During the past year, also, unbroken peace with all foreign nations, the general prevalence of domestic tranquillity, the supremacy and security of the great institutions of civil and religious freedom, have gladdened the hearts of our people and confirmed their attachment to their Government, which the wisdom and courage of our ancestors so fitly framed and the wisdom and courage of their descendants have so firmly maintained to be the habitation of liberty and justice to successive generations.

Now, I, Rutherford B. Hayes, President of the United States, do appoint Thursday, the 27th day of November instant, as a day of national thanksgiving and prayer; and I earnestly recommend that, withdrawing themselves from secular cares and labors, the people of the United States do meet together on that day in their respective places of worship, there to give thanks and praise to Almighty God for His mercies and to devoutly beseech their continuance.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

On December 1, 1879, in his Third Annual Message to Congress, President Rutherford B. Hayes stated:

The members of the Forty-sixth Congress have assembled in their first regular session under circumstances calling for mutual congratulations and grateful acknowledgement to the Giver of All Good for the large and unusual measure of national prosperity which we now enjoy.

On Monday, November 1, 1880, President Rutherford B. Hayes issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving:

At no period in their history since the United States became a nation has this people had so abundant and universal reasons for joy and gratitude at the favor of Almighty God or been subject to so profound an obligation to give thanks for His loving kindness and humbly to implore His continued care and protection.

Health, wealth, and prosperity throughout all our borders; peace, honor, and friendship with all the world; firm and faithful adherence by the great body of our population to the principles of liberty and justice which have made our greatness as a nation, and to the wise institutions and strong frame of government and society which will perpetuate it - for all these let the thanks of a happy and united people, as with one voice, ascend in devout homage to the Giver of All Good.

I therefore recommend that on Thursday, the 25th day of November next, the people meet in their respective places of worship to make their acknowledgments to Almighty God for His bounties and His protection and to offer to Him prayers for their continuance.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done in the city of Washington, this 1st day of November, A.D. 1880, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and fifth. R. B. Hayes.

By the President: Wm. M. Evarts, Secretary of State.

On December 6, 1880, in his Fourth Annual Message to Congress, President Rutherford B. Hayes stated:

By the favor of Divine Providence we have been blessed during the past year with health, with abundant harvests, with profitable employment for all our people, and with contentment at home, and with peace and friendship with other nations.

On February 22, 1881, in an Executive Order issued from Washington, D.C., President Rutherford B. Hayes wrote to the Secretary of War:

In view of the well-known fact that the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Army of the United States is the cause of much demoralization among both officers and men, and that it gives rise to a large proportion of the cases before general and garrison courts-martial, involving great expense and serious injury to the service -

It is therefore directed, that the Secretary of War take suitable steps, as far as practicable consistently with vested rights, to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage at the camps, forts, and other posts of the Army.

It was President Rutherford B. Hayes' habit to hold prayers following breakfast each day in the White house. A chapter of Scripture was read aloud with each person there reading a portion. The meeting ended with everyone kneeling and repeating the Lord's prayer. On the occasion of his son's joining a church, President Rutherford B. Hayes offered fatherly encouragement:

I hope that you will be benefitted by your churchgoing. Where the habit does not Christianize it generally civilizes. There is reason enough for supporting churches if there were none higher.

President Rutherford B. Hayes gave financial support to and held the position of a trustee in the Methodist Church. Following a speech he gave to the Catholic Knights of America, he noted these thoughts in his diary:

I am a Protestant, born a Protestant, expect to live a Protestant, and shall probably die a Protestant. I can see in the past, and to-day, faults in the Catholic Church, but I am grateful for:

(1) its work in behalf of temperance;
(2) its example in keeping together poor and rich; care for the poor; influence with the poor;
(3) for its treatment of the blacks; of all the unfortunate races. A negro sat with us at our banquet table;

(4) for its fidelity in spite of party... Archbishop Purcell strung the American flag, in the crisis of our fate, from the top of the Cathedral in Cincinnati April 16, 1861!

The spire was beautiful before, but the Catholic prelate made it radiant with hope and glory for our country!

President Rutherford B. Hayes explained his position on church:

I am not a subscriber to any creed. I belong to no church. But I try to be a Christian, or rather I want to be a Christian and to help do Christian work.

President Rutherford B. Hayes recorded in his diary:

Have been reading Genesis several Sundays...not as an infidel reads to carp and quarrel and criticize, but as one who wishes to be informed and furnished in the earliest and most wonderful of all literary productions. The literature of the Bible should be studied as one studies Shakespeare, for illustration and language, for its true picture of man and woman's nature, for its early historical record.

President Rutherford B. Hayes declared:

I am a firm believer in the Divine teachings, perfect example, and atoning sacrifice of Jesus Christ. I believe also in the Holy Scriptures as the revealed Word of God to the world for its enlightenment and salvation.

On March 13, 1892, in his Last Will and Testament, Rutherford Birchard Hayes stated:

I commit my soul to the mercy of God through our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and I exhort my dear children humbly to try to guide themselves by the teachings of the New Testament in its broad spirit, and to put no faith in any man's narrow construction of its letter here or there.

On January 17, 1893, shortly before his death, Rutherford B. Hayes wrote in a diary entry:

I am a Christian, according to my conscience, in belief, not of course, in character and conduct, but in purpose and wish; not, of course, by the orthodox standards. But I am content and have a feeling of trust and safety...Let me be pure and wise and kind and true in all things.

On January 18, 1893, from his Executive Mansion in Washington, D. C., President Benjamin Harrison wrote:

To the people of the United States:
The death of Rutherford B. Hayes, who was President of the United States from March 4, 1877, to March 4, 1881, at his home in Fremont, Ohio, at 11 p.m. yesterday, is an event the announcement of which will be received with very general and very sincere sorrow. His public service extended over many years and over a wide range of official duty. He was a patriotic citizen, a lover of the flag and of our free institutions, an industrious and conscientious civil officer, a soldier of dauntless courage, a loyal comrade and friend, a sympathetic and helpful neighbor, and the honored head of a happy Christian home.

Pasteur, Louis (December 27, 1822-September 28, 1895), was a French microbiologist and chemist. He developed the process of "Pasteurization" for milk; the vaccines for anthrax and chicken cholera, 1881; and the rabies vaccine, 1885. He revolutionized the medical field by establishing the germ theory of disease, organic basis and regulation of fermentation, and bacteriology. His research laid the foundation for the control of tuberculosis, cholera, diphtheria, tetanus, and many other diseases. In 1854 he was appointed dean of the faculty of sciences at Lille University, and in 1888 the Pasteur Institute was founded to treat rabies, and for advanced biological research.

In describing anaerobic bacteria, Louis Pasteur commented:

The more I study nature, the more I stand amazed at the work of the Creator. Into his tiniest creatures, God has placed extraordinary properties that turn them into agents of destruction of dead matter.

Louis Pasteur was questioned in his older years concerning faith. He replied:

The more I know, the more does my faith approach that of the Breton peasant. Could I but know all, I would have the faith of a Breton peasant woman.

Being one of the first European scientists to reject the theory of spontaneous generation and evolution, Louis Pasteur insisted that life only arises from life. He explained:

Microscopic beings must come into the world from parents similar to themselves. . . . There is something in the depths of our souls which tells us that the world may be more than a mere combination of events.

Louis Pasteur declared in one of his lectures:

Science brings man nearer to God.

Renan, Joseph Ernest (1823-1890), was a French philosopher and historian. In 1878, he was elected to the French Academy. He was famous for his Life of Jesus; History of the People of Israel; and Philosophical Dramas. In La Vie de Jesus, 1863, Renan stated in his introduction concerning Jesus:

The whole of history is incomprehensible without Him.

In Les Apotres, 1866, Renan wrote:

Religion is not a popular error; it is a great instinctive truth, sensed by the people, expressed by the people.

In 1866, Joseph Ernest Renan exclaimed:

What would we do without [Christianity]? . . . If rationalism wishes to govern the world without regard to the religious needs of the soul, the experience of the French Revolution is there to teach us the consequences of such a blunder.

Colfax, Schuyler (March 23, 1823-January 13, 1885), was an American editor and politician. He served as Vice-President of the United States under Ulysses S. Grant, 1869-73; a U. S. Representative for seven terms, 1855-69, and Speaker of the House Representatives, 1863-69. He founded the Daughters of Rebekah, the women's branch of American Odd Fellows, which is an organization to supply aid and assistance to those in need. Schuyler Colfax said:

American Quotations.txt

Man derives his greatest happiness not by that which he does for himself, but by what he accomplishes for others. This is a sad world at best - a world of sorrow, of suffering, of injustice, and falsification; men stab those whom they hate with the stiletto of slander, but it is for the followers of our Lord to improve it, and to make it more as Christ would have it. The most precious crown of fame that a human being can ask is to kneel at the bar of God and hear the beautiful words, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

Just fifty years ago this fall, in a large city by the seashore, nearly a thousand miles from here, a lady, whose husband was dead, took her little boy by the hand, and led him to the Sabbath-school.

For thirty years afterwards he was a scholar or a teacher of the Sabbath-school, and he has never forgotten those instructions of youth. The lady who took her little boy to that Sunday-school is now in a happier land, but the boy is still living.

That lady was my beloved mother, who is with her Father and Saviour in heaven, and that little boy was myself. Today I come to this school with my little boy, and his mother with us, that we may place his imperfect steps in the path in which my mother placed my little feet half a century ago.

In a Memorial Address for President Lincoln, April 24, 1865, Schuyler Colfax, Speaker of the House of Representatives stated:

Nor should I forget to mention here that the last act of Congress ever signed by him was one requiring that the motto, in which he sincerely believed, "In God We Trust," should hereafter be inscribed upon all our national coin.

Sherman, John (May 10, 1823-1900), was an American political leader, the younger brother of the famous Civil War General, William Tecumseh Sherman. He served as a U. S. Representative from Ohio, 1855-61; U. S. Senator, 1861-77, 1881-97; Secretary of the Treasury under President Hayes, 1877-81; and Secretary of State under President McKinley, 1897-98. John Sherman is noted for having introduced the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, 1879, in an effort to curb the monopolies of big businesses. He stated:

I appreciate the Holy Bible as the highest gift of God to man, unless it be the "unspeakable Gift" of Jesus Christ as the Saviour of the world. It is the Divine assurance that our life does not end with death, and it is the strongest incentive to honorable, charitable Christian deeds.

Hodge, Archibald Alexander (July 18, 1823-November 11, 1886), was an American author, lecturer and theologian at Princeton University. In 1873, he stated:

A Christian is just as much under the obligation to obey God's will in the most secular of his daily business as he is in his closet or at the communion table. He has no right to separate his life into two realms, and acknowledge different moral codes in each...

The kingdom of God includes all sides of human life, and it is a kingdom of absolute righteousness. You are either a loyal subject or a traitor. When the king comes, how will he find you doing?

If professing Christians are unfaithful to the authority of their Lord in their capacity as citizens of the State, they cannot expect to be blessed by the indwelling of the Holy Ghost in their capacity as members of the Church. The kingdom of God is one, it cannot be divided...

If the Church languishes, the State cannot be in health; and if the State rebels against its Lord and King, the Church cannot enjoy his favour...

I charge you, citizens of the United States, afloat on your wide sea of politics, THERE IS ANOTHER KING, ONE JESUS: THE SAFETY OF THE STATE CAN BE SECURED ONLY IN THE WAY OF HUMBLE AND WHOLE-SOULED LOYALTY TO HIS PERSON AND OF OBEDIENCE TO HIS LAW.

Hill, Benjamin Harvey (September 14, 1823-August 16, 1882), was an American statesman and orator from Georgia. He opposed secession prior to the Civil War, later became a U.S. Senator. In a tribute to Robert E. Lee, Benjamin Harvey Hill expressed:

He was a foe without hate, a friend without treachery, a soldier without cruelty, and a victim without murmuring. He was a public officer without vices, a private citizen without wrong, a neighbor without reproach, a Christian without hypocrisy, and a man without guile. He was a Caesar without his ambition, a Frederick without his tyranny, a Napoleon without his selfishness, and a Washington without his reward.

Fabre, Henri Jean (December 22, 1823-October 11, 1915), was a French entomologist, considered the "Father of Modern Entomology." As a biologist, he pioneered unprecedented studies of insects in their habitats. He also authored numerous popular textbooks, including Souvenirs entomologiques, 1879-1907. Henri Jean Fabre, who was a personal friend of Louis Pasteur, asserted concerning God:

Without Him I understand nothing; without Him all is darkness... Every period had its manias. I regard Atheism as a mania. It is the malady of the age. You could take my skin from me more easily than my faith in God.

Pennsylvania Supreme Court (1824), in the case of Updegraph v. The Commonwealth, 11 Serg. & R. 393-394, 398-399, 402-407 (1824), recorded the court's declaration that:

Abner Updegraph... on the 12th day of December [1821]... not having the fear of God before his eyes... contriving and intending to scandalize, and bring into disrepute, and vilify the Christian religion and the scriptures of truth, in the presence and hearing of several persons... did unlawfully, wickedly and premeditatedly, despitely and blasphemously say... "The Holy Scriptures were a mere fable: that they were a contradiction, and that although they contained a number of good things, yet they contained a great many lies." To the great dishonor of Almighty God, to the great scandal of the profession of the Christian religion....

The jury... finds a malicious intention in the speaker to vilify the Christian religion and the scriptures, and this court cannot look beyond the record, nor take any notice of the allegation, that the words were uttered by the defendant, a member of a debating association, which convened weekly for discussion and mutual information....

That there is an association in which so serious a subject is treated with so much levity, indecency and scurrility... I am sorry to hear, for it would prove a nursery of vice, a school of preparation to qualify young men for the gallows, and young women for the brothel, and there is not a skeptic of decent manners and good morals, who would not consider such debating clubs as a common nuisance and disgrace to the city....

It was the out-pouring of an invective, so vulgarly shocking and insulting, that the lowest grade of civil authority ought not to be subject to it, but when spoken in a Christian land, and to a Christian audience, the highest offence contra bonos mores; and even if Christianity was not part of the law of the land, it is the popular religion of the country, an insult on which would be indictable....

Assertion is once more made, that Christianity never was received as part of the common law of this Christian land; and... added, that if it was, it was virtually repealed by the constitution of the United States, and of this state... If the argument be worth anything, all the laws which have Christianity for their object - all would be carried away at one fell swoop - the act against cursing and swearing, and breach of the Lord's day; the act forbidding incestuous marriages, perjury by taking a false oath upon the book, fornication and adultery... for all these are founded on Christianity - for all these are restraints upon civil liberty....

We will first dispose of what is considered the grand objection - the constitutionality of Christianity - for, in effect, that is the question. Christianity, general Christianity, is and always has been a part of the common law... not Christianity founded on any particular religious tenets; not Christianity with an established church... but Christianity with liberty of conscience to all men....

I would have it taken notice of, that we do not meddle with the difference of opinion, and that we interfere only where the root of Christianity is struck as....

The true principles of natural religion are part of the common law; the essential principles of revealed religion are part of the common law; so that a person vilifying, subverting or ridiculing them may be prosecuted at common law; but temporal punishments ought not to be inflicted for mere opinions;

Thus this wise legislature framed this great body of laws, for a Christian country and Christian people. This is the Christianity of the common law... and thus, it is irrefragably proved, that the laws and institutions of this state are built on the foundation of reverence for Christianity....

In this the Constitution of the United States has made no alteration, nor in the great body of the laws which was an incorporation of the common-law doctrine of Christianity... without which no free government can long exist.

To prohibit the open, public and explicit denial of the popular religion of a country is a necessary measure to preserve the tranquillity of a government. Of this, no person in a Christian country can complain....

In the Supreme Court of New York it was solemnly determined, that Christianity was part of the law of the land, and that to revile the Holy Scriptures was an indictable offence.

The case assumes, says Chief Justice Kent, that we are a Christian people, and the morality of the country is deeply engrafted on Christianity. The People v. Ruggles.

No society can tolerate a wilful and spiteful attempt to subvert its religion, no more than it would to break down its laws - a general, malicious and deliberate intent to overthrow Christianity, general Christianity.

Religion and morality... are the foundations of all governments. Without these restraints no free government could long exist.

It is liberty run mad to declaim against the punishment of these offenses, or to assert that the punishment is hostile to the spirit and genius of our government.

They are far from being true friends to liberty who support this doctrine, and the promulgation of such opinions, and general receipt of them among the people, would be the sure forerunners of anarchy, and finally, of despotism.

No free government now exists in the world unless where Christianity is acknowledged, and is the religion of the country... Its foundations are broad and strong, and deep... it is the purest system of morality, the firmest auxiliary, and only stable support of all human laws....

Christianity is part of the common law; the act against blasphemy is neither obsolete nor virtually repealed; nor is Christianity inconsistent with our free governments of the genius of the people.

While our own free constitution secures liberty of conscience and freedom of religious worship to all, it is not necessary to maintain that any man should have the right publicly to vilify the religion of his neighbors and of the country; these two privileges are directly opposed.

MacDonald, George (1824-1905), was a Scottish novelist and writer of children's fairy tales. His best remembered stories include: The Princess and the Goblins and The Fairy Fleet. He began his career as a Congregational minister. He took up writing and became close friends with the well-known writers of the day, John Ruskin and Lewis Carroll. Carroll first recited his stories of Alice in Wonderland to George MacDonald's children, whose delighted response convinced Carroll to publish them.

In David Elginbrod, published in 1863, George MacDonald wrote:

Here lie I, Martin Elginbrodde:
Hae mercy o' my soul, Lord God;
As I wad do, were I Lord God,
And ye were Martin Elginbrodde.

Coolley, Thomas McIntyre (January 6, 1824-September 12, 1898) was admitted to the bar in 1846 and commissioned by the legislature of Michigan to compile the state statutes in 1857. The following year he was chosen as reporter for the state Supreme Court. During his seven years in that position he edited 8 volumes of previous reports.

In 1859, he became one of 3 professors at the law school of the University of Michigan, where he also was secretary and dean of the department. Thomas Coolley was appointed to the state Supreme Court in 1864 and served until 1885. At that time he became professor of history and Constitutional Law at the university. He was the first chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, 1887-91.

Thomas Coolley was elected President of the American Bar Association in 1893. His writings include: A Treatise on the Constitutional Limitations Which Rest upon the Legislative Power of the States of the American Union, 1868; edited versions of Blackstone's Commentaries, 1871; Joseph Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, 1873; The Law of Taxation, 1876; The Law of Torts, 1879; and The General Principles of Constitutional Law, 1890. In The General Principles of Constitutional Law, he wrote:

It was never intended by the Constitution that the government should be prohibited from recognizing religion, or that religious worship should never be provided for in cases where a proper recognition of Divine Providence in the working of government might seem to require it, and where it might be done without drawing an invidious distinction between religious beliefs, organizations, or sects.

The Christian religion was always recognized in the administration of the common law of the land, the fundamental principles of that religion must continue to be recognized in the same cases and to the same extent as formerly.

Jackson, Thomas Jonathan "Stonewall" (January 21, 1824-May 10, 1863), was a Confederate General during the Civil War, serving under General Robert E. Lee. General Jackson's tremendous success in combat against great odds was observed in numerous battles, including the: Battle of Bull Run; Shenandoah Valley; Cross Keys; Port Republic; Seven Day's Battle; Second Battle of Bull Run; etc. When he died, General Lee exclaimed, "I have lost my right arm."

As professor of philosophy and tactics at Virginia Military Institute, General Jackson once said:

When we take our meals, there is the grace. When I take a draught of water, I always pause, as my palate receives the refreshment, to lift up my heart to God in thanks and prayer for the water of life. Whenever I drop a letter into the box at the post-office, I send a petition along with it, for God's blessing upon its mission and upon the person to whom it is sent.

When I break the seal of a letter just received, I stop to pray to God that He may prepare me for its contents, and make it a messenger of good. When I go to my class-room and await the arrangement of the cadets in their places, that is my time to intercede with God for them.

In 1842, Jackson wrote to his uncle Alfred Neale, concerning the sudden death of his brother, Warren:

I have received no answer to my last communication conveying the sad news of my brother's premature death. He died in the hope of a bright immortality at the right hand of His Redeemer...

As time is knowledge I must hasten my pen forward. We have received the smile of Bounteous Providence in a favorable Spring. There is a volunteer company being formed here to march to Texas, in order to assist in the noble cause of liberty.

In 1852, Jackson wrote to his aunt, Mrs. Clementine (Alfred) Neale, from Lexington, Virginia:

The subject of becoming herald of the cross has often seriously engaged my attention, and I regard it as the most noble of all professions. It is the profession of our divine Redeemer, and I should not be surprised were I to die upon a foreign field, clad in ministerial armor, fighting under the banner of Jesus. What could be more glorious?

But my conviction is that I am doing good here; and that for the present I am where God would have me be. Within the last few days I have felt an unusual religious joy. I do rejoice to walk in the love of God. My heavenly Father condescended to use me as an instrument in getting up a large Sabbath school for the negroes here. He has greatly blessed it, and, I trust, all who are connected with it.

General Thomas Jonathan "Stonewall" Jackson, on April 13, 1859, wrote in a letter to his wife, Mary Ann:

Is there not comfort in prayer, which is not elsewhere to be found?"

On July 22, 1861, General Stonewall Jackson wrote to his wife, Mary Ann, from Manassas:

My precious Pet, - Yesterday, we fought a great battle and gained a great victory for which all the glory is due to God alone... My preservation was entirely due, as was the glorious victory, to our God, to whom be all the honor, grace, and glory.

On the battlefield in Manassas, General Stonewall Jackson prayed:

Oh God, let this horrible war quickly come to an end that we may all return home and engage in the only work that is worthwhile - and that is the salvation of men.

General Jackson's old servant said he:

... could always tell when a battle was near at hand, by seeing the general get up a great many times in the night to pray.

After the Battle of Cross Keys, Chaplain Bennett recorded a soldier's remarks:

I saw something today which affected me more than anything I ever saw or read on religion. While the battle was raging and the bullets were flying, Jackson rode by, calm as if he were at home, but his head was raised toward heaven, and his lips were moving, evidently in prayer.

In a letter to his wife, General Stonewall Jackson wrote:

Don't trouble yourself... these things are earthly and transitory. There are real and glorious blessings, I trust, in reserve for us, beyond this life. It is best for us to keep our eyes fixed upon the throne of God... It is gratifying to be beloved, and to have our conduct approved by our fellow men; but this is not worthy to be compared with the glory that is in reservation for us, in the presence of the glorified Redeemer... knowing that there awaits us "a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

General Stonewall Jackson had faithfully taught a colored Sunday school class in Lexington. He wrote to his pastor, the Reverend Dr. White:

My dear Pastor,

In my tent last night, after a fatiguing day's service, I remembered that I had failed to send you my contribution for our colored Sunday School. Enclosed you will find my check for that object, which please acknowledge at your earliest convenience and oblige yours faithfully,

T. Jackson.

General Jackson was instrumental in organizing the Chaplains' Association within the southern ranks. When it was reported to him how his army responded by attending religious services, Jackson replied:

That is good - very good - we ought to thank God for that.

In 1862, during the midst of the Civil War, Stonewall Jackson wrote to his wife, who was ill:

I trust you and all I have in the hands of an ever kind Providence, knowing that all things work together for the good of His people. So live that your sufferings may be sanctified to you; remember that our light afflictions, which are but for a moment, work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.

On May 2, 1863, the seemingly invincible Confederate Army won a tremendous victory at Chancellorsville. This victory was shortlived, though, for at twilight, as General Stonewall Jackson was scouting ahead of his troops, he was accidentally shot by his own troops. His left arm had to be amputated. This was a tragedy from which the Confederate troops never fully recovered.

The next day, when visited by Chaplain Lacy, Jackson remarked:

You see me severely wounded but not depressed.... I am sure that my Heavenly Father designs this affliction for my good. I am perfectly satisfied, that either in this life, or in that which is to come, I shall discover that what is now regarded as a calamity, is a blessing....

If it were in my power to replace my arm, I would not dare to do it, unless I could know it was the will of my Heavenly Father.

On May 10, 1863, General Jackson's wife, who had been called to his side, comforted him, saying, "Do you not feel willing to acquiesce in God's allotment, if He wills you to go today.... Well, before this day closes, you will be with the blessed Saviour in His glory." Jackson responded:

I will be an infinite gainer to be translated.

General Stonewall Jackson, in his restless sleep, uttered his final words:

Let us pass over the river, and rest under the shade of the trees.

Colquitt, Alfred Holt (April 20, 1824-March 26, 1894), was an American politician, orator and statesman. He served as a U.S. Senator and Governor of Georgia. On December 7, 1887, in Washington, Alfred Holt Colquitt remarked at the Evangelical Alliance:

I believe it is the mission of the ministers today, and of Christian laymen in this land, to go out into the fields and highways and meet the enemies that are seeking to place barriers in the way of Christian civilization - to meet the foe as he comes.

Religion and politics ought to be wedded like a loving pair. The spirit of our Master, who preached peace, should preside at our diplomatic councils. The love of our neighbor and of our friends - these should be the bases, not only of our Christianity and our patriotism, but of our daily politics.

I like to hear learned sermons and magnificent discourses - appeals purely to the intellect - abstract and abstruse ideas, and all that. But looking at the masses of mankind, and reviewing from the standpoint which I occupy, it is clear to me that there is a mission given to every lover of Christ to stand forth as the propagator of that religion which tempers the politics and statesmanship of this country.

Kelvin, Sir William Thompson, 1st Baron (June 26, 1824-December 17, 1907), was a British physicist. He developed degrees Kelvin to record temperatures on an absolute scale. He held the chair of Natural Philosophy at the University of Glasgow for 54 years. He formulated the First and Second Laws of Thermodynamics, introduced the Concept of Energy, and made enormous advancements in the areas of mathematics and physics. Among his great contributions were the invention of a ship's compass which was largely freed from the magnetic influence of the iron in the ship, as well as helping to design and lay the first trans-atlantic telegraph cable.

In 1903, Lord Kelvin made the statement:

With regard to the origin of life, science... positively affirms creative power.

On May 23, 1889, in his address as the Chairman of the Christian Evidence Society in London, Lord Kelvin explained:

My primary reason for accepting the invitation to preside was that I wished to show sympathy with this great Society which has been established for the purpose of defending Christianity as a Divine Revelation.

I also thought something was due from Science. I have long felt that there was a general impression in the non-scientific world that the scientific world believes Science has discovered ways of explaining all the facts of nature without adopting any definite belief in a Creator. I have never doubted that impression was utterly groundless.

It seems to me that when a scientific man says - as it has been said from time to time - that there is no God, he does not express his own ideas clearly. He is, perhaps, struggling with difficulties; but when he says that he does not believe in a creative power I am convinced he does not faithfully express what is in his mind. He is out of his depth...

I may refer to that old but never uninteresting subject of the miracles of geology. Physical Science does something for us here. Peter speaks of scoffers who said that "all things continue as they were from the beginning," but the Apostle affirms himself that "all these things shall be dissolved."

It seems to me that even physical science absolutely demonstrates the scientific truth of these words. We feel that there is no possibility of things going on forever as they have done for the last six thousand years. In science, as in morals and politics, there is absolutely no periodicity.

Cox, Samuel Sullivan (September 30, 1824-September 10, 1889), was a U. S. Representative, lawyer, diplomat, journalist and popular speaker. In the work Memorial Addresses, published by the U. S. Congress, 1890, Samuel Sullivan Cox's address to Congress is recorded:

I believe in the religion which was taught and exemplified in the life of the Nazarene, and I never fail to bear testimony to the ennobling and purifying influence of the Christian religion...

There was a poignancy in my heart when I saw the old church, where I so often worshipped, razed to the ground. Was it not there I attended my first Sunday-school? There it was that I learned my Bible verses, and received my red and blue tickets for proficiency. There it was that I accomplished the memorable task of reciting all of St. Paul to the Romans....

Those early memories were cut in durable stone. Tarnished by worldliness, dusted with the activities of life, they have pursued me through the various vicissitudes of professional, literary, and political life.

They became the nucleus of studies in college; the very coat of mail in the struggles against selfishness and skepticism; in fine, they prefigured and preordained my choice of spiritual belief against the delusive sophistries of new philosophies and mere material science.

They have enabled me, in following and studying the physical advancement of the past century, to perceive in all the atoms, forms, and forces of nature and the phenomena of mind, the truth and benignity of the great scheme of human redemption, which is founded on the veracity of Christ, and becomes, with lapsing years, more beautiful with the white radiance of an ennobling spirituality.

Whiting, William (1825-1878), wrote The Hymn of the U. S. Navy in 1860, entitled Eternal Father, Strong to Save, st. 1:

Eternal Father, strong to save,
Whose arm doth bind the restless wave,
Who bid'st the mighty ocean deep
Its own appointed limits keep,
O, hear us when we cry to Thee
For those in peril on the sea!

Huxley, Thomas Henry (May 4, 1825-June 29, 1895), was an English naturalist. Though he strongly propounded the theory of evolution, he expressed:

The Bible has been the Magna Charta of the poor and oppressed. The human race is not in a position to dispense with it.

Logan, John Alexander (February 9, 1826-December 26, 1886), was a Major-General during the Civil War. He served with General Grant at Vicksburg, Mississippi and with General Sherman on his march through Georgia to the sea. He was elected a U. S. Representative from Illinois, 1858; and a U. S. Senator, 1871-86. In 1884, he was a candidate for the Republican Presidential nomination.

On Decoration Day, 1886, in an oration at Riverside Park in New York, John Logan said:

But the beautiful ceremonies of love and remembrance, now so universally performed with flowers, came to the fullest expansion through the growth of the Christian religion. Branches of palms were thrown in the path of our Saviour as He entered Jerusalem. The crucified Christ received a crown of thorns from His executioners, but flowers strewn by unseen hands exhaled their fragrance around the cave where His body was laid.

Warner, Anna Bartlett (1827-January 22, 1915), in 1858 wrote The Love of Jesus:

Jesus loves me - this I know,
For the Bible tells me so.

Luce, Stephen Bleecker (March 25, 1827-July 28, 1917), served as U.S. Navy Rear Admiral, 1885, and U.S. Navy Commodore, 1881. During the Civil War, he commanded the monitor Nantucket; the frigate Wabash; the double-ender Sonoma; as well as the Canadaigua; and the Pontiac. Stephen Bleecker Luce founded the U.S. Naval War College at Newport, Rhode Island, considered the highest educational institution in the U.S. Navy. In 1884, as the first president of the college, Stephen Bleecker Luce stated:

Surely seamen are worthy to appear in your "Cloud of Witnesses." Not only did our Saviour consort with the seamen of Galilee, but there are many examples in history of noted naval heroes who exhibited the highest Christian virtues. I wish to be counted among this great company of believers in the divinity of Christ, and in the inspiration of all Scripture.

Lister, Joseph, 1st Baron (April 5, 1827-February 10, 1912), was an English surgeon who pioneered "antiseptic surgery," by the application of chemical disinfectants. In 1865, he introduced the use of carbolic acid. He was the founder of the Lister Institute of Preventive Medicine in London. He also served as the President of the British Association and the Royal Society. Lord Lister, who was of Quaker background, stated:

I am a believer in the fundamental doctrines of Christianity.

Wallace, Lewis "Lew" (April 10, 1827-1905), was a Major-General in the Civil War, a diplomat and the author of the novel, Ben-Hur, 1880. He became the Governor of New Mexico, 1878-81; and served as the U.S. minister to Turkey, 1881-85.

On February 2, 1893, he wrote in the Youth Companion:

At that time (1875), speaking candidly, I was not in the least influenced by religious sentiment. I had no conviction about God and Christ. I neither believed nor disbelieved them....

I had been listening to a discussion which involved such elemental points as God, Heaven, life hereafter, Jesus Christ, and His Divinity. Trudging on in the dark, alone, except as one's thoughts may be company, good or bad, a sense of the importance of the theme struck me for the first time with a force both singular and persistent. I was ashamed of myself, and make haste now to declare that mortification of pride I then endured, or, if it be preferred, the punishment of spirit, ended in a resolution to study the whole matter, if only for the gratification there might be in having convictions of one kind or another.

Forthwith a number of practical suggestions assailed me. How could I conduct the study? Delve into theology? I shuddered... There were the sermons and commentaries. The very thought of them overwhelmed me with an idea of the shortness of life. No, I would read the Bible and the four Gospels. A lawyer of fifteen or twenty years of practice attains a confidence peculiar in his mental muscularity, so to speak...

The manuscript in my desk ended with the birth of Christ; why not make it the first book of a volume, and go on to His death? I halted - there was light!... I had my opening; it was the birth of Christ. Could anything be more beautiful? As a mere story, the imagination of man has conceived nothing more crowded with poetry, mystery, and incidents, pathetic and sublime, nothing sweeter with human interest, nothing so nearly a revelation of God in person.

So, too, I saw a fitting conclusion. Viewed purely and professionally as a climax or catastrophe to be written up to, the final scene of the last act of the tragedy, what could be more stupendous than the Crucifixion?... Wanting a connecting thread for the whole story - that given to Christ the Child and that given to Christ the Saviour, I kept Belthasar alive to the end....

I determined to withhold the reappearance of the Saviour until the very last hours. Meanwhile, He should always be coming - today I would have Him, as it were, just over the hill yonder - tomorrow He will be here, and then tomorrow.... Finally when He was come, I would be religiously careful that every word He uttered should be a literal quotation from one of His sainted biographers....

The name "Ben-Hur" was chosen because it was biblical, and easily spelled, printed and pronounced. As this article is in the nature of confessions, here is one which the readers of the Youth's Companion may excuse, and accept at the same time as a fitting conclusion: Long before I was through with my book I became a believer in God and Christ.

Tolstoi, Leo Nikolaeovich (September 9, 1828-November 20, 1910), was a Russian author, playwright and writer. He wrote in War and Peace, 1865-69, book XIV, chapter 18:

For us, with the rule of right and wrong given us by Christ, there is nothing for which we have no standard. And there is no greatness where there is not simplicity, goodness and truth.

Leo Tolstoi wrote:

Christianity, with its doctrine of humility, of forgiveness, of love, is incompatible with the state, with its haughtiness, its violence, its punishment, its wars.

In describing President Abraham Lincoln after his death, Count Leo Tolstoi, declared him:

A Christ in miniature.

Randall, Samuel Jackson (October 10, 1828-April 13, 1890), was a U.S. Representative, who served twice as the Speaker of the House. He stated in the Washington Papers:

Gentlemen, Christianity is true. The man who doubts it discredits his own intelligence. I have examined this matter for myself.

I know that God has given me influence among my fellow men, and as I have a prospect of recovery I want henceforth to use the influence of my example on the side of Christianity.

Blaine, James Gillespie (January 31, 1830-January 27, 1893), was the Secretary of State under Presidents James Garfield and Benjamin Harrison; a U.S. Representative, 1862-75; the Speaker of the House, 1869-75; and elected a U.S. Senator in 1876. James Gillespie Blaine was the Republican Presidential candidate in 1884, and would have been the President instead of Grover Cleveland if he would have received just 1000 more votes in the State of New York. In Columbus and Columbia, a Pictorial History of the Man and the Nation, the Hon. James G. Blaine wrote:

No proverb ever supplanted the patience of Job or the wisdom of Solomon. . . . Moses has never been surpassed in statesmanship.

A scientific theology is pointing out the footprints of the Creator to common sense. The brotherhood of man, the Fatherhood of God, is becoming the corner-stone of religion, as revealed in Christ, and as clearly traced in human history.

Arthur, Chester Alan (October 5, 1830-November 18, 1886), was the 21st President of the United States, 1881-85; Vice-President under James A. Garfield, 1881, assuming the Presidency upon Garfield's assassination; Collector of Customs at the Port of New York, 1871-78, appointed by President Grant; Counsel to the New York City Tax Commission, 1869; Quartermaster General of New York State during the Civil War, 1861-62; Inspector General of Union Troops, 1862; married Ellen Lewis Herndon, 1859; participated in first Republican State convention at Saratoga, 1856; abolitionist lawyer, 1853-61, earning publicity for defending the rights of Blacks; admitted to bar, 1853; Principal in Cohoes, N.Y., 1852; principal and teacher of an academy at North Pownall, Bennington County, Vermont, 1851-52; graduated from Union College, 1848; and son of Rev. William Arthur, a Baptist minister who emigrated from Ireland. Chester Alan Arthur's Presidential term spanned the period when international time zones were set, New York and Chicago were connected by telephone lines, and bank robber Jesse James was killed.

On Thursday, September 22, 1881, in an address given upon assuming the Presidency after President Garfield's death, President Chester A. Arthur stated:

For the fourth time in the history of the Republic its Chief Magistrate has been removed by death. All hearts are filled with grief and horror at the hideous crime which has darkened our land, and the memory of the murdered President. . . .

Summoned to these high duties and responsibilities and profoundly conscious of their magnitude and gravity, I assume the trust imposed by the Constitution, relying for aid on Divine Guidance and the virtue, patriotism, and intelligence of the American people.

On September 22, 1881, President Chester A. Arthur issued a National Day of Humiliation and Mourning:

Whereas in His inscrutable wisdom it has pleased God to remove from us the illustrious head of the nation, James A. Garfield, late President of the United States; and

Whereas it is fitting that the deep grief which fills all hearts should manifest itself with one accord toward the Throne of Infinite Grace, and that we should bow before the Almighty and seek from Him that consolation in our affliction and that sanctification of our loss which He is able and willing to vouchsafe:

Now, therefore, in obedience to sacred duty and in accordance with the desire of the people, I, Chester A. Arthur, President of the United States of America, do hereby appoint Monday next, the 26th day of September - on which day the remains of our honored and beloved dead will be consigned to their last resting place on earth - to be observed throughout the United States as a day of humiliation and mourning;

And I earnestly recommend all the people to assemble on that day in their respective places of divine worship, there to render alike their tribute of sorrowful submission to the will of Almighty God and of reverence and love for the memory and character of our late Chief Magistrate.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, the 22d day of September, A. D. 1881, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and sixth. Chester A. Arthur.

By the President: James G. Blaine, Secretary of State.

On Friday, November 4, 1881, President Chester A. Arthur issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer:

It has long been the pious custom of our people, with the closing of the year, to look back upon the blessings brought to them in the changing course of the seasons and to return solemn thanks to the All-Giving Source from whom they flow. And although at this period, when the falling leaf admonishes us that the time of our sacred duty is at hand, our nation still lies in the shadow of a great bereavement, and the mourning which has filled our hearts still finds its sorrowful expression toward the God before whom we but lately bowed in grief and supplication, yet the countless benefits which have showered upon us during the past twelvemonth call for our fervent gratitude and make it fitting that we should rejoice with thankfulness that the Lord in His infinite mercy has most signally favored our country and our people.

Peace without and prosperity within have been vouchsafed to us, no pestilence has visited our shores, the abundant privileges of freedom which our fathers left us in their wisdom are still our increasing heritage; and if in parts of our vast domain sore affliction has visited our brethren in their forest homes, yet even this calamity has been tempered and in a manner sanctified by the generous compassion for the sufferers which has been called forth throughout our land. For all these things it is meet that the voice of the nation should go up to God in devout homage.

Wherefore, I, Chester A. Arthur, President of the United States, do recommend that all the people observe Thursday, the 24th day of November instant, as a day of national thanksgiving and prayer, by ceasing, so far as may be, from their secular labors and meeting in their several places of worship, there to join in ascribing honor and praise to Almighty God, whose goodness has been so manifest in our history and in our lives, and offering earnest prayers that His bounties may continue to us and to our children.

In witness whereof I have set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 4th day of November, A.D. 1881, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and sixth. Chester A. Arthur.

By the President: James G. Blaine, Secretary of State.

On Tuesday, December 6, 1881, in his First Annual Message to Congress, President Chester A. Arthur stated:

For these manifestations of His favor we owe to Him who holds our destiny in His hands the tribute of our grateful devotion. To that mysterious exercise of His will which has taken from us the loved and illustrious citizen who was but lately the head of the nation we bow in sorrow and submission. . . .

It is desirable that our cordial relations with Russia should be strengthened by proper engagements assuring to peaceable Americans who visit the Empire the consideration which is due to them as citizens of a friendly state. This is especially needful with respect to American Israelites, whose classification with the native Hebrew has evoked energetic remonstrances. . . .

The insecurity of life and property in many parts of Turkey has given rise to correspondence with the Porte looking particularly to the better protection of American missionaries in the Empire. The condemned murderer of the eminent missionary Dr. Justin W. Parsons has not yet been executed, although this Government has repeatedly demanded that exemplary justice be done. . . .

The treatise which forbid the participation of citizens or vessels of the United States in the opium trade will doubtless receive your approval. They will attest the sincere interest which our people and Government feel in the commendable efforts of the Chinese Government to put a stop to this demoralizing and destructive traffic. . . .

For many years the Executive, in his annual message to Congress, has urged the necessity of stringent legislation for the suppression of polygamy in the Territories, and especially in the Territory of Utah. The existing statute for the punishment of this odious crime, so revolting to the moral and religious sense of Christendom, has been persistently and contemptuously violated ever since its enactment.

On May 2, 1882, from his Executive Mansion in Washington, D. C., President Chester A. Arthur wrote to the U. S. House of Representatives:

In answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 30th of January last, calling for correspondence respecting the condition of Israelites in Russia, I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State and its accompanying papers.

On October 25, 1882, President Chester A. Arthur issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer:

In conformity with a custom the annual observance of which is justly held in honor by this people, I, Chester A. Arthur, President of the United States, do hereby set apart Thursday, the 30th day of November next, as a day of public thanksgiving.

The blessings demanding our gratitude are numerous and varied. For the peace and amity which subsist between this Republic and all the nations of the world; for the freedom from internal discord and violence; for the increasing friendship between the different sections of the land; for liberty, justice, and constitutional government; for the devotion of the people to our free institutions and their cheerful obedience to mild laws; for the constantly increasing strength of the Republic while extending its privileges to fellow-men who come to us; for the improved means of internal communication and the increased facilities of intercourse with other nations; for the general prevailing health of the year; for the prosperity of all our industries, the liberal return for the mechanic's toil affording a market for the abundant harvests of the husbandman; for the preservation of the national faith and credit; for wise and generous provision to effect the intellectual and moral education of our youth; for the influence upon the conscience of a restraining and transforming religion, and for the joys of home - for these and for many other blessings we should give thanks.

Wherefore I do recommend that the day above designated be observed throughout the country as a day of national thanksgiving and prayer, and that the people, ceasing from their daily labors and meeting in accordance with their several forms of worship draw near to the throne of Almighty God, offering to Him praise and gratitude for the manifold goodness which He has vouchsafed to us and praying that His blessings and His mercies may continue.

And I do further recommend that the day thus appointed be made a special occasion for deeds of kindness and charity to the suffering and the needy, so that all who dwell within the land may rejoice and be glad in this season of national thanksgiving.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 25th day of October, A.D. 1882, and of the Independence of the United States one hundred and seventh. Chester A. Arthur.

Secretary of State.

On December 4, 1882, in his Second Annual Message to Congress, President Chester A. Arthur stated:

Our long-established friendliness with Russia has remained unshaken. It has prompted me to proffer the earnest counsels of this Government that measures by adopted for suppressing the proscription which the Hebrew race in that country has lately suffered. It has not transpired that any American citizen has been subjected to arrest or injury, but our courteous remonstrance has nevertheless been courteously received. There is reason to believe that the time is not far distant when Russia will be able to secure toleration to all faiths within her borders....

The closing year has been replete with blessings, for which we owe to the Giver of All Good our reverent acknowledgement.

On Friday, October 26, 1883, President Chester A. Arthur issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving:

In furtherance of the custom of this people at the closing of each year to engage, upon a day set apart for that purpose, in a special festival of praise to the Giver of All Good, I, Chester A. Arthur, President of the United States, do hereby designate Thursday, the 29th day of November next, as a day of national thanksgiving.

The year which is drawing to an end has been replete with evidences of Divine Goodness. The prevalence of health, the fullness of the harvests, the stability of peace and order, the growth of fraternal feeling, the spread of intelligence and learning, the continued enjoyment of civil and religious liberty - all these and countless other blessings are cause for reverent rejoicing.

I do therefore recommend that on the day above appointed the people rest from their accustomed labors and, meeting in their several places of worship, express their devout gratitude to God that He hath dealt so bountifully with this nation and pray that His grace and favor abide with it forever.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 26th day of October, A.D. 1883, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and eighth. Chester A. Arthur.

By the President: Fredk. T. Frelinghuysen,
Secretary of State.

On February 8, 1884, from his Executive Mansion in Washington, D.C., President Chester A. Arthur wrote:

General William T. Sherman, General of the Army, having this day reached the age of 64 years, is, in accordance with law, placed upon the retired list of the Army without reduction in his current pay and allowances. . . . The President deems this a fitting occasion to give expression in this manner to the gratitude felt toward General Sherman by his fellow-citizens, and to the hope that Providence may grant him many years of health and happiness in the relief from the active duties of his profession.

On November 7, 1884, President Chester A. Arthur issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving:

The season in which when it is the yearly wont of this people to observe a day appointed for that purpose by the President as an especial occasion for thanksgiving unto God. Now, therefore, in recognition of this hallowed custom, I, Chester A. Arthur, President of the United States, do hereby designate as such day of general thanksgiving Thursday, the 27th day of this present November.

And I do recommend that throughout the land the people, ceasing from their accustomed occupations, do then keep holiday at their several homes and their several places of worship, and with heart and voice pay reverent acknowledgement to the Giver of All Good for the countless blessings wherewith He hath visited this nation.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 7th day of November, A. D. 1884, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and ninth. Chester A. Arthur.

Secretary of State.

President Chester A. Arthur proclaimed:

Heaven save us.

Howard, Oliver Otis (November 8, 1830-1909), was a Union General during the Civil War. He served as Superintendent of West Point Academy, and was appointed by President Lincoln to lead the Freedmen's Bureau, assisting former slaves after the war, 1866-72. In 1867, he founded Howard University for freed slaves, serving as its president, 1869-73, and later founded Lincoln Memorial University, Cumberland Gap, Tennessee. General Oliver Otis Howard, whose understanding of the Gospel created controversy when he integrated a church, also served as the Chairman of the American Tract Society. He was known by his soldiers as the "Old Prayer Book," as he never drank, smoke or swore. In 1869, as Superintendent of West Point, he personally presented each incoming cadet with a Bible, initiating the practice.

In 1863, Major-General Oliver Otis Howard addressed the officers and troops of the 127th Pennsylvania Volunteers:

I am glad to see so many of you out to hear preaching this Sabbath morning, and I would to God, that all the men of my command were true followers of Christ Jesus, the Lord. Soldiers, allow me to express, with your chaplain, the sincere desire of my heart, that we may meet at the right hand of the Great Judge in that day, which he has described to us.

Major-General Oliver Otis Howard declared:

I go to the Scriptures daily for spiritual food, and have done so for thirty-five years. God, as revealed to me in the crucified, the risen, and the ascended Christ, meets all my personal wants.

At a Union camp chapel service, a missionary in the Christian Commission recorded General Howard's message:

The General spoke of the Saviour, his love for Him and his peace in His service, as freely and simply as he could have spoken in his own family circle.

Chester County, New York (August 23, 1831), as related in The New York Spectator, reported that a judge refused to admit the evidence of a man who declared he did not believe in God, on the grounds that the witness had destroyed beforehand all confidence of the court in his testimony. The newspaper explained:

The court of commons pleas of Chester county (New York), a few days since rejected a witness who declared his disbelief in the existence of God. The presiding judge remarked, that he had not before been aware that there was a man living who did not believe in the existence of God; that this belief constituted the sanction of all testimony in a court of justice: and that he knew of no cause in a Christian country, where a witness had been permitted to testify without such belief.

Garfield, James Abram (November 19, 1831-September 19, 1881), was the 20th President of the United States, 1881-81; assassinated after serving only four months, being the fourth President to die in office; elected U. S. Senator, 1880, but declined to serve as he was nominated to run for President; U. S. Representative, 1863-80, taking the position at the request of Abraham Lincoln; House Minority Leader, 1876; Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, 1871; Republican Chairman; Major General in the Union Army, 1863, fighting the Confederate forces at Chickamauga; Brigadier General, commanding brigade at Shiloh, 1862; promoted to Colonel, 1861, defeating Confederate forces at Middle Creek, Kentucky, 1862; Lieutenant Colonel in Ohio Volunteers, 1861; Ohio State Senator, 1859-61; admitted to bar, 1860; married Lucretia Rudolph, 1858; successfully debated Englishman John Denton, refuting his evolutionary arguments, 1858, then launched a lecture tour speaking on "Geology and Religion"; President of Hiram College, 1857-61, chosen at the age of 26; graduated from Williams College, 1856; and teacher at the Western Reserve Eclectic Institute, 1852. In addition to being strongly anti-slavery, James A. Garfield was a member of the Disciples of Christ, and occasionally preached a sermon for them.

On March 4, 1850, James A. Garfield wrote in his journal of his conversion at the age of eighteen:

Today I was buried with Christ in baptism and arose to walk in newness of life.

Shortly after his conversion, young Garfield became a teacher. In his diary he recorded a description of the school:

Our little schoolhouse was filled to overflowing. The cause of God is prospering. In this place, 17 have made the good confession and are rejoicing in the hope of eternal life. Thanks be to God for his goodness. By the help of God I'll praise my Maker while I've breath.

While a student at Williams College, James Garfield, along with other students, climbed one of the high peaks seven miles distant, on "Mountain Day." The surrounding scenery was enough to awaken religious awe. Just then young Garfield broke the silence:

Boys, it is a habit of mine to read a chapter in the Bible every evening with my absent mother. Shall I read aloud?

The little company assented; and, drawing from his pocket a well-worn Testament, he read in soft, rich tones the chapter which his mother in Ohio was reading at the same time, and then he called on a classmate, who was with him on the mountain top, to pray.

James Abram Garfield planned to become a sailor, but illness forced him to change his plans. He explained:

Two years ago I was taken with the ague in Cleveland. When I consider the sequel of my history thus far, I can see the providence of God in a striking manner. Two years ago I had become ripe for ruin. On the canal...ready to drink in every species of vice, and with the ultimate design of going on the ocean...

I was taken sick; unable to labor, went to school two terms thus cultivating my moral and intellectual facilities, took a school in the winter, and greatest of all, obeyed the gospel. Thus by the providence of God I am what I am and not a sailor. I thank Him.

On Saturday, April 15, 1865, the day after President Lincoln was shot, Representative James Garfield spoke from a balcony of the Exchange Building on New York's Wall Street to an angry mob, turning them aside from their intentions to seek vengeance on the neighboring headquarters of the Democratic New York World:

Fellow citizens! Clouds and darkness are around Him. His pavilion is dark waters and thick clouds of the skies! Justice and judgment are the establishment of His throne! Mercy and truth shall go before His face. Fellow citizens! God reigns and the Government at Washington still lives!

In 1871, James A. Garfield described the Chancellor of the newly united German Empire, Otto Eduard Leopold von Bismarck (1815-1898):

I am struck with the fact that Bismarck, the great statesman of Germany, probably the foremost man in Europe today, stated as an unquestioned principle, that the support, the defense, and propagation of the Christian Gospel is the central object of the German government.

On Tuesday, July 4, 1876, as the U. S. Representative chairing the Committee on Appropriations, James Abram Garfield delivered a speech commemorating the one hundredth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence:

Now more than ever before, the people are responsible for the character of their Congress. If that body be ignorant, reckless, and corrupt, it is because the people tolerate ignorance, recklessness, and corruption. If it be intelligent, brave, and pure, it is because the people demand these high qualities to represent them in the national legislature....

If the next centennial does not find us a great nation...it will be because those who represent the enterprise, the culture, and the morality of the nation do not aid in controlling the political forces.

In 1876, James A. Garfield concluded a letter to a friend, showing his submission to the death of his little son, Edward:

In the hope of the Gospel, which is so precious in this hour of affliction, I am affectionately your brother in Christ.

In 1880, James A. Garfield was elected U. S. Senator from Ohio, but before he could take office he was nominated for President in a truly unusual turn of circumstances. He was asked to give the nomination speech for John Sherman at the opening of the Republican Convention in 1880, but his speech received such a standing ovation, that the convention decided to nominate him instead of John Sherman. He went on to be elected the 20th President of the United States.

On Friday, March 4, 1881, in his Inaugural Address, President James Abram Garfield stated:

Before continuing the onward march let us pause on this height for a moment to strengthen our faith and renew our hope....

The emancipated race has already made remarkable progress. With unquestioning devotion to the Union, with a patience and gentleness not born of fear, they have "followed the light as God gave them to see the light."...

Let our people find a new meaning in the divine oracle which declares that "a little child shall lead them," for our own little children will soon control the destinies of the Republic. My countrymen, we do not now differ in our judgement concerning the controversies of past generations, and fifty years hence our children will not be divided in their opinions concerning our controversies. They will surely bless their fathers and their fathers' God that the Union was preserved, that slavery was overthrown, and that both races were made equal before the law....

Above all, upon our efforts to promote the welfare of this great people and their Government I reverently invoke the support and blessings of Almighty God.

President James A. Garfield wrote:

The world's history is a Divine poem, of which the history of every nation is a canto, and every man a word. Its strains have been pealing along down the centuries, and though there have been mingled the discords of warring cannons and dying men, yet to the Christian philosopher and historian - the humble listener - there has been a Divine melody running through the song which speaks of hope and halcyon days to come.

On Saturday, July 2, 1881, after having been in office only 4 months, President Garfield was shot in the back while in the Washington, D.C., railroad station. He died a few months later on September 19, 1881. On September 20, 1881, from Long Branch, N.J., Secretary of State James G. Blaine sent an announcement to James Russell Lowell, U.S. Minister in London:

James A. Garfield, President of the United States, died at Elberon, N.J., last night at ten minutes before 11 o'clock. For nearly eighty days he suffered great pain, and during the entire period exhibited extraordinary patience, fortitude, and Christian resignation. Fifty millions of people stand as mourners by his bier.

On February 27, 1882, Secretary of State James G. Blaine delivered a eulogy on President Garfield:

With unfailing tenderness he took leave of life. Above the demoniac hiss of the assassin's bullet he heard the voice of God. With simple resignation he bowed to the Divine decree.

Belknap, George Eugene (1832-1903), was a U.S. Navy Commodore, 1885; and Rear Admiral, 1889. He declared:

No nation can materially enlarge her borders and rise to great ascendancy except on the basis of Christianity and its revealed Word. In such ferment of unrest, such tumult of change, the old religions will surely give way to the power of the Cross.

The Light of the World will irradiate those fair lands. The utterly indifferent temperature of the Chinese conduces to this ambition of Japan, and so surely as she accomplishes her lofty ambition, so surely will the Cross of our Saviour be uplifted over it all in all the significance of its power.

As an eye-witness, I assert it to be a fact beyond contradiction that there is not an official, or any other person, from emperors, down to the lowest coolies in China and Japan, who are not indebted every day to the work of our American Missionaries.

Walker, William (1833), of the Wyandot Indian tribe, wrote a letter to the Christian Advocate & Journal. He described his encounter with four Indians, one of the Flathead tribe and three of the Nez Percés tribe. They had traveled 3,000 miles to St. Louis, Missouri, because they heard that:

The white people away toward the rising sun had been put in possession of the true mode of worshipping the Great Spirit; they had a Book containing directions.

Harrison, Benjamin (August 20, 1833-March 13, 1901), was the 23rd President of the United States, 1889-93; married Mary Scott Lord Dimmick, 1896, after the death of his first wife; U.S. Senator, 1881-87; Chairman of the Indiana delegations to the Republican National Conventions, 1880, 1884; member of the Mississippi River Commission, 1879, appointed by President Hayes; Brigadier General, 1865, during the Civil War; Colonel of the 70th Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, 1862, taking part in the Atlanta campaign with General Sherman; appointed elder of the Presbyterian Church, 1861; Indiana State Supreme Court Reporter, 1860-62; Secretary of the Republican State Central Committee of Indiana, 1858; City Attorney, 1857-61; Commissioner for the Court of Claims, 1855; admitted to the bar, 1853; married Caroline "Carrie" Lavinia Scott, 1853; graduated from Miami University, Ohio, 1852; and grandson of the 9th President, William Henry Harrison, and great-grandson of the signer of the Declaration of Independence, Benjamin Harrison.

While Colonel of the Seventieth Indiana Infantry Regiment during the Civil War, Benjamin Harrison wrote to his wife, Carrie:

I hope you all remember us at home and that many prayers go up to God daily for my Regiment and for me. Ask Him for me in prayer, my dear wife, first that He will enable me to bear myself as a good soldier of Jesus Christ; second that He will give me valor and skill to conduct myself so as to honor my country and my friends, and lastly, if consistent with His holy will, I may be brought "home again" to the dear loved ones, if not that the rich consolation of His grace may be made sufficient for men and for those who survive. . . .

After the war, Benjamin Harrison resumed serving as a reporter for the Supreme Court. He then became a successful lawyer, being a member of the firm Porter, Harrison and Fishback, and later of Harrison, Miller and Elam. A strong Republican party leader, he campaigned for President Grant in 1868 and 1872; and President Garfield, 1880. In 1881, Benjamin Harrison was elected a U.S. Senator from Indiana, and in 1888 he was nominated for the Presidency at the Republican National Convention in Chicago.

On Monday, March 4, 1889, in his Inaugural Address, President Benjamin Harrison stated:

Entering thus solemnly into covenant with each other, we may reverently invoke and confidently extend the favor and help of Almighty God - that He will give to me wisdom, strength, and fidelity, and to our people a spirit of fraternity and a love of righteousness and peace. . . .

No other people have a government more worthy of their respect and love or a land so magnificent in extent, so pleasant to look upon, and so full of generous suggestion to enterprise and labor.

God has placed upon our head a diadem and has laid at our feet power and wealth beyond definition or calculation.

But we must not forget that we take these gifts upon the condition that justice and mercy shall hold the reins of power and the upward avenues of hope shall be free to all people.

On Thursday, April 4, 1889, President Benjamin Harrison issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Prayer and Thanksgiving, in honor of the Centennial of George Washington's Presidential Inauguration:

A hundred years have passed since the Government which our forefathers founded was formally organized. At noon on the 30th day of April, 1789, in the city of New York, and in the presence of an assemblage of the heroic men whose patriotic devotion had led the colonies to victory and independence, George Washington took the oath of office as Chief Magistrate of the new-born Republic. This impressive act was preceded at 9 o'clock in the morning in all the churches of the city by prayer for God's blessing on the Government and its first President.

The centennial of this illustrious event in our history has been declared a general holiday by act of Congress, to the end that the people of the whole country may join in commemorative exercises appropriate to the day.

In order that the joy of the occasion may be associated with a deep thankfulness in the minds of the people for all our blessings in the past and a devout supplication to God for their gracious continuance in the future, the representatives of the religious creeds, both Christian and Hebrew, have memorialized the Government to designate an hour for prayer and thanksgiving on that day.

Now, therefore, I, Benjamin Harrison, President of the United States of America, in response to this pious and reasonable request, do recommend that on Tuesday, April 30, at the hour of 9 o'clock in the morning, the people of the entire country repair to their respective places of divine worship to implore the favor of God that the blessings of liberty, prosperity, and peace may abide with us as a people, and that His hand may lead us in the paths of righteousness and good deeds.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed.

Done in the city of Washington, this 4th day of April, A.D. 1889, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and thirteenth. Benj. Harrison.

On Friday, June 7, 1889, from his Executive Mansion, President Benjamin Harrison wrote:

In November, 1862, President Lincoln quoted the words of Washington to sustain his own views, and announced in a general order that - necessity."

The truth so concisely stated can not be too faithfully regarded, and the pressure to ignore it is far less now than in the midst of war. To recall the kindly and considerate spirit of the orders issued by these great men in the most trying times of our history, and to promote contentment and efficiency, the President directs that Sunday-morning inspection will be merely of the dress and general appearance, without arms; and the more complete inspection under arms, with all men present, as required in paragraph 950, Army Regulations, 1889, will take place on Saturday. Benj. Harrison.

By the President: Ronald Proctor, Secretary of War.

On November 1, 1889, President Benjamin Harrison issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer:

A highly favored people, mindful of their dependence on the bounty of Divine Providence, should seek fitting occasion to testify gratitude and ascribe praise to Him who is the author of their many blessings. It behooves us, then, to look back with thankful hearts over the past year and bless God for His infinite mercy in vouchsafing to our land enduring peace, to our people freedom from pestilence and famine, to our husbandmen abundant harvests, and to them that labor a recompense of their toil.

Now, therefore, I, Benjamin Harrison, President of the United States of America, do earnestly recommend that Thursday, the 28th day of this present month of November, be set apart as a day of national thanksgiving and prayer, and that the people of our country, ceasing from the cares and labors of their working day, shall assemble in their respective places of worship and give thanks to God, who has prospered us on our way and made our paths the paths of peace, beseeching Him to bless the day to our present and future good, making it truly one of thanksgiving for each reunited home circle as for the nation at large.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

On December 3, 1889, from his Executive Mansion in Washington, President Benjamin Harrison wrote his First Annual Message:

The recommendations of this international conference of enlightened statesmen will doubtless have the considerate attention of Congress and its cooperation in the removal of unnecessary barriers to beneficial intercourse between the nations of America.

But while the commercial results which it is hoped will follow this conference are worthy of pursuit and of the great interests they have excited, it is believed that the crowning benefit will be found in the better securities which may be devised for the maintenance of peace among all American nations and the settlement of all contentions by methods that a Christian civilization can approve.

On February 10, 1890, in a Proclamation regarding the Sioux Nation of Indians in Dakota, President Benjamin Harrison stated:

It is therein provided that if any land in said Great Sioux Reservation is occupied and used by any religious society at the date of said act for the purpose of missionary or educational work among the Indians, whether situated outside of or within the limits of any of the separate reservations, the same, not exceeding 160 acres in any one tract, shall be granted to said society for the purposes and upon the terms and conditions therein named.

On November 8, 1890, President Benjamin Harrison issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Prayer and Thanksgiving:

By the grace and favor of Almighty God the people of this nation have been led to the closing days of the passing year, which has been full of the blessings of peace and the comforts of plenty. Bountiful compensation has come to us for the work of our minds and of our hands in every department of human industry.

Now, therefore, I, Benjamin Harrison, President of the United States of America, do hereby appoint Thursday, the 27th day of the present month of November, to be observed as a day of prayer and thanksgiving; and I do invite the people upon that day to cease from their labors, to meet in their accustomed houses of worship, and to join in rendering gratitude and praise to our beneficent Creator for the rich blessings He has granted to us as a nation and in invoking the continuance of His protection and grace for the future. I commend to my fellow-citizens the privilege of remembering the poor, the homeless, and the sorrowful. Let us endeavor to merit the promised recompense of charity and the gracious acceptance of our praise.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

On November 13, 1891, President Benjamin Harrison issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Joyful Thanksgiving:

It is a very glad incident of the marvelous prosperity which has crowned the year now drawing to a close that its helpful and reassuring touch has been felt by all our people. It has been as wide as our country, and so special that every home has felt its comforting influence. It is too great to be the work of man's power and too particular to be the device of his mind. To God, the beneficent and all-wise, who makes the labors of men to be fruitful, redeem their losses by His grace, and the measure of whose giving is as much beyond the thoughts of man as it is beyond his deserts, the praise and gratitude of the people of this favored nation are justly due.

Now, therefore, I, Benjamin Harrison, President of the United States of America, do hereby appoint Thursday, the 26th day of November present, to be a day of joyful thanksgiving to God for the bounties of His providence, for the peace in which we are permitted to enjoy them, and for the preservation of those institutions of civil and religious liberty which He gave our fathers the wisdom to devise and establish and us the courage to preserve. Among the appropriate observances of the day are rest from toil, worship in the public congregations, the renewal of family ties about our American firesides, and thoughtful helpfulness toward those who suffer lack of the body or of the spirit.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 13th day of November, A.D. 1891, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and sixteenth. Benj. Harrison.

On Wednesday, December 9, 1891, in his Third Annual Message, President Benjamin Harrison commented:

This Government has found occasion to express in a friendly spirit, but with much earnestness, to the Government of the Czar its serious concern because of the harsh measures now being enforced against the Hebrews in Russia. By the revival of anti-semitic laws, long in abeyance, great numbers of those unfortunate people have been constrained to abandon their homes and leave the Empire by reason of the impossibility of finding subsistence within the pale to which it is sought to confine them. The immigration of these people to the United States - many other countries being closed to them - is largely increasing and is likely to assume proportions which may make it difficult to find home and employment for them here and to seriously affect the labor market. It is estimated that over 1,000,000 will be forced from Russia within a few years.

The Hebrew is never a beggar; he has always kept the law - life by toil - often under severe and oppressive civil restrictions. It is also true that no race, sect, or class has more fully cared for its own than the Hebrew race...

This consideration, as well as the suggestion of humanity, furnishes ample ground for the remonstrances which we have presented to Russia...

The Attorney General and also the Commissioners of the District of Columbia call attention to the defectiveness and inadequacy of the laws relating to crimes against chastity in the District of Columbia. A stringent code upon this subject has been provided by Congress for Utah, and it is a matter of surprise that the needs of this District should have been so long overlooked.

On January 5, 1892, from his Executive Mansion, President Benjamin Harrison wrote to the Senate and House of Representatives:

The famine prevailing in some of the Provinces of Russia is so severe and widespread as to have attracted the sympathetic interest of a large number of our liberal and favored people. In some of the great grain-producing States of the West movements have already been organized to collect flour and meal for the relief of these perishing Russian families, and the response has been such as to justify the belief that a ship's cargo can very soon be delivered at the seaboard through the generous cooperation of the transportation lines. It is most appropriate that a people whose storehouses have been so lavishly filled with all the fruits of the earth by the gracious favor of God should manifest their gratitude by large gifts to His suffering children in other lands.

On March 24, 1892, from his Executive Mansion, President Benjamin Harrison sent the request to Congress:

The parade of the survivors of our great armies [of the Civil War] upon Pennsylvania avenue will bring vividly back to us those joyful momentous days when the great victorious armies of the East and of the West marched through the streets of Washington in high parade and were received by our citizens with joyful acclaim. It seems to me that it will be highly appropriate for Congress suitably to aid in making this demonstration impressive and in extending to those soldiers whose lives a beneficent Providence has prolonged an opportunity to see in the security and peace, development and prosperity, which now so happily pervade the national capital the fruits of their sacrifice and valor.

On July 21, 1892, President Harrison stated in a Proclamation of the National Observance of the Four Hundredth Anniversary of the Discovery of America by Columbus:

Now, therefore, I, Benjamin Harrison, President of the United States of America, in pursuance of the aforesaid joint resolution, do hereby appoint Friday, October 21, 1892, the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Columbus, as a general holiday for the people of the United States. On that day let the people, so far as possible, cease from toil and devote themselves to such exercises as may best express honor to the discover and their appreciation of the great achievements of the four completed centuries of American life.

Columbus stood in his age as the pioneer of progress and enlightenment. The system of universal education is in our age the most prominent and salutary feature of the spirit of enlightenment, and it is peculiarly appropriate that the school be made by the people the center of the day's demonstration. Let the national flag float over every schoolhouse in the country and the exercises be such as shall impress upon our youth the patriotic duties of American citizenship.

In churches and in other places of assembly of the people let there be expressions of gratitude to Divine Providence for the devout faith of the discoverer and for the divine care and guidance which has directed our history and so abundantly blessed our people.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 21st day of July, A.D. 1892, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and seventeenth. Benj. Harrison.

By the President: John W. Foster, Secretary of State.

On November 4, 1892, President Benjamin Harrison issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving:

The gifts of God to our people during the past year have been so abundant and so special that the spirit of devout thanksgiving awaits not a call, but only the appointment of a day when it may have a common expression. He has stayed the pestilence at our door; He has given us more love for the free civil institutions in the creation of which His directing providence was so conspicuous; He has awakened a deeper reverence for law; He has widened our philanthropy by a call to succor the distress in other lands; He has blessed our schools and is bringing forward a patriotic and God-fearing generation to execute His great and benevolent designs for our country; He has given us great increase in material wealth and a wide diffusion of contentment and comfort in the homes of our people; He has given His grace to the sorrowing.

Wherefore, I, Benjamin Harrison, President of the United States, do call upon all our people to observe, as we have been wont, Thursday, the 24th day of this month of November, as a day of thanksgiving to God for His mercies and of supplication for His continued care and grace.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 4th day of November, 1892, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and seventeenth. Benj. Harrison.

By the President: John W. Foster, Secretary of State.

On January 18, 1893, from his Executive Mansion in Washington, D. C., President Benjamin Harrison wrote:

To the people of the United States:

The death of Rutherford B. Hayes, who was President of the United States from March 4, 1877, to March 4, 1881, at his home in Fremont, Ohio, at 11 p.m. yesterday, is an event the announcement of which will be received with very general and very sincere sorrow. His public service extended over many years and over a wide range of official duty. He was a patriotic citizen, a lover of the flag and of our free institutions, an industrious and conscientious civil officer, a soldier of dauntless courage, a loyal comrade and friend, a sympathetic and helpful neighbor, and the honored head of a happy Christian home.

President Benjamin Harrison, who was a Presbyterian, once wrote to his son, Russell Benjamin Harrison (1854-1936):

It is a great comfort to trust God - even if His providence is unfavorable. Prayer steadies one, when he is walking in slippery places - even if things asked for are not given.

Baring-Gould, Sabine (1834-1924), was an American songwriter. In 1864, during the critical period of the Civil War, he wrote a song underscoring the spiritual battle each individual is engaged in, entitled Onward, Christian Soldiers:

Onward, Christian soldiers,
Marching as to war,
With the Cross of Jesus
Going on before!

Acton, John Emerich Edward Dalberg, Lord (January 10, 1834-June 19, 1902), was an English historian. He was a member of the House of Commons, 1859-65; was editor of the journal Rambler, 1859-64. He served as Regius Professor of Modern History at Cambridge University and as editor of the massive Cambridge Modern History, 1899-1900. His works include: The History of Freedom in Antiquity, 1877; The History of Freedom in Christianity, 1877; and Democracy in Europe, 1878.

In 1877, Lord Acton declared concerning liberty:

That great political idea, sanctifying freedom and consecrating it to God, teaching men to treasure the liberties of others as their own, and to defend them for the love of justice and charity more than as a claim of right, has been the soul of what is great and good in the progress of the last two hundred years.

In a letter to Bishop Mandell Creighton, dated April 5, 1881, Lord Acton wrote:

All power tends to corrupt and absolute power corrupts absolutely.

Bartholdi, Frederic Auguste (April 2, 1834-October 4, 1904), was the French sculptor who designed and constructed The Statue of Liberty. Given by France to the United States, July 4, 1884, it has become a symbol of freedom throughout the world. The largest of its kind, the statue weighs 450,000 pounds and stands 305 feet above the base of the pedestal. It is supported by a steel structure built by Gustave Eiffel. Frederic Auguste Bartholdi wrote:

The statue was born for this place which inspired its conception. May God be pleased to bless my efforts and my work, and to crown it with success, the duration and the moral influence which it ought to have.

Browne, Charles Farrar (April 26, 1834-March 6, 1867) was an American writer and humorist. He wrote for the Cleveland Plain Dealer, where he created the popular character "Artemus Ward," a traveling showman. Writing as Artemus Ward, Browne composed satirical letters of comment on American life and politics. These contained intentional misspellings and puns which delighted readers. In 1859 Browne wrote for Vanity Fair, and in 1862 he published his work, Artemus Ward: His Book, in which he gave advice, such as:

Always live within your income, even if you have to borrow money to do it.

Charles Browne toured extensively speaking at pro-Union events. Abraham Lincoln was so taken by his essay, entitled, "Outrage," that he read it to his cabinet in 1862. Charles Browne stated:

We can't all be Washington, but we can all be patriots and behave ourselves in a humane and Christian manner.

Cockrell, Francis Marion (October 1, 1834-December 13, 1915), was a U.S. Senator from Missouri. In 1875, at the beginning of his five consecutive terms, 1875-1910, he stated:

Christianity is a reality, not an appearance. Were it a myth devised by cunning impostors, it would have come to naught before this. It has done more to fraternize the races than all human systems of religion together. The Bible is supreme over all books. Beside it there is none other. Its Divine truths meet the wants of a world-wide humanity.

Beaumont, Gustave de (1835), a French historian, published his work in Paris entitled, Marie ou l'Esclavage aux E'tas-Unis. In this work he documented his travels in America with Alexis de Tocqueville, May 1831-February 1832. He was commissioned by the French Government to study the American prisons, democracy, and religion.

In his work, Marie ou l'Esclavage aux E'tas-Unis, 1835, Gustave de Beaumont reported:

The principal established religious sects in North America are the Methodists, Anabaptists, Catholics, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Quakers or Friends, Universalists, Congregationalists, Unitarians, Dutch Reformed, German Reformed, Moravians, Evangelical Lutherans, etc.

The Anabaptists are divided into Calvinists, Dunkers, etc. The most populous Protestant group is that of the Methodists; it numbered 550,000 members at the beginning of the year 1834. There are no exact figures for the other communions.

Religion in America is not only a moral institution but also a political institution. All of the American constitutions exhort the citizens to practice religious worship as a safeguard both to good morals and to public liberties. In the United States, the law is never atheistic...

All of the American constitutions proclaim freedom of conscience and the liberty and equality of all the confessions.

American Quotations.txt

The constitution of Massachusetts proclaims the freedom of the various faiths in the sense that it does not wish to persecute any of them; but it recognizes within the state only Christians and protects only the Protestants.

Maryland's constitution also declares that all of the faiths are free, and that no one is forced to contribute to the maintenance of a particular church. However, it gives the legislature the right to establish a general tax, according to the circumstances, for the support of the Christian religion.

The constitution of Vermont recognizes only the Christian faiths, and says specifically that every congregation of Christians should celebrate the Sabbath or the Lord's Day, and observe the religious worship which seems to it most pleasing to the will of God, manifested by revelation.

Sometimes the American constitutions offer religious bodies some indirect assistance: thus, Maryland law declares that, to be admitted to public office, it is necessary to be a Christian. The Pennsylvania constitution requires that one believe in the existence of God and in a future life of punishment or rewards.

There is no political ceremony in America that does not begin with a pious invocation. I have seen a meeting of the Senate in Washington open with a prayer, and the anniversary festival of the Declaration of Independence consists, in the United States, of an entirely religious ceremony.

I have just indicated how the law, which recognizes neither the authority nor the existence of clergy, confirms the power of religion.

I shall add that the religious sects, which remain strangers to party activity, are far from showing themselves indifferent to political interests and to the government of the country.

They all take a lively interest in the maintenance of American institutions through the voice of their ministers in the sacred pulpit and even in the political assemblies. In America, Christian religion is always at the service of freedom.

It is a principle of the United States legislature that, to be good citizen, it is necessary to be religious; and it is a no less well-established rule that, to fulfill one's duty toward God, it is necessary to be a good citizen.

Although not all American state constitutions impose religious beliefs and the practice of faith as a condition of political privileges, there is not a single state where public opinion and the customs of the inhabitants do not forcefully constrain an obligation to these beliefs.

In general, anyone who adheres to one of the religious sects, whose number is immense in the United States, enjoys all of his social and political rights in peace.

But the man who would claim to have neither a church nor religious beliefs would not only be excluded from all civil employment and from all political offices, voluntary or salaried, but, furthermore, would be an object of moral persecution of all kinds.

No one would care to have any social relations with him, even less to contract family ties; no one would buy from him or sell to him. No one in the United States believes that a man without religion could be an honest man.

Twain, Mark (November 30, 1835-April 21, 1910), a river measurement meaning "two fathoms deep," was the pen name of Samuel Langhorne Clemens. Growing up along the Mississippi River in Hannibal, Missouri, he left school at age 12, when his father died. Becoming a printer's apprentice, he worked briefly for his brother Orion Clemens, who owned a newspaper. For the next several years, he was a "tramp printer," working and writing in St. Louis, New York City, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, and numerous smaller cities.

In 1857-61, as an apprentice Mississippi river pilot, he acquired his pen name from an old steamboat pilot who had died, named Isaiah Sellers, known for writing articles in a New Orleans newspaper and signing them "Mark Twain." The onset of the Civil War virtually halted all river traffic, so Twain joined the Confederate Army as a lieutenant. After two weeks' service, he managed to get himself discharged and headed out to Nevada to work for his brother Orion, who had become the Secretary to the Governor of the Nevada Territory. After a futile attempt at mining, he took a job, in 1862, as a reporter in Virginia City, Nevada, using the name "Mark Twain" for the first time.

After a few years, Mark Twain moved to San Francisco, where he wrote his first popular story entitled, "The Celebrated Jumping Frog of Calaveras County." He then began voyaging, particularly in the Mediterranean Sea and Palestine, where he wrote The Innocents Abroad. While on this trip, he fell in love with the picture of a companion's sister, Olivia Langdon of Elmira, New York. Immediately upon his return, he met and married her, and, under her encouragement, his writing style greatly improved.

In 1870, they moved from Buffalo, N.Y., to Hartford, Conn., where his attempt at a publishing and typesetting business failed. He paid off his debts by conducting a lecture tour across America, then moved to Europe. After several years, they returned back to the United States, settling in Redding, Conn. In later years, his increased public success was offset by the tragedy of nearly all his family members dying before him.

The many novels written by Mark Twain include: The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, 1884; The Adventures of Tom Sawyer, 1876; Life on the Mississippi, 1883; The Prince and the Pauper, 1882; A Connecticut Yankee at King Arthur's Court, 1889; Joan of Arc, 1896; and many more. In the midst of cynics who doubted the authenticity of Scripture, Mark Twain remarked:

If the Ten Commandments were not written by Moses, then they were written by another fellow of the same name.

In his work Innocents Abroad, 1869, which solidly established his reputation as a writer, Mark Twain wrote:

It is hard to make a choice of the most beautiful passage in a book which is so gemmed with beautiful passages as the Bible....

Who taught these ancient writers the simplicity of language, their felicity of expression, their pathos, and, above all, their faculty of sinking themselves entirely out of sight of the reader and making the narrative stand out alone and seem to tell itself? Shakespeare is always present when one reads his book; Macaulay is present when we follow the march of his stately sentences; but the Old Testament writers are hidden from view.

We dismounted on those shores which the feet of the Saviour had made holy ground.... We left Capernaum behind us. It was only a shapeless ruin. It bore no semblance to a town. But, all desolate and unpeopled as it was, it was illustrious ground. From it sprang that tree of Christianity whose broad arms overshadow so many distant lands today. Christ visited his old home at Nazareth, and saw His brothers Joses, Judas, James, and Simon....

Who wonders what passed in their minds when they saw this brother (who was only a brother to them, however He might be to others a mysterious stranger; who was a God, and had stood face to face with God above the clouds) doing miracles, with crowds of astonished people for witnesses?

One of the most astonishing things that has yet fallen under our observation is the exceedingly small portion of the earth from which sprang the new flourishing plant of Christianity. The longest journey our Saviour ever performed was from here to Jerusalem - about one hundred to one hundred and twenty miles.... Leaving out two or three short journeys, He spent His life, preaching His Gospel, and performing His miracles, within a compass no larger than an ordinary county of the United States....

In the starlight, Galilee has no boundaries but the broad compass of the heavens, and is a theatre meet for great events; meet for the birth of a religion able to save the world; and meet for the stately figure appointed to stand upon its stage and proclaim high decrees.

In The Adventures of Tom Sawyer, 1876, chapter 13, Mark Twain wrote:

There was no getting around the stubborn fact that taking sweetmeats was only "hooking," while taking bacon and hams and such valuables was plain simple stealing - and there was a command against that in the Bible. So they inwardly resolved that so long as they remained in the business, their piracies should not again be sullied with the crime of stealing.

In The Tragedy of Pudd'nhead Wilson, 1894, Mark Twain penned:

Adam and Eve had many advantages, but the principal one was that they escaped teething.

Adam was but human - this explains it all. He did not want the apple for the apple's sake, he wanted it because it was forbidden.

Whoever has lived long enough to find out what life is, knows how deep a debt of gratitude we owe to Adam, the first great benefactor of our race. He brought death into the world.

It is by the goodness of God that in our country we have those three unspeakably precious things: freedom of speech, freedom of conscience, and the prudence never to practice either of them.

Mark Twain quipped:

The calm confidence of a Christian with four aces.

When I was a boy of fourteen, my father was so ignorant I could hardly stand to have the old man around. But when I got to be twenty-one, I was astonished at how much the old man had learned in seven years.

From Albert Bigelow Paine's Mark Twain, 1912, Mark Twain is quoted as saying:

As out of place as a Presbyterian in Hell.

From Bernard DeVoto's Mark Twain in Eruption, 1940, Mark Twain is quoted as saying:

I believe that our Heavenly Father invented man because he was disappointed with the monkey.

Brooks, Phillips (December 13, 1835-January 23, 1893), was an American writer and speaker. He attended Harvard while James Russell Lowell, Oliver Wendell Holmes and Henry Wadsworth Longfellow taught there. He pastored in Philadelphia before becoming the rector of Trinity Church in Boston, and later the bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Massachusetts. In 1867, he wrote the song, O Little Town of Bethlehem:

O little town of Bethlehem!
How still we see thee lie;
Above thy deep and dreamless sleep
The silent stars go by;
Yet in thy dark streets shineth
The everlasting Light;
The hopes and fears of all the years
Are met in thee tonight.

In his sermon Going Up to Jerusalem, Phillips Brooks wrote:

Do not pray for easy lives. Pray to be stronger men! Do not pray for tasks equal to your powers. Pray for powers equal to your tasks.

Phillips Brooks reasoned:

I do not know how a man can be an American, even if he is not a Christian, and not catch something with regard to God's purpose as to this great land.

Texas Declaration of Independence (March 2, 1836):

UNANIMOUS DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE
BY THE DELEGATES OF THE PEOPLE OF TEXAS
IN GENERAL CONVENTION
AT THE TOWN OF WASHINGTON.
ON THE SECOND DAY OF MARCH, 1836.

When a government has ceased to protect the lives, liberty, and property of the people, from whom its legitimate powers are derived, and for the advancement of whose happiness it was instituted; and so far from being a guarantee for their inestimable and inalienable rights, becomes an instrument in the hands of evil rulers for their oppression....

In such a crisis... the inherent and inalienable right of the people to appeal to first principles, and take their political affairs into their own hands in extreme cases, enjoins it as a right towards themselves and a sacred obligation to their posterity to abolish such government, and create another in its stead, calculated to rescue them from impending dangers, and to secure their welfare and happiness....

The late changes made in the government by General Antonio Lopez Santa Ana, who having overturned the constitution of his country, now offers, as the cruel alternative, either abandon our homes acquired by so many privations, or submit to the most intolerable of all tyranny, the combined despotism of the sword and the priesthood....

It denies us the right of worshipping the Almighty according to the dictates of our own conscience, by the support of a National Religion, calculated to promote the temporal interest of its human functionaries, rather than the glory of the true and living God.

It has demanded us to deliver up our arms, which are essential to our defence - the rightful property of freemen - and formidable only to tyrannical governments....

It has, through its emissaries, incited the merciless savage, with the tomahawk and scalping knife, to massacre the inhabitants of our defenseless frontiers....

We, therefore, the delegates, with plenary powers, of the people of Texas... DECLARE, that our political connection with the Mexican nation has forever ended, and that the people of Texas, do now constitute a FREE, SOVEREIGN, and INDEPENDENT REPUBLIC...

Conscious of the rectitude of our intentions, we fearlessly and confidently commit the issue to the decision of the Supreme Arbiter of the destinies of nations.

Arkansas, State of (June 15, 1836), was the 25th State admitted to the Union. The Constitution of the State of Arkansas, adopted October 30, 1874, stated:

Preamble. We, the people of the State of Arkansas, grateful to Almighty God for the privilege of choosing our own form of government, for our civil and religious liberty, and desiring to perpetuate its blessings and secure the same to ourselves and posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution.

Article II, Section 24. All men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences.

Article II, Section 25. Religion, morality and knowledge being essential to good government, the General Assembly shall enact suitable laws to protect every religious denomination in the peaceable enjoyment of its own mode of public worship.

Article II, Section 26. No religious test shall ever be required of any person as a qualification to vote or hold office, nor shall any person be rendered incompetent to be a witness on account of his religious belief; but nothing herein shall be construed to dispense with oaths or affirmations.

Article XIX, Section 1. No person who denies the being of a God shall hold office in the civil departments of this State, nor be competent to testify as a witness in any court.

Article XIX, Section 14. No lottery shall be authorized by this State, nor shall the sale of lottery tickets be allowed.

Merritt, Wesley (June 16, 1836-1910), was a Major General in the Union Army during the Civil War. He was the superintendent of the U. S. Military Academy at West Point, 1882-87, and Commander of the first Philippine expedition to occupy Manila in August of 1898. He expressed:

The principles of life as taught in the Bible, the inspired Word, and exemplified in the matchless Life of Him "who spake as never man spake," are the rules of moral action which have resulted in civilizing the world.

The testimony of great men, like Gladstone and his fellow statesmen; like Havelock and his fellow soldiers, who have made the teachings of the Scriptures their rule of conduct in life, are wonderful helps to men of lesser note and smaller intellectual and moral powers. One example, even of the smallest of these, more than offsets the efforts of an hundred unbelievers in active opposition.

They are the worthy followers of the religion of the Bible, and in their daily lives interpret the inimitable example and Divine precepts of the Son of God, our Saviour.

Jones, John William (September 25, 1836-1909), was a Confederate Chaplain during the Civil War, serving in Robert E. Lee's Army of Northern Virginia. He was instrumental in the numerous revivals that swept through troops, resulting in over 100,000 conversions. Chaplain J. William Jones had been ordained a Baptist missionary and was preparing to leave for China when the war broke out. He enlisted as a private in the Confederate Army and within a year began serving as a chaplain. His reports of the ongoing revival that he had witnessed among the Confederate troops are recorded in his work, Christ in the Camp, published in 1887:

Any history of this army which omits an account of the wonderful influence of religion upon it - which fails to tell how the courage, discipline, and morale was influenced by the humble piety and evangelical zeal of many of its officers and men - would be incomplete and unsatisfactory.

It is believed that no army in the world's history ever had in it so much of genuine, devout piety, so much of active work for Christ, as the Army of Northern Virginia, under the command of our noble Christian leader.

On the bloody campaign from the Rapidan to Cold Harbor in 1864, when the army was constantly in the trenches or on the march, and fought almost daily, Bryan's Georgia Brigade had a season of comparative repose, while held in reserve, when they had from three to five [religious] meetings a day, which resulted in about fifty professions of conversions, most of whom... [were] baptized in a pond which was exposed to the enemy's fire, and where several men were wounded while the ordinance was being administered.

Chaplain Jones wrote of a Captain in the Georgia Brigade who was converted at one of the prayer meetings. The Captain professed publicly:

Men, I have led you into many a battle... Alas! I have (also) led you into all manner of wickedness and vice... I have enlisted under the banner of the Cross, and mean, by God's help, to prove a faithful soldier of Jesus... I call upon you, my brave boys, to follow me, as I shall try to follow "the Captain of our salvation."

Chaplain Jones records that one evening General Stonewall Jackson had discussed strategies with his generals. As they left the meeting, A.P. Hill remarked to Richard Ewell, "Well, I suppose Jackson wants time to pray over it." Later Richard Ewell found General Jackson on his knees fervently praying for guidance, and exclaimed, "If that is religion, I must have it."

August 21, 1863, had been declared a Day of Fasting, Humiliation and Prayer for the South. Chaplain J. William Jones took note of the response:

I can never forget the effect produced by the reading of this order. . . . A precious revival was already in progress in many of the commands. . . . The work of grace among the troops widened and deepened and went gloriously on until over fifteen thousand of the soldiers of Lee's army professed repentance toward God and faith in Jesus Christ as a personal Saviour.

Chaplain J. William Jones had visited General Robert E. Lee's tent, along with Chaplain B. T. Lacey, who was Stonewall Jackson's Chaplain. They told the General that he was being prayed for by all the chaplains. As Jones recorded, tears came to General Lee's eyes as he said:

Please thank them for that, sir - I warmly appreciate it. And I can only say that I am nothing but a poor sinner, trusting in Christ alone for salvation, and need all of the prayers they can offer me.

After the war, Robert E. Lee accepted the invitation to serve as the President of Washington College. In 1869, he invited his former chaplain, John William Jones, to address the student body. Afterward he said:

Our great want is a revival which shall bring these young men to Christ. We poor sinners need to come back from our wanderings to seek pardon through the all-sufficient merits of our Redeemer. And we need to pray earnestly for the power of the Holy Spirit to give us a precious revival in our hearts and among the unconverted.

Michigan, State of (January 26, 1837), was the 26th State admitted to the Union. On August 7, 1789, President George Washington signed into law an Act of Congress which prohibited slavery from entering the territory, entitled "An Ordinance for the Government of the Territory of the United States, North-West of the River Ohio," Article VI. Congress enabled the establishment of the government of Illinois, provided it followed the general tenets of the Northwest Ordinance of 1787.

The Northwest Ordinance stated:

SECTION 13. And, for extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, which form the basis whereon these republics, their laws and constitutions are erected: to fix and establish those principles as the basis of all laws, constitutions and governments, which forever hereafter shall be formed in the said territory: to provide also for the establishment of states, and permanent government therein, and for their admission to a share in the federal councils in an equal footing with the original states, at as early period as may be consistent with the general interest:

SECTION 14. It is hereby ordained and declared by the authority aforesaid, That the following articles shall be considered as articles of compact, between the original states and the people and states of the said territory, and forever remain unalienable, unless by common consent, to wit:

ARTICLE I. No person, demeaning himself in a peaceable and orderly manner, shall ever be molested on account of his mode of worship or religious sentiments in the said territory....

ARTICLE III. Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged.

The Constitution of the State of Michigan, adopted 1908, stated:

Preamble. We, the people of the State of Michigan, grateful to Almighty God for the blessings of freedom... establish this Constitution.

Article II, Section 3. Every person shall be at liberty to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience.

Article XI, Section 1. Religion, morality and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged.

Moody, Dwight Lyman (February 5, 1837-December 22, 1899), was an American evangelist. He held crusades in the United States and Great Britain, with the hymn writer Ira D. Sankey. He founded the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago, 1899, and several other schools. On June 1, 1899, in the last call he issued, Dwight L. Moody stated:

Dear Friends and Fellow-workers:

The seventeenth General Conference of Christian Workers will be held at Northfield, August 1st to 20th, and all of God's people who are interested in the study of His Word, in the development of their own Christian lives, in a revival of the spiritual life of the Church, in the conversion of sinners, and in the evangelization of the world, are cordially invited to be present.

I am glad to send out this invitation to my fellow-workers because I believe that such a gathering was never more needed than this year. Many thoughtful men have come to feel strongly that the hope of the Church to-day is in a deep and wide-spread revival. We are confronted with difficulties that can be met in no other way. The enemy has come in like a flood - it is time for those who believe in a supernatural religion to look to God to lift up a standard against him. Oh, for a revival of such power that the tide of unbelief and worldliness that is sweeping in upon us shall be beaten back; that every Christian shall be lifted to a higher level of life and power, and multitudes of perishing souls be converted to God! Why not? God's arm is not shortened, nor His ear heavy. I believe the sound of the going in the tops of the mulberry trees may already be heard.

The history of revivals proves that such a work must begin at the house of God. Who can doubt that if somehow the Church could be thoroughly aroused - not a mere scratching of the surface of emotions, but a deep heart-work that shall make us right with God and clothe us with power in prayer and service - the last months of this century would witness the mightiest movements of the Holy Spirit since Pentecost? The whole aim of this conference is to help bring this about.

Why need any pastor or church fail to share in the blessing? How sad the experience of that worker who sees others greatly used in such a movement and himself passed by - other fields rejoicing with the joy of harvest while his still lies barren and unfruitful! It need not be so. Let us break up our fallow ground, seek a fresh anointing of the Holy Spirit, and them move forward, expecting great things of God.

We are to have with us some of the most widely known teachers of this country and England - men on whose labors God has already set His seal. There will be the great help that comes from close contact with hundreds of earnest men and women, almost all of them engaged in some form of Christian work. The accommodations for boarding are ample and pleasant, and the expense moderate. I shall be glad to hear from all who are planning to come. May I not ask Christian people to begin now to pray for a special outpouring of the Spirit upon every meeting of the Conference?

Yours in the Master's Service, D. L. Moody.

Dwight L. Moody stated:

Some day you will read in the papers that D. L. Moody, of East Northfield, is dead. Don't you believe a word of it! At that moment I shall be more alive than I am now, I shall have gone up higher, that is all; out of this old clay tenement into a house that is immortal - a body that death cannot touch; that sin cannot taint; a body fashioned like unto His glorious body. I was born in the flesh in 1837. I was born of the Spirit in 1856. That which is born of the flesh may die. That which is born of the Spirit will live forever.

Howells, William Dean (March 1, 1837-May 11, 1920), was a poet, novelist, editor and literary critic. He was one of America's first realistic fiction writers. He was the U.S. Consul in Venice; a writer for the New York Tribune and the Nation; assistant editor of the Atlantic Monthly; and, in 1886, joined the staff of Harper's Monthly.

Elected the first president of the American Academy of Arts and Letters, William Dean Howells was a friend of Mark Twain, James Russell Lowell, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Nathaniel Hawthorne and Walt Whitman. His works include: A Boy's Town; Their Wedding Journey; A Modern Instance; A Foregone Conclusion; Hazard of New Fortunes; and The Rise of Silas Lapham, 1885.

Our thanksgiving accept.

Cleveland, Stephen Grover (March 18, 1837-June 24, 1908), served as both the 22nd and 24th President of the United States, 1885-89 and 1893-97; trustee of Princeton University, 1901; married Frances Folsom, 1886; the Governor of New York, 1882-85; the Mayor of Buffalo, N. Y., 1881-82; Sheriff of Erie County, 1870-73; Assistant District Attorney of Erie County, 1863-70; Ward Supervisor, 1862; admitted to the bar, 1859; and teacher at the New York Institute for the Blind, 1853. He was a direct descendant of Moses Cleveland, the founder of Cleveland, Ohio, whose ancestors came from England to Massachusetts in 1635; and was the son of a Presbyterian minister, Richard Falley Cleveland, who pastored churches in New Jersey and New York, in addition to being the district secretary of the American Home Mission Society.

Stephen Grover Cleveland, who had memorized the Westminster Confession and Pilgrim's Progress, once commented:

I have always felt that my training as a minister's son has been more valuable to me as a strengthening influence than any other incident in life.

After his father died, when he was sixteen years of age, Grover Cleveland helped to support his family by teaching at the New York Institute for the Blind. It was during this time that he heard a sermon by Henry Ward Beecher, of which he recalled:

He captivated my youthful understanding and pictured, to my aroused imagination, the entrance of two young men upon the world's jostling activities - one laden like a beast of burden with avaricious plans and sordid expectations, and the other with a light step and cheerful determination, seeking the way of duty and usefulness and striving for the reward of those who love and serve God, and labor for humanity....

What this sermon has been for me in all these years I alone know.

On Wednesday, March 4, 1885, In his First Inaugural Address, President Grover Cleveland stated:

On this auspicious occasion we may well renew the pledge of our devotion to the Constitution, which, launched by the founders of the Republic and consecrated by their prayers and patriotic devotion, has for almost a century borne the hopes and the aspirations of a great people....

And let us not trust to human effort alone, but humbly acknowledge the power and goodness of Almighty God who presides over the destiny of nations, and who has at all times been revealed in our country's history, let us invoke His aid and His blessings upon our labors.

On July 23, 1885, President Grover Cleveland stated in a Proclamation occasioned by the death of Ulysses S. Grant:

The President of the United States has just received the sad tidings of the death of that illustrious citizen and ex-President of the United States, General Ulysses S. Grant... The destined end has come at last, and his spirit has returned to the Creator who sent it forth.

On Monday, November 2, 1885, President Grover Cleveland issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer:

The American people have always abundant cause to be thankful to Almighty God, whose watchful care and guiding hand have been manifested in every stage of their national life, guarding and protecting them in time of peril and safely leading them in the hour of darkness and of danger.

It is fitting and proper that a nation thus favored should on one day in every year, for that purpose especially appointed, publicly acknowledge the goodness of God and return thanks to Him for all His gracious gifts.

Therefore, I, Grover Cleveland, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate and set apart Thursday, the 26th day of November instant, as a day of public thanksgiving and prayer, and do invoke the observance of the same by all the people of the land.

On that day let all secular business be suspended, and let the people assemble in their usual places of worship and with prayer and songs of praise devoutly testify their gratitude to the Giver of Every Good and Perfect Gift for all that He has done for us in the year that has passed; for our preservation as a united nation and for our deliverance from the shock and danger of political convulsion; for the blessings of peace and for our safety and quiet while wars and rumors of wars have agitated and afflicted other nations of the earth; for our security against the scourge of pestilence, which in other lands has claimed its dead by thousands and filled the streets with mourners; for plenteous crops which reward the labor of the husbandman and increase our nation's wealth, and for the contentment throughout our borders which follows in the train of prosperity and abundance.

And let there also be on the day thus set apart a reunion of families, sanctified and chastened by tender memories and associations; and let the social intercourse of friends, with pleasant reminiscence, renew the ties of affection and strengthen the bonds of kindly feeling.

And let us by no means forget while we give thanks and enjoy the comforts which have crowned our lives that truly grateful hearts are inclined to deeds of charity, and that a kind and thoughtful remembrance of the poor will double the pleasures of our condition and render our praise and thanksgiving more acceptable in the sight of the Lord.

Done at the city of Washington, this 2d day of November, 1885, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and tenth. Grover Cleveland.

Congress, President Grover Cleveland stated:

The strength, the perpetuity, and the destiny of the nation rest upon our homes, established by the law of God, guarded by parental care, regulated by parental authority, and sanctified by parental love. . . . The mothers of our land, who rule the nation as they mold the characters and guide the actions of their sons, live according to God's holy ordinances, and each, secure and happy in the exclusive love of the father of her children, sheds the warm light of true womanhood, unperverted and unpolluted, upon all within her pure and wholesome family circle. . . . The fathers of our families are the best citizens of the Republic. Wife and children are the sources of patriotism, and conjugal and parental affection beget devotion to the country. The man who, undefiled. . . is surrounded in his single home with his wife and children has a stake in the country which inspires him with respect for its laws and courage for its defense.

On November 1, 1886, President Grover Cleveland issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer:

It has long been the custom of the people of the United States, on a day in each year especially set apart for that purpose by their Chief Executive, to acknowledge the goodness and mercy of God and to invoke His continued care and protection.

In observance of such custom, I, Grover Cleveland, President of the United States, do hereby designate and set apart Thursday, the 25th day of November instant, to be observed and kept as a day of thanksgiving and prayer.

On that day let all our people forego their accustomed employments and assemble in their usual places of worship to give thanks to the Ruler of the Universe for our continued enjoyment of the blessings of a free government, for a renewal of business prosperity throughout our land, for the return which has rewarded the labor of those who till the soil, and for our progress as a people in all that makes a nation great.

And while we contemplate the infinite power of God in earthquake, flood, and storm let the grateful hearts of those who have been shielded from harm through His mercy be turned in sympathy and kindness toward those who have suffered through His visitations.

Let us also in the midst of our thanksgiving remember the poor and needy with cheerful gifts and alms so that our service may by deeds of charity be made acceptable in the sight of the Lord.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 1st day of November, A. D. 1886, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and eleventh.

On July 13, 1887, at a centennial celebration in Clinton, New York, President Grover Cleveland detailed:

American Quotations.txt

That the office of Presidency of the United States does represent the sovereignty of sixty millions of free people, is, to my mind, a statement full of solemnity; for this sovereignty I conceive to be the working out or enforcement of the divine right of man to govern himself and a manifestation of God's plan concerning the human race.

On October 25, 1887, President Grover Cleveland issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer:

The goodness and the mercy of God, which have followed the American people during all the days of the past year, claim their grateful recognition and humble acknowledgment. By His omnipotent power He has protected us from war and pestilence and from every national calamity; by His gracious favor the earth has yielded a generous return to the labor of the husbandman, and every path of honest toil has led to comfort and contentment; by His loving kindness the hearts of our people have been replenished with fraternal sentiment and patriotic endeavor, and by His unerring guidance we have been directed in the way of national prosperity.

To the end that we may with one accord testify our gratitude for all these blessings, I, Grover Cleveland, President of the United States, do hereby designate and set apart Thursday, the 24th day of November next, as a day of thanksgiving and prayer, to be observed by all the people of the land.

On that day let all secular work and employment be suspended, and let our people assemble in their accustomed places of worship and with prayer and songs of praise give thanks to our Heavenly Father for all that He has done for us, while we humbly implore the forgiveness of our sins and a continuance of His mercy.

Let families and kindred be reunited on that day, and let their hearts, filled with kindly cheer and affectionate reminiscence, be turned in thankfulness to the Source of all their pleasures and the Giver of all that makes the day glad and joyous.

And in the midst of our worship and our happiness let us remember the poor, the needy, and the unfortunate, and by our gifts of charity and ready benevolence let us increase the number of those who with grateful hearts shall join in our thanksgiving.

In witness whereof I have set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed.

On Thursday, November 1, 1888, President Grover Cleveland issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer:

Constant thanksgiving and gratitude are due from the American people to Almighty God for His goodness and mercy, which have followed them since the day He made them a nation and vouchsafed to them a free government. With loving kindness He has constantly led us in the way of prosperity and greatness. He has not visited with swift punishment our shortcomings, but with gracious care He has warned us of our dependence upon His forbearance and has taught us that obedience to His holy law is the price of a continuance of His precious gifts.

In acknowledgment of all that God has done for us as a nation, and to the end that on an appointed day the united prayers and praise of a grateful country may reach the throne of grace, I, Grover Cleveland, President of the United States, do hereby designate and set apart Thursday, the 29th day of November instant, as a day of thanksgiving and prayer, to be kept and observed throughout the land.

On that day let all our people suspend their ordinary work and occupations, and in their accustomed places of worship, with prayer and songs of praise, render thanks to God for all His mercies, for the abundant harvests which have rewarded the toil of the husbandman during the year that has passed, and for the rich rewards that have followed the labors of our people in their shops and their marts of trade and traffic. Let us give thanks for peace and for social order and contentment within our borders, and for our advancement in all that adds to national greatness.

And mindful of the afflictive dispensations with which a portion of our land has been visited, let us, while we humble ourselves before the power of God, acknowledge His mercy in setting bounds to the deadly march of pestilence, and let our hearts be chastened by sympathy with our fellow-countrymen who have suffered and who mourn.

And as we return thanks for all the blessings which we have received from the hand of our Heavenly Father, let us not forget that He has enjoined upon us charity; and on this day of thanksgiving let us generously remember the poor and needy, so that our tribute of praise and gratitude may be acceptable in the sight of the Lord.

Done at the city of Washington on the 1st day of November, 1888, and in the year of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and thirteenth.

In witness whereof I have hereunto signed my name and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

On December 3, 1888, in his Fourth Annual Message, President Grover Cleveland stated:

The people wait and expect from their chosen representatives such patriotic action as will advance the welfare of the entire country; and this expectation can only be answered by the performance of public duty with unselfish purpose. Our mission among the nations of the earth and our success in accomplishing the work God has given the American people to do require of those intrusted with the making and execution of our laws perfect devotion, above all other things, to the public good. This devotion will lead us to strongly resist all impatience with constitutional limitations of Federal power and to persistently check the increasing tendency to extend the scope of Federal legislation into the domain of the State and local jurisdiction upon the plea of subserving the public welfare.

On Saturday, March 4, 1893, in his Second Inaugural Address, President Grover Cleveland stated:

My Fellow-Citizens: In obedience to the mandate of my countrymen I am about to dedicate myself to their service under the sanction of a solemn oath. Deeply moved by the expression of confidence and personal attachment which has called me to this service, I am sure my gratitude can make no better return than the pledge I now give before God and these witnesses of unreserved and complete devotion to the interests and welfare of those who have honored me....

It can not be doubted that our stupendous achievements as a people and our country's robust strength have given rise to heedlessness of those laws governing our national health which we can no more evade than human life can escape the laws of God and nature....

Above all, I know there is a Supreme Being who rules the affairs of men and whose goodness and mercy have always followed the American people, and I know He will not turn from us now if we humbly and reverently seek His powerful aid.

On November 3, 1893, President Grover Cleveland issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving and Praise:

While the American people should every day remember with praise and thanksgiving the divine goodness and mercy which have followed them since their beginning as a nation, it is fitting that one day in each year should be especially devoted to the contemplation of the blessings we have received from the hand of God and to the grateful acknowledgement of His loving kindness.

Therefore, I, Grover Cleveland, President of the United States, do hereby designate and set apart Thursday, the 30th day of the present month of November, as a day of thanksgiving and praise to be kept and observed by all the people of our land. On that day let us forego our ordinary work and employments and assemble in our usual places of worship, where we may recall all that God has done for us and where from grateful hearts our united tribute of praise and song may reach the Throne of Grace. Let the reunion of kindred and the social meeting of friends lend cheer and enjoyment to the day, and let generous gifts of charity for the relief of the poor and needy prove the sincerity of our thanksgiving.

Witness my hand and the seal of the United States, which I have caused to be hereto affixed.

On December 4, 1893, in his Fifth Annual Message, President Grover Cleveland stated:

It has devolved upon the United States minister at Peking, as dean of the diplomatic body, and in the absence of a representative of Sweden and Norway, to press upon the Chinese Government reparation for the recent murder of Swedish missionaries at Sung-pu. This question is of vital interest to all countries whose citizens engage in missionary work in the interior....

At the time Spain's title to the Caroline Island was confirmed by arbitration that Government agreed that the rights which had been acquired there by American missionaries should be recognized and respected. It is sincerely hoped that this pledge will be observed by allowing our missionaries, who were removed from Ponape to a place of safety by a United States war ship during the late troubles between the Spanish garrison and the natives, to return to their field of usefulness....

Information received of maltreatment suffered by an inoffensive American woman engaged in missionary work in Turkish Koordistan was followed by such representations to the Porte as resulted in the issuance of orders for the punishment of her assailants, the removal of a delinquent official, and the adoption of measures for the protection of our citizens engaged in mission and other lawful work in that quarter....

The conditions of the Indians and their ultimate fate are subjects which are related to a sacred duty of the Government and which strongly appeal to the sense of justice and the sympathy of our people.... The total number of Indian children enrolled during the year as attendants of all schools was 21,138, and increase of 1,231 over the enrollment for the previous year. I am sure that secular education and moral and religious teaching must be important factors in any effort to save the Indian and lead him to civilization.

Charles W. Skelton reported President Grover Cleveland's response to a conflict with the Indians:

At the close of the Mohonk Conference, our Committee went to President Cleveland to petition him regarding certain methods. He said that he sympathized with our plans and ideas; "but," he continued, "gentlemen, you may do all you can at Mohonk; I may do all I can here in the White House, and Congress may do all it can over there, but," (and he then turned and picked up a Bible on his desk,) "gentlemen, after all, that Book has got to settle the Indian Problem."

On Thursday, November 1, 1894, President Grover Cleveland issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer:

The American people should gratefully render thanksgiving and praise to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, who has watched over them with kindness and fostering care during the year that has passed; they should also with humility and faith supplicate the Father of All Mercies for continued blessings according to their needs, and they should by deeds of charity seek the favor of the Giver of Every Good and Perfect Gift.

Therefore, I, Grover Cleveland, President of the United States, do hereby appoint and set apart Thursday, the 29th day of November instant, as a day of thanksgiving and prayer to be kept and observed by all the people of the Land.

On that day let our ordinary work and business be suspended and let us meet in our accustomed places of worship and give thanks to Almighty God for our preservation as a nation, for our immunity from disease and pestilence, for the harvests that have rewarded our husbandry, for a renewal of national prosperity, and for every advance in virtue and intelligence that has marked our growth as a people.

And with our thanksgiving let us pray that these blessings may be multiplied unto us, that our national conscience may be quickened to a better recognition of the power and goodness of God, and that in our national life we may clearer see and closer follow the path of righteousness.

And in our places of worship and praise, as well as in the happy reunions of kindred and friends on that day, let us invoke divine approval by generously remembering the poor and needy. Surely He who has given us comfort and plenty will look upon our relief of the destitute and our ministrations of charity as the work of hearts truly grateful and as proofs of the sincerity of our thanksgiving.

Witness my hand and the seal of the United States, which I have caused to be hereto affixed.

On December 11, 1894, from his Executive Mansion, President Grover Cleveland wrote to the Senate:

I have received a copy of the following resolution of the Senate, passed the 3d instant:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if in his judgement it be not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate any information he may have received in regard to alleged cruelties committed upon Armenians in Turkey, and especially whether any such cruelties have been committed upon citizens who have declared their intention to become naturalized in this country or upon persons because of their being Christians. And further, to inform the Senate whether any expostulations have been addressed by this Government to the Government of Turkey in regard to such matters or any proposals made by or to this Government to act in concert with other Christian powers regarding the same.

On November 4, 1895, President Grover Cleveland issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer:

American Quotations.txt

The constant goodness and forbearance of Almighty God which have been vouchsafed to the American people during the year which is just past call for their sincere acknowledgment and devout gratitude.

To the end, therefore, that we may with thankful hearts unite in extolling the loving care of our Heavenly Father, I, Grover Cleveland, President of the United States, do hereby appoint and set apart Thursday, the 28th day of the present month of November, as a day of thanksgiving and prayer to be kept and observed by all our people.

On that day let us forego our usual occupations and in our accustomed places of worship join in rendering thanks to the Giver of Every Good and Perfect Gift for the bounteous returns that have rewarded our labors in the fields and in the busy marts of trade, for the peace and order that have prevailed throughout the land, for our protection from pestilence and dire calamity, and for the other blessings that have been showered upon us from an open hand.

And with our thanksgiving let us humbly beseech the Lord to so incline the hearts of our people unto Him that He will not leave us nor forsake us as a nation, but will continue to us His mercy and protecting care, guiding us in the path of national prosperity and happiness, enduring us with rectitude and virtue, and keeping alive within us a patriotic love for the free institutions which have been given to us as our national heritage.

And let us also on the day of our thanksgiving especially remember the poor and needy, and by deeds of charity let us show the sincerity of our gratitude.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

On Monday, December 2, 1895, in his Seventh Annual Message, President Grover Cleveland wrote to Congress:

Correspondence is on foot touching the practice of Russian consuls within the jurisdiction of the United States to interrogate citizens as to their race and religious faith, and upon ascertainment thereof to deny to Jews authentication of passports of legal documents for use in Russia. Inasmuch as such a proceeding imposes a disability which in the case of succession to property in Russia may be found to infringe the treaty rights of our citizens, and which is an obnoxious invasion of our territorial jurisdiction, it has elicited fitting remonstrance, the result of which, it is hoped, will remove the cause of the complaint....

Occurrences in Turkey have continued to excite concern. The reported massacres of Christians in Armenia and the development there and in other districts of a spirit of fanatic hostility to Christian influences naturally excited apprehension for the safety of the devoted men and women who, as dependents of the foreign missionary societies in the United States, reside in Turkey under the guaranty of law and usage and in the legitimate performance of their educational and religious mission. No efforts have been spared in their behalf, and their protection in person and property has been earnestly and vigorously enforced by every means within our power....

Orders have been carried out, and our latest intelligence gives assurance of the present personal safety of our citizens and missionaries. Though thus far no lives of American citizens have been sacrificed, there can be no doubt that serious loss and destruction of mission property have resulted from riotous conflicts and outrageous attacks.

By treaty several of the most powerful European powers have secured a right and have assumed a duty not only in behalf of their own citizens and in furtherance of their own interests, but as agents of the Christian world. Their right to enforce such conduct of Turkish government as will refrain fanatical brutality, and if this fails their duty is to so interfere as to insure against such dreadful occurrences in Turkey as have lately shocked civilization.

On November 4, 1896, President Grover Cleveland issued a Proclamation of a National Day of Thanksgiving and Prayer:

The people of the United States should never be unmindful of the gratitude they owe the God of Nations for His watchful care, which has shielded them from dire disaster and pointed out to them the way of peace and happiness. Nor should they ever refuse to acknowledge with contrite hearts their proneness to turn away from God's teaching and to follow with sinful pride after their own devices.

To the end that these thoughts may be quickened it is fitting that on a day especially appointed we should join together in approaching the Throne of Grace with praise and supplication.

Therefore, I, Grover Cleveland, President of the United States, do hereby designate and set apart Thursday, the 26th day of the present month of November, to be kept and observed as a day of thanksgiving and prayer throughout our land.

On that day let all our people forego their usual work and occupation and, assembled in their accustomed places of worship, let them with one accord render thanks to the Ruler of the Universe for our preservation as a nation and our deliverance from every threatened danger, for the peace that has dwelt within our boundaries, for our defense against disease and pestilence during the year that has passed, for the plenteous rewards that have followed the labors of our husbandmen, and for all the other blessings that have been vouchsafed to us.

And let us, through the mediation of Him who has taught us how to pray, implore the forgiveness of our sins and a continuation of heavenly favor.

Let us not forget on this day of thanksgiving the poor and needy, and by deeds of charity let our offerings of praise be made more acceptable in the sight of the Lord.

On November 14, 1896, President Grover Cleveland issued the Proclamation:

Whereas on June 21, 1890, the President of the United States by proclamation reserved certain lands in Juneau and Douglas City, Fort Wrangell and Sitka, in the Territory of Alaska, for public buildings, barracks, parade grounds, parks, wharves, coaling stations, etc., which are fully set forth and particularly described in said proclamation; and

Whereas a treaty of cession was exchanged and proclaimed on June 20, 1867, whereby the Russian Empire ceded to the United States the Territory of Alaska; and

Whereas said treaty, by Article II, provided, inter alia, that - "It is, however, understood and agreed that the churches which have been built in the ceded territory by the Russian Government shall remain the property of such members of the Greek Oriental Church resident in the territory as may choose to worship therein."

And whereas there were included among the lands hereinbefore referred to as reserved on June 21, 1890, certain lands in and about the town of Sitka, in said Territory of Alaska, which are claimed by the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic Oriental Church, commonly styled the Greco-Russian Church, and described in the said treaty as the Greek Oriental Church:

Now, therefore, I, Grover Cleveland, President of the United States, by virtue of the authority in me vested, do hereby declare, proclaim, and make known that the Executive order of June 21, 1890, making said reservation of lands in the Territory of Alaska, therein particularly described, is hereby modified, and said reservations are diminished so that the following property, described in Inventory B attached to and referred to in the protocol of transfer signed by the representatives of Russia and the United States on October 26, 1867, and being in and about the town of Sitka aforesaid, be excluded therefrom, to wit:

The Cathedral Church of St. Michael, built of timber, situated in the center of the city. The Church of the Resurrection, of timber, commonly called the Kalochian Church, situated near the battery number at the palisade separating the city from the Indian village. 102. A double-storied timber building for bishop house, with outbuildings, appurtenances, and grounds. 35. A timber house for church warden. 98. A timber house for the deacon. 104, 105, 114. Three timber houses, with their appurtenances and outbuildings for lodging of priests. F, G, H, I. Four lots of ground belonging to the parsonages. A. The place commemorative of the old church. B. A tomb. Three cemeteries, two outside palisades and one by the Church of the Resurrection.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

By the President: Richard Olney, Secretary of State.

On Monday, December 7, 1896, in his Eighth Annual Message, President Grover Cleveland stated:

At the outset of a reference to the more important matters affecting our relations with foreign powers it would afford me satisfaction if I could assure the Congress that the disturbed condition in Asiatic Turkey had during the past year assumed a less hideous and bloody aspect and that, either as a consequence of the awakening of the Turkish Government to the demands of humane civilization or as the result of decisive action on the part of the great nations having the right by treaty to interfere for the protection of those exposed to the rage of mad bigotry and cruel fanaticism, the shocking features of the situation had been mitigated.

Instead, however, of welcoming a softened disposition or protective intervention, we have been afflicted by continued and not infrequent reports of the wanton destruction of homes and the bloody butchery of men, women, and children, made martyrs to their profession of Christian faith.

While none of our citizens in Turkey have thus far been killed or wounded, though often in the midst of dreadful scenes of danger, their safety in the future is by no means assured. Our Government at home and our minister at Constantinople have left nothing undone to protect our missionaries in Ottoman territory, who constitute nearly all the individuals residing there who have a right to claim our protection on the score of American citizenship.

Our efforts in this direction will not be relaxed; but the deep feelings and sympathy that have been aroused among our people ought not to so far blind their reason and judgement as to lead them to demand impossible things. The outbreaks of blind fury which lead to murder and pillage in Turkey occur suddenly and without notice....

We have made claims against the Turkish Government for the pillage and destruction of missionary property at Harpoot and Marash during the uprisings at those places....

A number of Armenian refugees having arrived at our ports, an order has lately been obtained from the Turkish Government permitting the wives and children of such refugees to join them here. It is hoped that hereafter no obstacle will be interposed to prevent the escape of all those who seek to avoid the perils which threaten them in Turkish dominions....

I do not believe that the present somber prospect in Turkey will be long permitted to offend the sight of Christendom. It so mars the humane and enlightened civilization that belongs to the close of the nineteenth century that it seems hardly possible that the earnest demand of good people throughout the Christian world for its corrective treatment will remain unanswered.

In The Writings and Speeches of Grover Cleveland, Stephen Grover Cleveland declared:

The citizen is a better business man if he is a Christian gentleman, and, surely, business is not the less prosperous and successful if conducted on Christian principles....

All must admit that the reception of the teachings of Christ results in the purest patriotism, in the most scrupulous fidelity to public trust, and in the best type of citizenship.

Those who manage the affairs of government are by this means reminded that the law of God demands that they should be courageously true to the interests of the people, and that the Ruler of the Universe will require of them a strict account of their stewardship.

The teachings of both human and Divine Law thus merging into one word, duty, form the only union of Church and state that a civil and religious government can recognize.

In 1906, Grover Cleveland was surprised at the public response to his sixty-ninth birthday:

Somehow I am wondering why all this should be, since I have left many things undone I ought to have done in the realm of friendship, and since in the work of public duty and effort, God has never failed to clearly make known to me the path of duty.

Brewer, David Josiah (June 20, 1837-March 28, 1910), was a Justice of the United State Supreme Court, 1889-1910. He had been appointed by President Chester A. Arthur as a circuit court judge, 1884; and served as Justice of the Kansas Supreme Court, 1870-84. His uncle was Supreme Court Justice Stephen J. Field, with whom he serve 9 years on the bench. Justice David Josiah Brewer gave the court's opinion in the 1892 case of Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States, (143 U.S. 457-458, 465-471, 36 L ed 226):

No purpose of action against religion can be imputed to any legislation, state or national, because this is a religious people. This is historically true. From the discovery of this continent to the present hour, there is a single voice making this affirmation.

The commission to Christopher Columbus... [recited] that it is hoped that by God's assistance some of the continents and islands in the ocean will be discovered...

The first colonial grant made to Sir Walter Raleigh in 1584... and the grant authorizing him to enact statutes for the government of the proposed colony provided that they be not against the true Christian faith...

The first charter of Virginia, granted by King James I in 1606... commenced the grant in these words: "...in propagating of Christian Religion to such People as yet live in Darkness..."

Language of similar import may be found in the subsequent charters of that colony... in 1609 and 1611;

and the same is true of the various charters granted to the other colonies. In language more or less emphatic is the establishment of the Christian religion declared to be one of the purposes of the grant. The celebrated compact made by the Pilgrims in the Mayflower, 1620, recites: "Having undertaken for the Glory of God, and advancement of the Christian faith... a voyage to plant the first colony in the northern parts of Virginia..."

The fundamental orders of Connecticut, under which a provisional government was instituted in 1638-1639, commence with this declaration: "...And well knowing where a people are gathered together the word of God requires that to maintain the peace and union... there should be an orderly and decent government established according to God... to maintain and preserve the liberty and purity of the gospel of our Lord Jesus which we now profess... of the said gospel [which] is now practiced amongst us."

In the charter of privileges granted by William Penn to the province of Pennsylvania, in 1701, it is recited: "...no people can be truly happy, though under the greatest enjoyment of civil liberties, if abridged of... their religious profession and worship..."

Coming nearer to the present time, the Declaration of Independence recognizes the presence of the Divine in human affairs in these words:

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights... appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions... And for the support of this Declaration, with firm reliance on the Protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our Lives, our Fortunes, and our sacred Honor.

...We find everywhere a clear recognition of the same truth... because of a general recognition of this truth [that we are a Christian nation], the question has seldom been presented to the courts...

There is no dissonance in these declarations. There is a universal language pervading them all, having one meaning; they affirm and reaffirm that this is a religious nation. These are not individual sayings, declarations of private persons: they are organic utterances; they speak the voice of the entire people.

While because of a general recognition of this truth the question has seldom been presented to the courts, yet we find that in Updegraph v. The Commonwealth, it was decided that, Christianity, general Christianity, is, and always has been, a part of the common law... not Christianity with an established church... but Christianity with liberty of conscience to all men.

And in The People v. Ruggles, Chancellor Kent, the great commentator on American law, speaking as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of New York, said:

The people of this State, in common with the people of this country, profess the general doctrines of Christianity, as the rule of their faith and practice... We are a Christian people, and the morality of the country is deeply engrafted upon Christianity, and not upon the doctrines or worship of those impostors [other religions].

And in the famous case of Vidal v. Girard's Executors, this Court...observed:

It is also said, and truly, that the Christian religion is a part of the common law...

If we pass beyond these matters to a view of American life as expressed by its laws, its business, its customs and its society, we find everywhere a clear recognition of the same truth. Among other matters note the following: The form of oath universally prevailing, concluding with an appeal to the Almighty; the custom of opening sessions of all deliberative bodies and most conventions with prayer; the prefatory words of all wills, "In the name of God, amen"; the laws respecting the observance of the Sabbath, with the general cessation of all secular business, and the closing of courts, legislatures, and other similar public assemblies on that day; the churches and church organizations which abound in every city, town and hamlet; the multitude of charitable organizations existing everywhere under Christian auspices; the gigantic missionary associations, with general support, and aiming to establish Christian missions in every quarter of the globe.

These, and many other matters which might be noticed, add a volume of unofficial declarations to the mass of organic utterances that this is a Christian nation.... We find everywhere a clear recognition of the same truth.

The happiness of a people and the good order and preservation of civil government essentially depend upon piety, religion and morality.

Religion, morality, and knowledge [are] necessary to good government, the preservation of liberty, and the happiness of mankind.

A commentary on the 1892 case Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States, summarized:

Our laws and our institutions must necessarily be based upon and embody the teachings of the Redeemer of mankind. It is impossible that it should be otherwise; and in this sense and to this extent our civilization and our institutions are emphatically Christian.

In his work, The United States - A Christian Nation, published in Philadelphia by the John C. Winston Company, 1905, Justice David Josiah Brewer wrote:

We classify nations in various ways. As, for instance, by their form of government. One is a kingdom, another an empire, and still another a republic. Also by race. Great Britain is an Anglo-Saxon nation, France a Gallic, Germany a Teutonic, Russia a Slav. And still again by religion. One is a Mohammedan nation, others are heathen, and still others are Christian nations.

This republic is classified among the Christian nations of the World. It was so formally declared by the Supreme Court of the United States.

But in what sense can it be called a Christian nation? Not in the sense that Christianity is the established religion or that the people are in any manner compelled to support it. On the contrary, the Constitution specifically provides that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." Neither is it Christian in the sense that a profession of Christianity is a condition of holding office or otherwise engaging in the public service, or essential to recognition either politically or socially. In fact the government as a legal organization is independent of all religions.

Nevertheless, we constantly speak of this republic as a Christian nation - in fact, as the leading Christian nation of the world. This popular use of the term certainly has significance. It is not a mere creation of the imagination. It is not a term of derision but has a substantial basis - one which justifies its use.

In no charter or constitution is there anything to even suggest that any other than the Christian is the religion of this country. In none of them is Mohammed or Confucius or Buddha in any manner noticed. In none of them is Judaism recognized other than by way of toleration of its special creed.

While the separation of church and state is often affirmed, there is nowhere a repudiation of Christianity as one of the institutions as well as benedictions of society. In short, there is no charter or constitution that is either infidel, agnostic, or anti-Christian. Wherever there is a declaration in favor of any religion it is of the Christian.

You will have noticed that I have presented no doubtful facts. Nothing has been stated which is debatable. The quotations from charters are in the archives of the several States; the laws are on the statutes books; judicial opinions are taken from the official reports; statistics from the census publications. In short, no evidence has been presented which is open to question.

I could show how largely our laws and customs are based upon the laws of Moses and the teachings of Christ; how constantly the Bible is appealed to as the guide of life and the authority in question of morals.

In the case of Holy Trinity Church vs. United States, 143 U.S. 471, that court, after mentioning various circumstances, add, these and many other matters which might be noticed, add a volume of unofficial declarations to the mass of organic utterances that this is a Christian nation.

Associate Justice David Josiah Brewer shared:

I Believe in Jesus Christ as the great Helper, Comforter and Saviour of humanity, and the Holy Bible as bearing to us the story of his mission, the rules of duty, the revelation of Eternal Life, and also the conditions under which the attainment of that life are possible.

No Book contains more truths, or is more worthy of confidence than the Bible; none brings more joy to the sorrowing, more strength to the weak, or more stimulus to the nobly ambitious; none makes life sweeter, or death easier or less sad.

Massachusetts Supreme Court (1838), heard the case of Commonwealth v. Abner Kneeland, 37 Mass. (20 Pick) 206, 216-217 1838, which involved a Universalist who claimed the right of "freedom of the press" as a defense for publishing libelous and defamatory remarks about Christianity and God. The Court delivered its decision, stating that "freedom of press" was not a license to print without restraint, otherwise:

According to the argument...every act, however injurious or criminal, which can be committed by the use of language may be committed...if such language is printed.

Not only therefore would the article in question become a general license for scandal, calumny and falsehood against individuals, institutions and governments, in the form of publication...but all incitation to treason, assassination, and all other crimes however atrocious, if conveyed in printed language, would be dispensable.

The statute, on which the question arises, is as follows:

"That if any person shall willfully blaspheme the holy name of God, by denying, cursing, or contumeliously reproaching God, his creation, government, or final judging of the world," &....

In general, blasphemy [libel against God] may be described, as consisting in speaking evil of the Deity...to alienate the minds of others from the love and reverence of God. It is purposely using words concerning God...to impair and destroy the reverence, respect, and confidence due him....

It is a wilful and malicious attempt to lessen men's reverence of God by denying his existence, of his attributes as an intelligent creator, governor and judge of men, and to prevent their having confidence in him....

But another ground for arresting the judgement, and one apparently most relied on and urged by the defendant, is, that this statute itself is repugnant to the constitution...and therefore wholly void....

[This law] was passed very soon after the adoption of the constitution, and no doubt, many members of the convention which framed the constitution, were members of the legislature which passed this law....

In New Hampshire, the constitution of which State has a similar declaration of [religious] rights, the open denial of the being and existence of God or of the Supreme Being is prohibited by statute, and declared to be blasphemy.

In Vermont, with a similar declaration of rights, a statute was passed in 1797, by which it was enacted, that if any person shall publicly deny the being and existence of God or the Supreme Being, or shall contumeliously reproach his providence and government, he shall be deemed a disturber of the peace and tranquility of the State, and an offender against the good morals and manners of society, and shall be punishable by fine....

The State of Maine also, having adopted the same constitutional provision with that of Massachusetts, in her declaration of rights, in respect to religious freedom, immediately after the adoption of the constitution reenacted, the Massachusetts statute against blasphemy....

In New York the universal toleration of all religious professions and sentiments, is secured in the most ample manner. It is declared in the constitution... that the free exercise and enjoyment of religious worship, without discrimination or preference, shall for ever be allowed in this State to all mankind....

Notwithstanding this constitutional declaration carrying the doctrine of unlimited toleration as far as the peace and safety of any community will allow, the courts have decided that blasphemy was a crime at common law and was not abrogated by the constitution [People v. Ruggles].

[The First Amendment] embraces all who believe in the existence of God, as well... as Christians of every denomination... This provision does not extend to atheists, because they do not believe in God or religion; and therefore... their sentiments and professions, whatever they may be, cannot be called religious sentiments and professions.

New York State Legislature (1838), stated:

In all countries, some kind of religion or other has existed in all ages. No people on the face of the globe are without a prevailing national religion....

With us it is wisely ordered that no one religion shall be established by law, but that all persons shall be left free in their choice and in their mode of worship. Still, this is a Christian nation. Ninety-nine hundredths, if not a larger proportion, of our whole population, believe in the general doctrines of the Christian religion.

Our Government depends for its being on the virtue of the people, - on that virtue that has its foundation in the morality of the Christian religion; and that religion is the common and prevailing faith of the people.

There are, it is true, exceptions to this belief; but general laws are not made for excepted cases. There are to be found, here and there, the world over, individuals who entertain opinions hostile to the common sense of mankind on subjects of honesty, humanity, and decency; but it would be a kind of republicanism with which we are not acquainted in this country, which would require the great mass of mankind to yield to and be governed by this few.

It is quite unnecessary to enter into a detailed review of all the evidences that Christianity is the common creed of this nation. We know it, and we feel it, as we know and feel any other unquestioned and admitted truth; the evidence is all around us, and
